tons, Prince Edward Island consumed 49,000 tons, Newfoundland consumed 72,000 tons, the United States consumed 61,000 tons, and the West Indies consumed 17,000 tons. In other words, the Province of Quebec took from the Province of Nova Scotia, last year, more coal than Nova Scotia had ever shipped to the United States under the Reciprocity Treaty. More than that, Sir, hon. gentlemen who come from the coal districts of Nova Scotia, who represent those constituencies and who are in touch with their constituents, have never said one word in favor of reciprocity in coal. Now, Sir, if they were so exceedingly anxious for it, if their districts were suffering for want of it, I am quite sure we should have had some expression of opinion from those gentlemen in favor of it. On the contrary, Sir, as far as I can gather from conversations with those gentlemen, they are not at all desirous that the present fiscal relations as regards coal should be changed. Now, Sir, we have heard a good deal about the fishermen. The fisherman is evidently growing rapidly in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), who favored us with the address which charmed us so much last evening, reminded us in eloquent terms of the very great value of the fisheries that surround the Maritime Provinces. I understood that hon. gentleman to say that they are as valuable as the wheat fields of Ontario. That fact was never brought so vividly before my mind as it was when I heard the statement from that hon. gentleman, and Sir, I listened to it with a great deal of pleasure and I think every true Canadian must have been glad to hear it. It is a good thing Sir, to direct attention to Canada's diversity of wealth. Nothing could be more unfortunate for the country than that it should have only one industry. If we were simply to become agriculturists and our crops fail, why, what would become of us? As you all know, Sir, that is simply Ireland's trouble to-day, that she has only one industry. And Sir, that is the condition of things which we are bound as statesmen, as politicians, and as representatives of the people to do all that we possibly can to avoid. No portion of our population are more useful to Canada than her fishermen. There a sturdy, honest, industrious, thrifty lot of fellows who from the depth of the ocean gather at great risk and with great labor that wealth which Providence has placed at our doors. I believe, Sir, that their condition is steadily improving and now that like the laborers they can in the words of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones).

"Buy flour that used to cost $12 for $6.25 and buy tea and cottons and all the necessities of life as cheap as ever they could."

To quote my hon. friend's language:

"They, too,"—

To quote him still:

"will be living more comfortably"—

And to continue the panegyric on the National Policy:

"they will have no good reason to be dissatisfied,"

But the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Skinner) made a suggestion which I thought was a considerate one and a thoughtful one in the interests of the fishermen. That was that we should push our commerce to the West Indies and Brazil. Now, Sir, to do that we must have steamers, and it will be recollected by hon. gentlemen that last year when I urged a subsidy to a line of steamers to the West Indies, I did so at the instance of the citizens of Halifax and also I believe, and I still believe, largely in the interests of our fishermen. When I did urge this I was strongly opposed and almost violently personally attacked, by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). That is in the knowledge of gentlemen of this House, but, Sir, that does not discourage me. And I hope to see steamers carry our mails, passengers and fish to the West Indies and Brazil, and I believe it will benefit our fishermen, our millers, and our manufacturers.

Now, Sir, for the information of the hon. member for St. John, who evidently has taken very great interest in this question, I beg to say that the exports of the Province of Nova Scotia last year to the United States, which the hon. senior member for Halifax says is our only market, amounted to $2,782,000, while our exports to the West Indies and South America amounted to $2,228,000, a very trifling difference. Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen who have suddenly become so zealous about the fishermen, I think, find in angling for them that they have not taken the bait. The fishermen know that the party opposite are no friends of theirs. Many of them remember, and remember affectionately and kindly, the late representative in this House, Mr. Power. Mr. Power was a Grit in politics, but he was a man who could rise above party in the interests of his country and his countrymen, and to help our fishermen he voted for the Washington Treaty, which was the great boon then, as it gave them free access to the American market. But while Mr. Power was voting for the Washington Treaty, his colleague, the present senior member for Halifax, was voting against it and against the interests of the fishermen in doing so, as in his efforts to thwart reciprocity, he is arraying himself against their best interests. Well, Sir, the fishermen, who have been so desperately appealed to in this House, knew Mr. Power and trusted him, and they bear his memory in grateful recollection; and they have still ringing in their ears the words of caution and advice which that hon. gentleman gave them, and which he was in a position to give them from his knowledge of the party opposite. Referring to the Grit party in this country, he said that it was the party that step by step and inch by inch had opposed every concession to Nova Scotia. But, Sir, I find that the Halifax Morning Chronicle also opposed the Washington Treaty, which was of such great advantage to the fisherman. That paper, on July 8th, 1881, said:

"Sir John has 'peculiar claims upon England's gratitude. He has helped the Home Government to complete the national degradation by the Washington Treaty.'"

Now, Sir, we have heard something of the general trade of Nova Scotia. We were by the hon. senior member for Halifax:

"The farmer has his wheat that he cultivates, his grains, his horses and sheep, and the various articles that he cultivates and raises; the fisherman from his hard toil has his fish, and the lumberman has his lumber; but where does it all go? It goes to the United States."

Now, Sir, that is a statement that is to go down to influence the fishermen in Nova Scotia to vote to restore hon. gentlemen opposite to the Treasury benches. But what are the facts of the case? The fishery products of Nova Scotia last year amounted to $3,899,677. Of that amount $1,353,000 went to the United States, while $1,693,000 worth went to the West Indies and South America; and of the exports to the United States, Consul General Phelan's report shows that a large percentage was transported to the United States in bond and transhipped to other markets. Now, Sir, from the fact of our not having steamers to carry our fish from Halifax to the West Indies, large quantities are shipped in bond to New York and then re-shipped to the West Indies. Consul General Phelan, in his report issued in August, 1887, estimates the total exports from the port of Halifax to the United States at $1,492,115. Of that amount $863,977 was entered for consumption, and $628,138, or 44 per cent., was transhipped. I have not the means at my command of ascertaining exactly what this transshipment in bond consisted of, and although I would not at all be supposed to say that it was exclusively fish, I am satisfied that a very large amount of it was fish. Now, we are told that of the products of the forests all we raise goes to the United States; but what is the fact? Here is a comparison of some of our exports to the United States with those to Great Britain:

| Products of | To Gt. Britain | To the U. States |
| The Forest | $786,000 | $ 345,000 |
| Animals, &c..... | 138,000 | 95,000 |
| Agriculture | 627,000 | 210,000 |
| The Fisheries | 718,000 | 1,358,000 |
| The Mine..... | 78,000 | 628,000 |

Now, Sir, as I may not again have the opportunity of dealing with the question of the fisheries, I wish to refer to one statement of the senior member for Halifax. That hon. gentleman said :

"What is the position of these fishermen? $500,000 per year is what the fishermen of this country, under the present policy of restriction, pay to the revenue of the United States, that is, when they have the cash."

My hon. friend does not say the year. I did not know when the hon. gentleman was speaking, whether he was speaking solely of the farmers of the Lower Provinces, or whether, in the expansion of his heart, he had taken in all Canada, and was speaking for all the farmers of Canada. But I do know this, and I have taken some trouble to inform myself on the point, that the total importations into the United States of dutiable fish last year amounted to $2,817,351, and the whole duty collected was $611,937. Now, of that fish, there went from Canada into the United States the total value of $1,330,832. It is a little difficult to arrive with mathematical precision at the exact amount that each different district in Canada may have sent, but I find that the total exports of the United States of fish, including anchovy, haddock, herring, dried salmon, mackerel, pickled salmon and the others, amounted to $1,331,832, and that amount would include fish that was afterwards re-exported in bond, the duty on which could not have exceeded $335,000. I give my figures, and I do not pretend to be infallible. I have taken some pains to make them up, and I shall be very glad to know if I am not correct. I desire to be correct, because, in discussing a great question like this, it is our interest, at all events, if it is not our object, to arrive at the strictest possible accuracy. Well, we have dealt with the laborers and the fishermen, let us now deal with the farmers. I was very glad to learn, for I had not the pleasure of hearing my hon. colleague the other night, that he stated the farmers were doing well, that the farmers of Nova Scotia are not in a bad condition, and he correctly attributed that to the diversity of employment in that Province. He said :

"We have not only our farming industry, but we have our fish, our coal, our lumber, our shipping industry, and our farmers are all to a certain extent more or less interested in one or more of these industries."

Again he said :

"We have in a part of Nova Scotia a very large fruit industry which has grown up lately with the old country, and which has brought $100,000 into our Province."

I quite agree with my hon. colleague that the variety of our resources adds very much to the prosperity of our people. Then he added that the National Policy had nothing to do with our prosperity, because the National Policy did not make the crops. It has never been claimed for the National Policy that it did, but we claim that the National Policy gave life and vigor to our coal trade and expanded any manufactures which previously existed. My hon. colleague forgot to mention that the National Policy had enabled us to start cotton mills, woolen mills, glass and iron works, sugar refineries, and although these have not been all profitable to the investors, they have given remunerative employment to many of our people and thus created a home market for our farmers. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), in his very brilliant speech the other evening, and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) gave much and valuable information as to the prosperous condition of our farmers, which our fellow-countrymen will read with pleasure. Our ambition should be to try and increase the hum of the manufactories in order to benefit our farmers, and that is what Mr. Parnell is trying.

Mr. KENNY.

ing to do for Ireland. He simply wants to get in Ireland what we have in Nova Scotia, and that is varied employment for the people. He wants for Ireland what we have in Canada, a National Policy. As regards the Ontario farmers, which is a question I feel almost like apologising to the House for referring to, because it lies more with the residents of that Province to deal with it, my hon. colleague whom I am always happy to follow in any good example, took a very great interest in that question. He seemed to have become very much devoted to the interests of the Ontario farmers. Now, I hold in my hand a copy of a record sent to Congress from a delegation, held in Washington in January, 1887, of people interested in the shipping business of the United States. There were some 329 delegates present, and nearly every state and territory were represented. The memorial states the following:—

"The fact that the people of the United States are now producing so much more of the raw material from farm and mine, and such a superabundance of manufactured goods, that our own markets are glutted and stagnation thereby produced. Stagnation, experience has shown, is the parent of financial crisis, which brings ruin to the producing class of every community."

It is evident from these words that there is a superabundance of manufactured and agricultural products in the United States, and among these 329 delegates, not one conceived the bright idea of importing the superabundant products of Canada, but they said :

"Our best markets should be those of Central and South America, the West Indies and Australasia, from which we are practically excluded by the want of shipping."

Now, Sir, the Ontario farmers know they have to meet the competition of the American farmers in the English market, and they know that it is a very sharp, keen competition. What the Ontario farmers want, it seems to me—and I make the suggestion with all due respect—are more consumers, more customers for the produce, not more competitors at their own doors. Now, let us look at the condition of the farmers in the great State of New York. I am quite aware that it would not be fair to Ontario to institute a comparison between that Province and New England States. We all recognise that Ontario's wheat fields are of infinitely more value than agricultural districts in the New England States. What do we find as to the condition of the agriculturists in the State of New York? I will read from the report of the National Bureau of Agriculture, Washington, 1885, in regard to the condition of farmers in the State of New York. I do not know whether what I am about to read has come under the notice of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but to those who represent rural constituencies, and to the farmers of Ontario, I think this is a very important statement. This official document says :

"On the whole, farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago, and there are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgage, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which, on the average, is fully 30 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of the buildings and other improvements."

Now, I do not know, of my own knowledge, whether such a condition of things prevails in the Province of Ontario, but that is the condition of things in the State of New York, and for the information of hon. gentlemen on both sides I have given them the authority from which I have quoted that. Now, as regards the agricultural districts of the New England States, their population has only increased 9 per cent. in 30 years, as compared with an increase of 62 per cent. in the Maritime Provinces. I was exceedingly sorry that my hon. colleague could not make out a case without referring disparagingly to the city of Halifax. When indulging in his usual dreary, doleful, dismal secession wail, he told the Dominion, from his place in Parliament, that Halifax was fast going to decay, that property was depreciating in value and that large amounts of it were sold for taxes. I say that his attempt to disparage and belittle Halifax in the eyes of the country was unkind, ungenerous and unjust. I think Halifax deserved better treatment at his hands. The hon. gentleman has lived and prospered there for many years—it is my native place—we have both spent the happiest days of our lives there. All the dearest associations of our lives cluster round that old city. Surely we can say a kindly word of it in an assembly like this, in the presence especially of numbers of gentlemen who have never visited it. Those who have will bear it in kindly remembrance. I have noticed that the most lugubrious of the hon. gentlemen opposite generally had a cheery word for his own constituency, for his own home. What hope can there be for a city, when her own sons speak so gloomily of her as the hon. gentleman has spoken of Halifax? Is the hon. gentleman's argument so weak that in this broad Canadian land, he could not find ample illustration of it, without dragging in dear old Halifax? I can not deny that property is depreciated, and very seriously depreciated in Halifax. Real estate in London and in New York is depreciated. There has been a great shrinkage in values, and it has been very great at Halifax. I find that the assessed value of property in 1876 was $11,943,832, and in 1886 was $14,578,930. To the latter figures could be added factories which escape assessment at present, which might make the total increase in the past ten years to be $3,000,000. I do not say that that is anything to boast about, but I will say that the condition of things would be much worse in Halifax, if we had not, subsequent to the date named by the hon. gentleman, started some factories. These factories may not have been very profitable to the shareholders, but they gave remunerative employment to a number of our people. The wholesale trade of Canada has been disturbed. That that is a matter on which I can speak freely, and in that respect Confederation has been of no advantage to Halifax, because it disturbed the distributing trade of Halifax. Previous to that time, Halifax supplied the Province of Nova Scotia and portions of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick with the imported goods which the people of those districts required. These goods paid tribute when they passed through Halifax; but when we had Confederation we immediately let in upon us the keen competition of the cities of Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and the neighboring city of St. John; and in a small community and a small market, you will recognise that that had a very depressing effect, and consequently, our trade has been very much diminished in that respect. I do not hesitate to say that Confederation has had that effect upon the city of Halifax. The steamboats and railways have, of course, distributed trade. I listened attentively to the hon. member for South Oxford, in the very able speech which he made in introducing his resolution the other evening, and in referring to the distributing trade of Canada, and the probable effect of the change proposed, he said that no great political change of this kind would be wrought without some disturbing element. Now, Sir, I recognise the existence of these distributing elements in Halifax in consequence of Confederation, and I would advise Canadians to be very cautious and careful, that the disturbing influences do not prevail when you allow your markets to be inundated by the products of American warehouses and packages. I am not going to express an opinion as to whether that is in the true interest of the people of Canada, but I know from experience that such will be the result. As it was in Halifax at Confederation, so it will be in Canadian cities and distributing centres, places like Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, &c., as soon as you remove the Customs barriers. Now, Sir, my hon. colleague has gone into the condition of Nova Scotia; he has undertaken to give us, with all the authority of a member of Parliament speaking to his colleagues in this assembly, the general condition of affairs in Nova Scotia, which was made in a letter written by a gentleman in Halifax some years ago, and the letter is given as to the condition of Nova Scotia. This is the best authority the hon. gentleman can give us. He quotes Mr. Thompson, a personal friend of mine, a gentleman for whom I have very great respect and esteem; he quotes him as saying that some counties in Nova Scotia are suffering from depression in trade, and that the value of property there is infinitely less than it was some time ago. Now, what caused this depression in the value of property in Nova Scotia? I think the hon. gentleman ought to have told us. It may be that he meant us to infer that this great depression to which Mr. Thompson makes reference, was caused by the policy of the present Government; evidently his object was to convey that impression. Now, the only authority we have had quoted here on this point, is Mr. Thompson. I will read again the last portion of his letter which the hon. gentleman quoted:

"Taking four leading counties, representing the four of our leading industries,—Cape Breton as representing the coal mining interest; Antigonish as representing the farming interest; Hants as representing the ship-building interest, and Queen's as representing the lumbering interest, and we will find that the assessment rolls amounted in 1868 to $11,316,000, while in 1884—at the time he was writing—they had decreased to less than $8,000,000."

Now, it was the tariff, and what tariff? and who says it was the tariff? Why, Sir, Mr. James Thompson says it is the tariff, the same Mr. James Thompson who has been quoted here to the Parliament of Canada as an authority on the present condition of Nova Scotia. If Mr. James Thompson is an authority as to the condition of Canada, he is equally an authority as to the cause of that condition. Mr. James Thompson tells us it is the tariff. I have his letter in my hands, and it bears date July 19, 1878. He said it was the tariff, and it was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; that policy was supported by the senior member for Halifax. It was the tariff of the Government of which he was a member, that caused that depression in these counties, and for that I give Mr. James Thompson as my authority. Now, Sir, as Mr. James Thompson has become historical in this matter, it is only fair to you that I should tell you the circumstances under which this letter was written. It is addressed to the electors of the county of Halifax. He said in that address:

"The time is now rapidly approaching when you will be required to elect members for the Dominion Legislature, and in order that you may be better prepared to perform that duty, let me place a few facts before you."

Remember this authority is recognised by the senior member for Halifax, who quotes him in this Legislature. Mr. Thompson goes on to say:

"I think, however, you will agree with me that we ought, in the first place, to look to our own interests."

The interests of Nova Scotia.

"We must not follow leaders, but measures. We must not support Mackenzie because he is a representative of the Grit party, nor Macdonald because he is the representative of the Liberal Conservative party; but support that party, whatever its name, which will best promote the interests of the Dominion, and which will give us that justice which has so long been denied."

That is the justice which the Grit Government had denied to the Province of Nova Scotia, and this is simply verifying the words of the late Mr. Power which in the previous portion of my argument I quoted to you.

"The question which most affects us is the tariff. Shall there be a revision of the tariff or not? That is the question to be determined at the polls. It is not a question of protection or no. Neither of the opposing parties are free traders. Macdonald preaches a protective policy, but Mackenzie puts it in practice."

Then the writer, referring to the condition of Nova Scotia, says:

"In other words, every laboring man is compelled to give one day's labor out of ten to support the Government."

Now, we were told the other day that the present tariff presses enormously upon the poor man and adds to the poor man's sufferings. Listen to what the best authority that can be quoted from Nova Scotia says as to the tariff which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) supported:

"The articles used by the poor man, by the present tariff pay as much and in many cases far more than those used by the wealthy. Silks and satins pay no more than woollens and cottons. The tea used by the wealthy manufacturer of Ontario pays about 10 per cent., while that used by our poor fishermen pays between 30 and 35 per cent. Out of every ten pounds of tea the former uses, the Government takes one, while out of every four pounds the latter purchases, the same Government extracts one pound. The cigars smoked by the millionaire at the bank ball pay only 30 per cent., while the tobacco smoked by the poor fisherman on the Banks of Newfoundland pays 200 per cent. The wine consumed by the rich merchant pays less than 20 per cent., while the rum drunk by the poor laborer of this Province pays more than 350 per cent. For every dollar's worth of wine imported for the wealthy, the Government gets 20 cents; while it makes the poor man pay $3.50 for every dollar's worth of rum imported for him.

"Is it surprising that the more lightly taxed manufacturers of Ontario can send down their goods and under-sell the highly-taxed people of this Province?

"Is it astonishing that with a tariff constructed to enable the grocers of Toronto to import from New York, that our West India trade should languish, that our coopers should lack employment, our fishermen customers, and our ships return empty to this port after having deposited their cargoes at that great emporium of the United States?

"With these figures before you, taken from the public records, I call upon you to exercise your franchise in favor of the party which will so adjust the tariff as will make it fair and equitable in its operation. The present Government have not listened to our reasonable demand, but have refused to make any amendment. Let us try another, and let us be careful in the selection of our representatives to choose men who will not hesitate to abandon any Government that will not do us justice."

And we followed Mr. Thompson's advice, and we were exceedingly careful in the selection of the representatives, and refused to send the senior member for Halifax back to this House. As regards the city of Halifax I have a memorandum or statement of its population. The population of Halifax in 1860 was 25,000; in 1870, 29,000; in 1880, 36,000. I have already given the House a statement of the deposits in the savings banks in 1876, when we went into Confederation. The deposits in the chartered banks at that time were $2,209,873; to-day the amount is $3,818,763. The tonnage entered at Halifax has increased between 1866 and 1887 by 307,735 tons. I find we are dealing not only with Halifax but with the general condition of the Province of Nova Scotia, and therefore I may say that the exports of Nova Scotia in 1868 were of the value of $4,563,369; in 1887 they were of the value of $8,561,425 or very nearly double. The tonnage entered inward and outward in Nova Scotia has increased from 1867, when it was 440,382 tons, by 2,911,681 tons. I do not wish to exaggerate the condition of things in Nova Scotia, or in the city of Halifax. I admit that depreciation of real estate exists, and I admit that far more of our people are leaving than we like to see; but I say, as a public man, that it is not fair, it is not in the public interest, that these defamatory statements of the condition of our own country and our own cities should go abroad, and therefore it is that I have gone to some trouble to gather the statistics. I fear that in doing so I have trespassed very much on the time and attention of this House. We have also had a bid made for the shipbuilders and shipowners. I was told last year, when I attempted to talk about sugar, that I was talking about a business in which I was not personally engaged and in which I had no personal interest, and that I had better not say anything about it. That is a dangerous doctrine for hon. gentlemen to lay down, because it is the duty of a public man to discuss every phase of business and every branch of industry which in any way concerns the country, and to bring to Parliament the best information he can gather on the topic. I find in the heroic efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to obtain support for this heroic remedy that a bid has been made for the support of the shipbuilders and shipowners of the Lower Provinces by telling the people that if they would only vote for hon. gentlemen opposite the coasting trade of the United States would certainly be opened to them. Every man who owns a ton of shipping would be very glad to see such a happy state of affairs; we in Nova Scotia would be very much delighted indeed to see it. We have had reciprocity treaties before, we have had hon. gentlemen advocating reciprocity before, but they never thought until now of the shipbuilders and shipowners. I do not consider it fair to put this question before the people of the Lower Provinces in such a manner as to lead them to suppose that the shipping interests of the United States were in a so much more prosperous condition than our own, but we, on that account, should risk any change which under any circumstances a customs' union must involve. I think, if I catch the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, that more than one hon. gentleman has told us that the condition of our shipping is infinitely worse than that of the United States. I may say as regards the shipping industry, that there is no industry in the Lower Provinces which of late years has suffered so much from depression as that of shipbuilding, and when I listen to the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), to which I have referred before, of the value of our fisheries, and when we reflect upon what had been the value of the shipping industry, I come to the conclusion that we should be about the most wealthy people in the world. Gentlemen who reside in the western portions of this Dominion can have no conception of the extent of our shipping industry of a few years ago. Nova Scotia per capita was the largest shipowning country in the world. We not only built our ships, Sir, but we manned them, and we sailed them and their earnings came home to enrich Canada. It was an export trade and all the world contributed to it. Our freight was carried from one part of the earth to the other, and the earnings, large in those days, came back to enrich our own country. The value of that industry, Sir, I am happy to say, was recognised by the present Government, and as a shipowner I thank them for that recognition of that important industry. When those hon. gentlemen who profess so much interest for the shipowners came down to Nova Scotia and talked to us as regards what they were going to do for us I advised my fellow countrymen to ask them what had they done for us when they were in a position to do anything for us—when they were in a position of power in this country. I would advise them to judge them by their acts and not by their words; and they have come to the same conclusion as I have, that they have done absolutely nothing for us, but that they have rather clogged the wheels of progress than helped us in every branch of industry. I regret to say that this great shipping industry of the lower Provinces has almost virtually ceased. That has been caused by the improvement in steam and the much cheaper steamships which are made and built on the Clyde, and also by the iron sailing ships. We, who wish to continue in the business, have discovered that the iron sailing ship is a more profitable investment than our wooden ships, and it is very unfortunate for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that stagnation prevails in this industry. I am sometimes astonished, Sir, that considering the great depression which exists in the shipbuilding trade, or rather the shipowning trade, for shipbuilding is nearly extinct, that more depression does not prevail in both the Province of New Brunswick and the Province of Nova Scotia. Those wooden ships, Sir, become, instead of a source of profit to their owners, an actual source of loss, and loss has been involved in sailing them. Now, Sir, let me look for a moment at the condition of the shipbuilding industry of the United States to which our attention has been invited. Those are the figures, and, gentlemen, they are remarkable figures:

SAILING VESSELS.

|--|-----------|
| Atlantic coast sailing vessels, 1874 | 2,096,842 |
| do do 1887 | 1,685,070 |

Decrease 431,772

|--|-----------|
| Coasting tonnage vessels enrolled and licensed, 1874 | 3,293,439 |
| do do do 1887 | 3,010,735 |

|-----------------------------------|-----------|
| Total sailing tonnage, 1874 | 3,615,042 |
| do do 1887 | 2,563,128 |

Decrease 1,051,914

Or, in other words, a decrease of $ 5,000,000

The coasting tonnage of Nova Scotia taking the arrivals and departures has nearly doubled. For Maine, once foremost in shipbuilding:

| | |
|---|--------|
| In 1877 the new tonnages measured | 76,308 |
| In 1886 do do | 15,024 |

Or a difference of value of $ 2,500,000

I can speak positively, Sir, and I believe that there are few vessels on the docks in Maine, but whilst that has been going on in Maine and the United States, there has also been a decrease in tonnage in the Maritime Provinces. The total tonnage of sailing and steam has decreased in the Maritime Provinces from 1878 to 1885 by 25,190 tons or about 33.7 per cent. Well, Sir, let us look at what the Boston Herald says about the Maine shipbuilding. The Boston Herald of 9th September, 1887, says:

"DECLINE IN AMERICAN SHIPPING.

"To-day a desolation of the sort which Charles Lamb noted at the South Sea House, and which he likened to the desolation at Balclutha reigns over the ship yards of Bath where 10,000 men once toiled without ceasing, and another 10,000 delved and toiled in turn for them, there is now but scant employment for a slim 1,000. Thirty years ago, along the front of Ancient Bath alone, the frames and forms of barques and brigs, and sloops and schooners and full-rigged ships and wooden steamers literally fringed the river bank for three miles. Now, only the memories of these stately hulls that sailed away are left to Bath. Where giant crafts were put together and yards were alive with industry, grass grows now; piles rot away, neglected wharves fall slowly to decay, or in some instances have become vegetable gardens, or well trimmed lawns. The old sheds and shops black and feeble and betraying, in their aged leanness, every rafter bone in their bodies drop gradually to pieces among the ghosts of shipping and the graves of stocks. Thirty years ago the ships of Bath sailed into every port in every clime. Wherever ships were gathered together, the masts of Bath carried the Stars and Stripes. Thirty years ago the yards of Bath launched half a hundred full-rigged ships in a twelve month. In the last two years they have not launched one, nor built one, nor planned one. Nor is there at the present time, within the wide borders of the United States, a single full-rigged ship in course of construction."

Now, Sir, I think that when hon. gentlemen compare the condition of our shipping, depressed as it is, depreciated in value as it is, they will recognise that we have not a great deal to find fault with as regards our inter-provincial trade. We are told, Sir, with great rejoicing by hon. gentlemen opposite, that we have no inter-provincial trade. We have not such an inter-provincial trade as I would like to see, but it is growing and will steadily increase. We often forget in discussing this question that we have only had 20 years of national life, and how short is 20 years in the life of a nation. I remember the early days of Confederation when gentlemen had to come to this Parliament and discharge their duties for the Lower Provinces, they had to take the steamer at Halifax and make the voyage to New York, then travel across the State of New York by the Suspension Bridge, or some other road, and then get around to Prescott Junction for Ottawa. That usually occupied six or seven days. At that same period of time, Sir, the railroads existing in Nova Scotia could only carry one 60 miles from Halifax. As hon. gentlemen know we now come here from Halifax in two days, and I am informed that when the Short Line Railroad will be built next year we will be able to make the journey in one day. When the journey is shortened to one day, I hope, Sir, that we will have the pleasure of seeing some of our friends from Ontario down there. They will find that we have not such a bad country; that we are not such a bad people as would appear from the remarks of some hon. gentlemen; they will find that we are not "arrant fools," nor "sneaks," nor "cowards," nor "flunkies." Now, Sir, we cannot only travel from Ottawa with some comfort, and ease, and expedition, but, to-day, we can go from Halifax, on the Atlantic, to Vancouver on the Pacific, and all through Canada's territory. Is not this progress? I do hon. gentlemen opposite—some of them at least—the justice to say that I have had some conversation with them, that they agreed that the construction of that great Canadian enterprise, that magnificent railroad which has raised us so much in the estimation of our neighbors as well as of the whole British public, that that road should be to us all Canadians a source of national pride. And after all, there never was a great work so persecuted for party purposes as that very road has been. Now, I would say to hon. gentlemen who are ever grumbling about our inter-provincial trade: Remember our short national existence; give us a chance; we are still in our national youth; we still need some care and consideration; do not drive us from the paternal roof; do not turn us over to strangers; do not be guilty of the horrible crime of strangling your own progeny. Why, Mr. Wiman, the father of the fad, never abuses Canada; and if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to follow him, cannot they take that example from him, and occasionally say a kind word for their country? It was only 17 years ago that our currencies were assimilated. Have we no inter-provincial trade? The senior member for Halifax told us that the Maritime Provinces send to Ontario $10,000,000 to pay for goods. Well, Sir, that may be true or it may not. Ask the Halifax and Moncton sugar refiners how long they could work without the markets of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba; ask the cotton manufacturers of St. John, Windsor, Moncton and Halifax where they sell the major part of their products, and they will tell you in the Upper Provinces. The products of our iron works and of our coal mines go largely to Ontario and Quebec. They say we have no interprovincial trade because Ontario and Quebec do not take our fish, and we do not take all their surplus produce. Would any American statesman who values his reputation say that because Pennsylvania supplies Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire with coal, and because Pennsylvania does not take because she does not require the surplus agricultural productions of those States, therefore there is no inter-state trade between them, and God and nature has decreed that it is impossible for them to live under the same policy and the same flag? No American legislator would make such a statement as that. Sir, it is surprising that we have accomplished so much. If the doctrine of natural trade, arises from contiguity of territory, were universally adopted, there would be no stability in the frontiers of the nations; every nation whose territory is coterminous with that of another would find a natural trade strangled by the national tariffs, and a rearrangement of the boundaries would be necessary. With regard to the mission of the Intercolonial Railway I expressed my views last year, and I have only to say that I cordially concur in what the hon. member for St. John has said on that subject. As regards the effects of the proposed policy, a gentleman who occupies a seat in the other end of this building tells us, in a Toronto newspaper of 20th May, 1887, that we have invested in manufactures $104,000,000, and that a customs union would mean a depreciation to the extent of 33 per cent. in the value of that property. Now, Sir, is that desirable in the interests of Canada? That is not my individual opinion, but it is that of a gentleman much better informed than I am. But I know that one of the largest boot and shoe manufacturers in the Lower Provinces has stated that if we had commercial union he would have to close his manufactory in 24 hours; and other large manufacturers have expressed themselves in similar terms. Is it wise to run the risk of destroying all these industries, which are giving employment to our people and adding so much to our wealth, and drive them to seek in a foreign state that protection which a change of policy might deprive them of in their own? Our sugar refineries would be imperilled. There is no industry in the country which so promotes our shipping, and, consequently, our trade with the West Indies. I have shown that 66 per cent. of the whole imports would go to New York under commercial union, which would drive the distributing centres of Canada into that city. I fear that commercial union would simply mean building up the cities of the United States at the cost of our own. I may be wrong. When the question comes before Parliament, I shall be prepared to discuss it on its merits. But this far I am satisfied, that under that system Canada would become the slaughter market of the American manufacturers. Of that I have had personal experience. I remember being in New York some years ago, and wanting to purchase some goods of a certain class, I called on a firm of bankers, one of whom was formerly in that business, Mr. George Bliss. He gave me the names of certain firms from whom I could make my purchases, saying: "You must tell them you want the goods for Canada." I replied, with natural diffidence, that I was a very small purchaser. He said: "If you will only tell them you want the goods for Canada, you will get them cheaper than A. T. Stewart or Claflin could buy them." He went on to tell me that while the manufacturers would not break their prices in their own territory, they would slaughter their productions in Canada. Now, any man who has any knowledge of the dry goods business knows that for continental goods, French, Swiss and German goods, New York is the great slaughter market, and that you can actually buy those goods there at auction for infinitely less money than you could import them for in any regular business channel. Under commercial union Canada would be made the slaughter market for those goods, and I am quite certain it would mean the depreciation and almost the destruction of the distribution trade of Montreal. It would be for the people of Canada to decide whether Montreal should be sacrificed to the country or not. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution told us that England had not a friend in the world, that she was torn by internal dissension and menaced by foreign aggression, and gave that as reason for our voting for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. This language recalled to my mind, the days when, as a boy at school, I committed to memory, that grand speech of Lord Chatham, when chiding his brother peers, for their outrageous conduct in arraying in arms against them their fellow countrymen at this side of the Atlantic—that most stupendous act of folly recorded on the pages of history—Lord Chatham told the House of Lords, that that unnatural war had so robbed England of her prestige, that none amongst the nations of the world were so poor as to do her reverence. I suppose the hon. gentleman who made this statement had some such words ringing in his memory. Sir, I recognise with the hon. gentlemen the domestic difficulties of Great Britain, I will go further and express my individual opinion, that Ireland has not been treated fairly or justly, but, now, that the great masses of the English people are aroused to a sense of the injustice that country has so long and so patiently labored under, I believe that the remedy will be swift and sure. I pray it may be so.

Mr. KENNY.

Ireland's wrongs, once righted, none will be more true to England than Ireland's sons, and we shall see in England, what we Canadians all wish for, a united, happy and prosperous people, and England will be in the future the beacon of justice and freedom for the world. I think, Sir, we need not give ourselves any anxiety for England's future. Since Lord Chatham spoke so many years ago, we know what her career has been, and now that the Canadian statesman who moved this resolution has spoken, I do not think we need be so much alarmed. I am sure, Sir, that her statesmen, wise in council and prudent in action, will be in the future, as they are to-day, ready, willing, anxious, to unite the great English-speaking peoples in the closest ties of friendship. The reference made by the hon. member for South Oxford reminds me, too, that no people in the world have ever suffered more for creed or for country than have Irishmen. Nowhere is all that Irishmen love most dearly, their religion and its clergy, more revered and respected than in this Canadian land, and the status of the Irish race is infinitely superior in Canada, to that of their fellow-countryman across the border, and any political change would mar that happy state of things. I cannot wish better for Ireland, than that her position may become like unto ours, and that when she acquires her own local self-government, she may also be enabled to inaugurate some system, by bounty or otherwise, whereby she too may have a National Policy as we have, which will enable her to employ some of her population in manufacturing, and not be solely dependent upon one industry, so that like us, with varied industries, the farmers' best market will be the home market. I repeat, Sir, that I am in favor of a reciprocity treaty with the United States, one that may be fair, and honorable, and mutually advantageous. I believe that the Government of this country is desirous of making such an arrangement, and that the matter should remain untrammelled in their hands. But I will say this, owing to the changed condition of the two countries, owing to the greater development in the larger country and its keen competition in the products of the soil, and still keener competition in manufacturing pursuits, great care and caution must be exercised in framing such a treaty, and I do not believe, if we had the old reciprocity in force to-day, it would be as great a financial advantage to Canada as it was formerly, because the condition of things has very much changed. Believing, from the oft-quoted utterances, that the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite is not calculated to benefit the cause of reciprocity, I shall not vote for the resolution nor for the amendment of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). And further, Sir, I say this from my place in Parliament, that if the negotiations so cordially opened between Mr. Bayard and Sir Charles Tupper do not come to a successful issue, I shall hold this agitation responsible for the failure. I have considered this question from the standpoint of a Canadian, as I feel it my duty to consider all questions that come before me; and as regards sentiment, I must plead guilty to being subject to its influence and to having that share of it which I believe every Irishman possesses. It cannot be said that I have not been guilty of taking up your time, but I think you will admit that I have not been guilty of any sentimental gush. I will simply say that I was born under the British flag, that I have lived happily under it, that I believe the Canadian people are as happy to-day under it as any people in the world, and that I believe we enjoy as great a measure of civil and religious liberty and as full protection for life and property as any people in the world. I do hope that under any circumstances no political change will be brought about, and I will do hon. gentlemen opposite the justice to say that I believe a large number of them, in their hearts, do not desire a change. In conclusion I may say, again, I very much fear the agitation they have inaugurated will retard rather than advance the cause of reciprocity.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I stated yesterday that the report which I read of an interviewer's conversation with the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), was taken from the Sarina Observer, the organ of that hon. gentleman. I find that I unintentionally made an error as to the newspaper in which the report appeared. I should have said it appeared in the Sarnia Canadian, of the 20th July last, not the organ of the hon. member, and an abstract from the Detroit Evening News.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright, the amendment thereto by Mr. Foster, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Jones (Halifax):

M. BEAUSOLEIL: M. l'Orateur, rien que l'importance de la question qui est maintenant sous la considération de cette honorable Chambre peut m'induire à prendre la parole après avoir entendu la discussion savante et approfondie qui en a été faite.

Mais, M. l'Orateur, il s'agit, dans le moment, d'une mesure qui intéresse non-seulement la prospérité actuelle, mais encore la destinée future de toute la moitié d'un continent. Il s'agit, dans ce moment, de savoir si le Canada va rester stationnaire ou continuer les progrès peu rapides qu'il a faits jusqu'aujourd'hui, ou s'il va prendre son essor et rivaliser avec la république voisine.

Je désire dire de suite que je n'ai pas l'intention de faire, sur cette question, un discours de partisan, ni d'en faire une question de parti. La question est bien au-dessus des partis puisqu'elle intéresse le présent et l'avenir de tout un peuple.

Un fait, M. l'Orateur, qui doit frapper ceux qui s'occupent des affaires publiques, c'est que l'agriculture, qui est la première ressource d'un pays, n'est pas prospère, au moins dans la province de Québec. Je n'ai pas l'intention de parler de l'état de choses qui existe dans les autres provinces, mais je sais, et il est de mon devoir de dire ce qu'il en est pour ce qui concerne la province de Québec, dont j'ai l'honneur d'être un des représentants dans cette Chambre.

Si vous parcourez les comtés en dehors de Montréal, si vous parcourez nos paroisses, vous verrez dans tous les rangs des maisons vacantes parce que des familles entières sont parties pour les Etats-Unis, un par un d'abord et des familles entières ensuite. Dans le comté de Berthier que j'ai l'honneur de représenter, et qui est certainement l'un des plus riches de la province de Québec, il y a des paroisses où un quart des propriétaires sont absents aux Etats-Unis avec leurs familles et dont les noms sont encore portés sur les listes des élections, et qui n'y sont pas lorsque le moment du vote arrive. Et cela, M. l'Orateur, ne représente pas la moitié de l'émigration qui s'est faite dans nos campagnes, parce que en outre de ceux qui ont laissé leurs propriétés vacantes mais encore en leur nom il y a tous ceux qui en ont disposé avant de partir, et qui sont occupées par d'autres. On m'a informé que le nombre de ceux qui ont vendu leurs propriétés avant de laisser le pays est au moins le double de ceux qui les ont gardées en leur nom pour aller gagner leur vie et la vie de leurs familles aux Etats-Unis.

Cependant, M. l'Orateur, ce serait une grande erreur de prétendre que la province de Québec n'offre pas à l'agriculture toutes les ressources désirables. Le sol est fertile, les terres sont susceptibles d'être labourées et de produire amplement. On compte par millions d'acres nos terres publiques qui sont arpentées et non encore occupées. Il y a place pour plusieurs millions de population additionnelle.

Je ne dirai pas que la province de Québec ne progresse pas, car elle progresse lentement si vous le voulez, mais elle progresse; mais il est incontestable que le progrès n'est pas en proportion de ce qu'il devrait être.

Quelle est la raison de cet état de choses? Il n'y en a qu'une seule. Si le sol est fertile et propre à la culture, si le climat est sain et la population vigoureuse, c'est donc que nous n'avons pas un marché convenable pour le surplus de nos produits.

En Canada, M. l'Orateur, nous savons qu'il n'existe pas de restriction à la disposition du surplus de nos produits. Nous savons également qu'il n'y a pas de restriction sur l'exportation en Angleterre de nos produits agricoles, mais il en existe aux Etats-Unis. Et si le marché anglais n'est pas plus favorable, c'est parce que les profits de l'agriculteur sont complètement absorbés par les frais de voyage, par le fret et l'assurance, et que lorsque nos grains sont rendus en Angleterre, ils entrent en concurrence avec ceux des Etats de l'ouest et ceux des Etats de l'Europe, de la Turquie, de la Russie, de l'Egypte et d'ailleurs.

A côté de nous, M. l'Orateur, nous avons un peuple de 60,000,000 d'âmes qui absorbe déjà une grande partie de notre surplus, mais les frais de transport y sont remplacés par des droits très élevés qui opèrent non moins désavantageusement à l'égard de l'agriculture.

Voici une liste de quelques-uns des produits agricoles que nous expédions aux Etats-Unis. Et si vous comparez le montant total de l'exportation de ces produits avec l'exportation aux Etats-Unis, vous vous apercevrez que ceux-ci en absorbent de 92 à 95 pour cent:

| Articles. | Montant exporté aux Etats-Unis. | Montant total de l'exportation. |
|----------------|------------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Orge..... | $5,245,968 | $5,277,889 |
| Chevreaux..... | 2,214,338 | 2,350,926 |
| Œufs..... | 1,821,364 | 1,825,559 |
| Moutons..... | 974,482 | 1,595,340 |
| Foin..... | 670,749 | 743,396 |
| Patates..... | 328,652 | 439,206 |
| Laine..... | 288,251 | 317,250 |
| Fèves..... | 206,617 | 207,402 |
| Malt..... | 146,012 | 146,012 |
| Volailles..... | 98,919 | 107,909 |
| Lin..... | 78,422 | 78,422 |
| Légumes..... | 75,517 | 83,639 |
| | $12,149,291 | $13,162,950 |

Ainsi, sur douze articles de productions agricoles, dont nous avons exporté pour $13,162,950, les Etats-Unis en ont acheté pour $12,149,291, ne laissant au reste de l'univers que $1,013,659. C'est-à-dire que les Etats-Unis absorbent 92 pour 100 de notre surplus.

Faisons disparaître cette barrière douanière; abolissons ces droits qui absorbent de 20 à 40 pour 100 de la valeur des marchandises, et de suite nous augmenterons d'autant la valeur de ces produits dans ce pays, parce que le surplus que nous exportons aux Etats-Unis n'est qu'une goutte d'eau dans la mer comparée à la consommation des Etats-Unis et conséquemment ne peut en affecter les prix.

Si donc l'abolition des droits ne faisait pas baisser les prix aux Etats-Unis, ce serait nos cultivateurs qui en profiteraient et qui ajouteraient aux minces profits qu'ils réalisent aujourd'hui le montant des droits qu'ils sont obligés de payer. Ces droits, dans le cas de certains articles équivalent à un tiers ou 40 pour 100 de leur valeur. Ainsi, dans le cours de l'été dernier nous pouvions acheter le foin dans le comté de Berthier, qui est l'un des comtés qui en produisent le plus et du meilleur, pour $6 la tonne. Le droit sur le foin aux Etats-Unis est de $2 par tonne. Voilà donc 33 pour 100 du produit des terres dans le comté de Berthier —et il y a beaucoup d'autres comtés dans la même position —absorbés par les droits américains. Sur l'orge il y a un droit de 10 cents par minot. Nous en exportons pour cinq millions et demi. Voilà encore $550,000 pris sur la production du pays avant d'arriver sur le marché américain. Il en est de même de beaucoup d'autres articles; avant que nos cultivateurs puissent placer une seule parcelle du surplus de leurs productions, ils sont obligés de prendre un tiers ou un quart et de le déposer dans le trésor des Etats-Unis.

Encore une fois, M. l'Orateur, si ces droits de douane étaient abolis, nous verrions aujourd'hui ce que nous avons vu en 1854, lorsque l'ancien traité de réciprocité a été conclu. Durant l'année 1853, la province unie du Canada, c'est-à-dire le Haut et le Bas-Canada, avait exporté aux Etats-Unis :

|---------------------------------|-----------|
| Animaux et leurs produits | 966,196 |
| Produits agricoles..... | 3,281,092 |
| En tout | 4,247,288 |

Douze ans après, c'est-à-dire durant l'année expirée le 30 juin 1866, les deux mêmes provinces avaient exporté aux Etats-Unis :

|---------------------------------|------------|
| Animaux et leurs produits | 11,184,741 |
| Produits agricoles..... | 13,298,008 |
| En tout | 24,482,749 |
| | 4,247,288 |
| Augmentation en 12 ans de..... | 20,025,461 |

soit près de 500 pour cent.

Les résultats désastreux pour l'agriculture de l'abrogation du traité de réciprocité ne tardèrent pas à se faire sentir. Dès l'année suivante, c'est-à-dire dès l'année fiscale expirée le 30 juin 1867, nos exportations aux Etats-Unis accusaient les réductions suivantes :

| | 1866. | 1867. | Réduction. |
|-----------------------------|------------|------------|------------|
| Animaux et leurs produits.. | 11,184,741 | 3,686,191 | 7,498,550 |
| Produits agricoles..... | 13,298,008 | 11,185,227 | 2,112,781 |
| | 24,482,749 | 14,871,418 | 9,611,331 |
| | 14,871,418 | | |
| | 9,611,331 | | |

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, si l'on veut prétendre que ceci est une progression naturelle et qu'elle se serait produite sans la réciprocité, j'attirerais l'attention de la Chambre sur le fait qu'en 1867, l'année qui a suivi l'abrogation du traité de réciprocité, nos exportations des produits agricoles et de produits de la ferme accusent la différence suivante : Nous avons exporté comme je viens de la dire en 1866 pour $11,184,741 d'animaux et pour $13,293,008 de produits agricoles, en tout $24,482,749. En 1867 nous avons exporté pour $3,686,191 d'animaux et leurs produits, soit une réduction de $7,498,550, et en produits agricoles $11,185,227, soit une réduction nouvelle de $2,112,781, ou une réduction totale de $9,611,331 sur ces deux classes de produits seulement en une seule année.

En 1866, nos exportations totales aux Etats-Unis, abstraction faite du numéraire, s'étaient élevées à $34,770,261, en 1867, elles tombaient à $23,859,034, accusant une réduction de $10,911,177.

Bien plus, après vingt ans du régime de l'exclusion, après avoir dépensé tant de millions pour faciliter les relations commerciales, nous trouvons que les exportations des provinces d'Ontario et Québec aux Etats-Unis sont moins considérables qu'elles ne l'étaient en 1866, ainsi que le démontrent les chiffres suivants extraits du tableau du commerce du Canada pour l'année expirée le 30 juin 1887.

| Exportations aux Etats-Unis :—Ontario..... | $30,803,434 |
| “ “ Québec..... | 4,710,270 |
| Total | $35,513,704 |

|-------------------------------|--------------|
| Exportations en 1866 | $34,770,201 |
| Diminution après 21 ans | 9,256,547 |

Mais si nous prenons la Puissance entière; si nous ajoutons aux provinces d'Ontario et Québec, les cinq nouvelles provinces et les Territoires du Nord-Ouest, nous trouvons que nos exportations totales aux Etats-Unis sont encore inférieures à ce qu'étaient celles des deux provinces en 1866 :

|-----------------------------------|--------------|
| Exportations totales en 1866..... | $34,770,201 |
| “ “ 1887..... | 34,658,275 |

Depuis vingt et un ans, notre agriculture, en supposant qu'elle n'aurait pas fait de progrès depuis 1866—a donc perdu chaque année un commerce de plus de $9,000,000 avec les Etats-Unis, soit $190,000,000 depuis que la réciprocité a été abolie. Mais il est clair que la perte a été bien plus considérable, puisque notre agriculture aurait continué de progresser comme elle le faisait depuis douze ans.

Il est donc établi que le marché américain est le marché naturel de l'agriculteur canadien; que notre agriculture se développe et prospère avec la réciprocité, tandis qu'elle dépérit et s'appauvrit avec le système d'exclusion adopté et maintenu par les deux pays depuis 1866.

Maintenant, je crois qu'il n'y a pas de divergence d'opinion, ni dans la Chambre, ni dans le pays, sur les avantages qui résulteraient d'un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis quant à ce qui concerne nos produits naturels ou agricoles.

Mais il y a deux matières d'envisager la chose. Il y a une manière effective et pratique d'être en faveur de la réciprocité et une qui ne l'est pas. Assurément nous ne pouvons pas nous présenter devant le Congrès américain et lui dire : Nous avons tout intérêt à ce que nos produits agricoles entrent chez vous, et nous vous demandons de nous accorder la réciprocité pour eux; mais nous n'avons rien à vous offrir en retour. Nous ne pouvons pas demander aux Américains de faire avec nous un marché de dupes. Si nous faisons une telle démarche, nous ne réussirions pas. Nous devons nous présenter à eux les mains pleines afin d'obtenir en retour les avantages dont nous avons besoin. En effet, les Etats-Unis nous disent : “ Nous avons déjà refusé de vous accorder un traité de réciprocité pour les produits naturels seulement; nous avions un traité semblable et nous n'avons pas voulu le renouveler lorsqu'il a pris fin. Nous sommes prêts à faire un nouveau traité avec vous, mais à la condition qu'il embrasse aussi la réciprocité dans les produits manufacturés.

Puis on essaie de faire croire à la Chambre et au pays qu'il y a un antagonisme réel entre la réciprocité et la politique nationale. Or, M. l'Orateur, cette prétention est absolument fautive; un tel antagonisme n'existe pas. Je suis un de ceux qui croient dans la protection. Je l'ai prêchée pendant qu'un certain nombre de ceux qui y croient aujourd'hui prêchaient le libre échange. Dès qu'il m'a été permis d'étudier la situation économique du Canada, je me suis exprimé, et j'ai dit,—comme je le répète ce soir—que nous avions besoin de la protection pour créer une industrie nationale; que nous avions besoin de la protection pour développer nos ressources; que la protection nous était nécessaire pour devenir un grand peuple et un grand pays. Cela, je l'ai prêché en 1871 et 1872, sous le gouvernement conservateur et en 1875 sous le gouvernement libéral. Mes opinions n'ont pas changé. Mais, M. l'Orateur, cela veut-il dire que si nous avons le libre échange avec les Etats-Unis, nous ne pourrions avoir un tarif protecteur avec les autres pays qui, étant situés dans des conditions économiques différentes, pourraient détruire nos industries si nous leur ouvrons nos portes ? Assurément non.

Mais ne savons-nous pas que le Canada et les Etats-Unis sont dans les mêmes conditions économiques : que la main-d'œuvre est aussi chère aux Etats-Unis qu'ici ? Ne savons-nous pas encore, que la matière première est aussi abondante au Canada que chez nos voisins, et à meilleur marché ? N'avons-nous pas des pouvoirs d'eau innombrables et les plus puissants du monde ? Et nos mines, ne sont-elles pas d'une richesse extraordinaire ? Est-ce que nos forêts ne sont pas les plus belles de l'Amérique ? Enfin sous tous les rapports des ressources naturelles, ne sommes-nous pas les égaux sinon les supérieurs des Etats-Unis ? Si telle est notre situation, M. l'Orateur, je défie la contradiction de la part d'un cun membre de la droite. N'est-il pas évident que nous avons le moyen de faire face à la concurrence des Etats-Unis, que nous pouvons non-seulement maintenir notre terrain mais encore en gagner chez eux.

Il en serait autrement, M. l'Orateur, s'il s'agissait de l'Angleterre, de l'Allemagne ou de la France ou de la Belgique. Nous savons quels sont les salaires gagnés par les ouvriers en Europe. Nous savons ce qu'est le prolétariat européen. En Amérique les salaires sont élevés ; l'ouvrier peut gagner par son travail honorable la vie de lui-même et de sa famille. Nous ne pouvons donc pas mettre en concurrence le travail prolétaire de l'Europe avec le travail indépendant de l'Amérique. Voilà pourquoi nous pouvons avantageusement ouvrir nos portes aux Américains et pénétrer chez eux, tandis que nous ne pouvons pas les ouvrir à l'Europe. C'est pour cela que je prétends que nous devons maintenir le tarif protecteur en autant que l'Europe est concernée.

Il y a en outre une grande question qui demande une solution, et qui ne peut pas en trouver d'autre que la réciprocité complète avec les Etats-Unis.

L'adoption du tarif protecteur, en 1879, a eu pour résultat immédiat l'établissement de nombreuses et puissantes manufactures, dont la capacité productive dépasse de beaucoup les besoins de la consommation locale. Au bout de trois ou quatre ans seulement, la concurrence était devenue si active, la production si exagérée et les prix si réduits qu'il s'en est suivi une crise terrible qui a failli emporter la plupart des entreprises et des capitaux qui y avaient été placés.

Les compagnies se sont trouvées avec un marché surchargé, un surplus énorme de stock, sans aucune possibilité d'en disposer, même à sacrifice, sur aucun autre marché, et avec des engagements aux banques qu'elles ne pouvaient remplir.

Il leur fallut suspendre et supprimer les dividendes. La confiance publique fut tellement ébranlée, que des stocks qui avaient valu 125, 150 et 200 pour 100 tombèrent à 50, 40, 30 et même 10 pour cent, et à un moment donné, la ruine parut inévitable et certaine.

C'est de l'imminence du danger commun que sont nées les combinaisons entre fabricants pour diminuer la production et hausser les prix de manière à payer des dividendes sur un capital exagéré avec une production réduite. En sorte qu'aujourd'hui le public paie un prix excessif, hors de proportion avec le prix de revient pour les marchandises qu'il consomme.

C'est un état de choses anormal qui ne peut pas durer. Déjà l'opinion publique s'inquiète et s'agite ; déjà l'attention du Parlement a été attirée sur le sujet, et la motion de l'hon. député d'York-Ouest (M. Wallace), n'est que le premier murmure de la tempête.

Nous ne pouvons pas augmenter sensiblement la production industrielle du pays ; nous ne pouvons pas compter sur une consommation beaucoup plus considérable que celle que nous avons aujourd'hui. Nous sommes obligés déjà de réduire la production afin d'empêcher la ruine et l'extinction des manufactures. Conséquemment, il n'y a qu'un remède, et ce remède ce n'est pas dans le pays qu'il se trouve, c'est en dehors.

Certains députés de cette Chambre disaient hier : allons aux Indes Occidentales ; allons au Brésil chercher un marché pour nos produits. Mais, M. l'Orateur, pourquoi aller si loin pour trouver ce marché lorsqu'il y en a un si proche ? Quel avantage aurions-nous à aller au Brésil ou aux Indes Occidentales, lorsqu'à cinquante milles de Montréal nous pouvons trouver un marché beaucoup plus avantageux ; une population de 60,000,000 d'âmes et qui peut absorber non-seulement ce que nous produisons déjà mais ce que nous pourrions produire à l'avenir.

Je désire que quelques-uns des membres de l'autre côté de la Chambre répondent à cette simple question, puisqu'ils admettent et l'existence du mal et la nécessité d'y remédier.

Mais il y a un fait sur lequel l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur a voulu attirer l'attention de la Chambre, mais sur lequel il n'a pas beaucoup insisté ; il a prétendu que si nous obtenions la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis nous détruirions le commerce de transport du Saint-Laurent. Cette prétention est quelque chose d'étrange ; d'absolument extraordinaire, qu'aucun homme d'affaires de Montréal ou de Québec ou aucun membre de cette Chambre ne voudrait endosser. Depuis vingt-cinq ans le gouvernement dépense pour le creusement des canaux entre le lac Supérieur et le Saint-Laurent, des sommes considérables qui s'élèvent aujourd'hui probablement à vingt-cinq ou trente millions. Or, quel est le but de ces travaux ? C'est de créer une ligne de navigation, une ligne de transport entre les Etats de l'Ouest et la mer en passant par le Saint-Laurent. On n'a jamais considéré que ces sacrifices étaient trop considérables, et on est prêt à les continuer afin d'offrir au commerce de l'Ouest une route plus large et plus avantageuse en permettant à nos canaux d'admettre les vaisseaux du plus gros tonnage. On sait que le Nord-Ouest est le grenier de l'Amérique et de l'Europe et que le Saint-Laurent offre incontestablement la route la plus avantageuse et la plus courte pour transporter les produits de l'une sur les marchés de l'autre.

Eh bien ! en quoi, M. l'Orateur, l'abolition des droits sur l'importation des marchandises américaines pourrait-elle nuire à ce commerce de transport ? N'est-il pas évident qu'au lieu de voir les marchands américains envoyer leurs grains in bond à travers le Canada pour prendre les vaisseaux à Montréal ou à Québec, les marchands canadiens iraient acheter les grains américains et feraient le commerce à leur propre bénéfice. Qu'est-ce qui empêchera ce commerce de transport lorsque nous aurons une ligne libre, sans bonding system, sans embarras commerciaux, qui s'étendra depuis les Etats de l'Ouest à travers la grande ligne du Saint-Laurent jusqu'à Liverpool ? N'est-il pas évident plutôt qu'en rendant libre la route du Saint-Laurent on la fera servir non seulement à transporter en Angleterre les grains de l'Ouest, mais encore à distribuer dans l'Ouest des objets manufacturés dont ces immenses Etats agricoles ont besoin, et qu'on ouvrira ainsi à notre industrie un débouché immense que'elle pourrait aisément accaparer. Le prix du transport des grains pourrait ainsi être abaissé au minimum et en peu d'années s'établirait un échange également avantageux aux deux pays dont nous pouvons à peine nous faire une idée, et Montréal deviendrait la digne rivale de New-York.

Mais j'ai été singulièrement surpris d'entendre l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur (M. White) émettre cette prétention en face du résultat que la politique du gouvernement a eu sur le commerce du Saint-Laurent. Il y a huit jours aujourd'hui, la Chambre de commerce de Montréal a tenu une assemblée, précisément afin de prendre en considération la question du commerce de transport entre le Canada, les Etats-Unis et l'Europe. Et qu'avons-nous vu ? Ce ne sont pas des grits, des libéraux ou des nationaux qui sont venus se plaindre de la politique du gouvernement ; ce sont ses propres amis, comme M. G. A. Drummond, M. O'Gilvie, M. Edward Murphy, M. Hugh McLennan. Tous patriotes et amis dévoués du gouvernement. Et qu'ont-ils dit ? Ils ont dit ceci : que grâce à sa politique, le gouvernement achève de détruire le commerce de transport du Saint-Laurent ; et que pendant qu'en 1872 nous transportions 28 pour 100 des grains expédiés en Europe, aujourd'hui nous n'en transportons que 12 pour 100.

Voilà les faits qui ont été déclarés dans des résolutions adoptées à l'unanimité par la Chambre de commerce de Montréal et les citoyens réunis. Il n'y a pas de plus énergique condamnation de la politique du gouvernement, qui, loin de s'étudier à étendre la popularité de la route du Saint-Laurent, achève de la ruiner complètement. Et voici ces résolutions :

Proposé par M. G. A. Drummond, secondé par M. O'Gilvie et résolu : —

“ Que les charges imposées dans le port de Montréal sont tellement onéreuses qu'elles chassent le commerce du fleuve Saint-Laurent et des canaux et le forcent à chercher d'autres routes par les ports américains. En conséquence, le commerce du Saint-Laurent ne s'est pas développé en proportion des affaires, attendu qu'en 1872 nous avons exporté près de 28 pour 100 du grain et de la farine expédiés en Europe du continent américain, tandis que maintenant nous n'en exportons que 12 pour 100.

Et des conservateurs importants comme MM. Edward Murphy et Hugh McLennan se sont plaints de cette politique et sont allés jusqu'à dire qu'elle était de nature à ébranler leur loyauté, non seulement envers la mère-patrie, mais envers le Canada.

A propos du commerce du Saint-Laurent, M. l'Orateur, il me fait plaisir de pouvoir citer devant la Chambre certains documents que j'entraîne dans les rapports de la Chambre de Commerce de Montréal. Il y a quelques années, cette institution a fait préparer un plan indiquant quelle était la route la plus courte, ou le moyen de transport le plus facile et le plus économique entre les Etats-Unis et l'Europe. Elle avait chargé M. Thomas Keefer, un ingénieur bien connu, de préparer ces plans. Voici quel est le résultat auquel ce monsieur est arrivé :

“ That if a thread be stretched upon a globe, from any point in the British Channel to Toledo, on Lake Erie, and arranged so as to be upon the shortest line, it will be found that the River St. Lawrence does not deviate at any point more than 30 miles, connecting, in the shortest possible distance, with the most capacious, steady and economical mode of communication, the greatest food-consuming country in Europe with the greatest food-producing country in America—inhabited by the parent and offspring of the most favored race of men.”

M. Keefer ajoute :

“ The distance from Chicago to Montreal, via the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals is 1261 miles,—involving a lockage of 553 feet by 54 locks, there being 71 miles of canal, 185 miles of river and 1,005 miles of lake navigation. While the distance from Chicago to New York City via Buffalo and the Erie Canal is 1419 miles, involving a lockage of 655 feet by 72 locks,—there being 352 miles of canal, 202 miles of river and 865 miles of lake navigation.”

En conséquence, la route du Saint-Laurent est pour tous les points du Nord-Ouest, non seulement américain, mais encore du Nord-Ouest canadien, la route la plus directe entre l'Europe et l'Amérique. Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, la compagnie du Pacifique Canadien vient de terminer une seconde route entre les Etats de l'Ouest et le Saint-Laurent en été, et les ports de mer des Etats-Unis en hiver. Elle vient de compléter une voie ferrée qui se relie au Sault Sainte Marie au Northern Pacific. Déjà on annonce que l'été prochain, la compagnie aura à mouvoir au-delà de deux cents à deux cent cinquante chars de grain par jour dans le seul port de Montréal qui va devenir bientôt insuffisant. Nous avons donc deux routes qui sont les plus courtes en été et en hiver, pour transporter les produits de l'Ouest canadien et de l'Ouest américain sur le marché de l'Europe. La réciprocité leur donnera tout le trafic qu'elles pourront accommoder et même davantage puisque le commerce cherche toujours la route la plus directe et la plus économique.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL,

Il est inutile, M. l'Orateur, de rappeler que si la navigation profite de l'établissement de la réciprocité, les chemins de fer en profiteront également, car la navigation ne dure qu'à peu près six ou sept mois de l'année et le reste du transport doit se faire par chemin de fer. Or, le pays a construit le chemin de fer du Pacifique au prix de centaines de millions, et il est bien important pour l'avenir du pays que cette compagnie soit mise en mesure de pouvoir faire des profits suffisants pour l'empêcher de demander au pays de nouveaux sacrifices.

Quelques-uns des orateurs qui m'ont précédé de l'autre côté de la Chambre, prétendent que nous prenons une position humiliante à l'égard des Etats-Unis et que nous venons à leurs pieds comme de pauvres gens leur demander de nous faire la charité. M. l'Orateur, telle n'est pas la position. Comme j'ai eu l'honneur de l'expliquer, le Canada possède des ressources et des avantages qui sont très précieux aux Etats-Unis ; nous pouvons offrir autant aux Américains que les Américains peuvent nous offrir. La réciprocité serait également avantageuse aux deux pays, parce qu'elle stimulerait la production, qu'elle augmenterait le commerce dans des proportions telles que des millions d'âmes en bénéficieraient des deux côtés de la frontière.

Quelques-uns des députés de cette Chambre ont aussi prétendu que cette question était une affaire nouvelle, entièrement nouvelle, dont ils n'avaient jamais entendu parler ; ils ont été très surpris d'apprendre qu'il y avait des gens qui avaient rêvé de jeter les bases d'un commerce plus avantageux avec les Etats-Unis. Ils n'ont évidemment pas étudié l'histoire de l'établissement de la protection dans le pays. En 1871, la question a été carrément posée entre le tarif protecteur contre tout le monde ou le tarif protecteur contre l'Europe avec le commerce libre avec les Etats-Unis. La question a été posée de nouveau en 1872 et 1873. Dans chaque occasion les hommes politiques, des hommes de finance, des chefs de commerce dans les deux pays, ont déclaré que c'était la politique la plus avantageuse pour les deux peuples. En 1874, l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur — il n'était pas alors ministre — proposait à la Chambre de Commerce de la Puissance l'adoption de la réciprocité commerciale dans un discours éloquent comme il sait toujours les faire, et proposait la résolution suivante :

“ That this Board desires to express its gratification at the growing sentiment among our neighbors in the United States, in favor of more intimate reciprocal trade relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as evidenced by the resolutions passed by the National Board of Trade :—

“ And that it be an instruction to the Executive Council to take whatever steps it may deem necessary in order to secure the adoption of a treaty for reciprocal trade with the United States, upon a broad, comprehensive and liberal basis.”

Et le second de cette résolution n'était pas autre que M. Adam Brown, qui aujourd'hui a l'honneur de représenter la ville de Hamilton dans cette Chambre. La raison donnée par M. Brown pour appuyer cette résolution, c'est qu'il était absolument essentiel d'établir les relations les plus étroites possibles entre les deux pays. Voici ses paroles :

“ In seconding the resolution, I feel indisposed to make any lengthy remarks after the eloquent speech of Mr. White. He has established the fact that this Dominion can prosper without the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty ; and he has also established the fact that in the interest of the progress of both this country and the United States, we ought to have reciprocal trade between the two countries. This question should be regarded in the broad light of humanity. It is a matter of the greatest consequence to us in this country that we should live on the most amicable terms with our friends across the lines. We should cultivate peace in every possible way, and I believe there is no manner in which peace can be more thoroughly cultivated between two great nations, than by reciprocal trade relations between them. I have simply to say that I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution.”

Il me semble que l'honorable député aurait dû avoir un grand plaisir à seconder la motion de l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright)

rerions du traité de réciprocité, non-seulement pour les produits naturels, mais encore pour les produits manufacturés :

"I think the figures I have given prove that this country has prospered and can prosper without that treaty. But I think no one can look to the position of both countries on this continent—coming to the discussion of this question on equal terms, each feeling that it can prosper without that treaty—without realising that it would be to the advantage of both to have the freest possible intercourse. Here we are with a common line of frontier extending some four thousand miles, with many interests in common, with the same language, religion and traditions, each proud of and loyal to his own form of government, but willing to respect the national sentiment of the other; and it does seem to me, that the closer we can bring our commercial relations the more prosperous will both countries become."

M. l'Orateur, je n'ai absolument rien à ajouter sous ce rapport aux paroles de l'honorable ministre, et je crois qu'elles seraient aussi vraies aujourd'hui qu'elles l'étaient en 1874.

Maintenant, on fait certaines objections à la proposition que nous avons mise devant cette Chambre. La première, c'est que nous allons perdre un revenu de sept millions et un quart si nous adoptons cette politique. C'est parfaitement vrai. Nous allons perdre certainement les revenus que nous prélevons aujourd'hui sur les produits américains qui entrent en Canada. Mais n'y a-t-il pas moyen, sur les $35,000,000 que nous dépensons chaque année, de faire une petite économie de cinq à six millions ? Est-ce qu'il n'est pas possible de ramener le pays dans la condition où il était il y a dix ans et d'administrer les affaires avec vingt-cinq ou vingt-six millions par année, somme que l'on considérait extravagante en 1878 ? Est-ce qu'il n'est pas possible d'inaugurer un système d'économie et de faire cesser les extravagances, les dons que l'on fait au Pacifique et que l'on se prépare encore à renouveler, paraît-il ? Est-ce qu'il n'est pas possible d'introduire un système d'administration plus économique que celui que nous avons aujourd'hui ? Et s'il manque quelque chose, n'est-il pas possible d'imposer sur des objets de luxe qui entrent aujourd'hui en Canada à un tarif inférieur à celui des Etats-Unis des droits égaux à ceux qui sont imposés chez nos voisins ? Est-ce qu'il n'est pas possible de prévoir que les grands progrès qui vont être réalisés dans le pays vont nécessiter une importation beaucoup plus considérable et donner un revenu plus grand sur les marchandises européennes, sur les vins, les soieries, et tous les objets de luxe importés dans le pays ?

Il me semble, Monsieur l'Orateur, qu'il n'y a absolument, rien là qui puisse effrayer un ministre des finances prudent et sage et décidé à voir à ce que l'administration du pays soit faite dans les conditions les plus favorables possibles. Dans tous les cas, tout le monde sait que la chose est possible ; et on parle de taxe directe parce qu'on sait que la taxe directe est impopulaire, avec raison, parce qu'elle prélève brutalement sur le propriétaire, tandis que la taxe indirecte lui enlève autant, mais sans qu'il s'en aperçoive.

Pour ma part, je préfère le mode le plus facile de collection et d'administration, celui qui crée le moins de mécontentement et je serais certainement opposé à toute tentative d'imposition de taxe directe.

On fait une autre grande objection. On dit, si le Canada goûte au marché américain, il n'est pas certain qu'il restera loyal à l'Angleterre. Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, notre loyauté est au-dessus de tout soupçon ; je parle ici pour les Canadiens français. Quelques années seulement après la cession du pays à l'Angleterre, les Canadiens français ont eu occasion, en 1775, de faire preuve de loyauté. Des avantages assez considérables leur étaient offerts par les Américains révoltés pour les induire à abandonner l'Angleterre. Mais nous avons combattu pour le drapeau anglais en 1775. Nous avons combattu pour le drapeau anglais en 1812, et nous l'avons fait avec gloire. Ce sera toujours un des souvenirs les plus glorieux du peuple canadien français que de pouvoir dire qu'en 1812 nous avons été les premiers à soutenir la Couronne britannique.

Aujourd'hui, les Canadiens français ne désirent pas l'annexion ; ils sont loyaux, et ils le sont de raison. Ils sont loyaux parce qu'ils veulent conserver la protection que leur offre le Trône britannique, parce qu'ils comptent que l'Angleterre saura respecter le traité de 1763 et que sous son égide "nos institutions, notre langue et nos lois" sont en sûreté. Nous savons que nous pouvons toujours arriver au pied du trône et faire entendre nos plaintes ; que nous sommes écoutés avec respect et avec l'intention de nous rendre justice, si justice nous était refusée. C'est pour cela, M. l'Orateur, que nous ne voulons pas changer la protection de la Couronne britannique pour entrer comme un des Etats de la République voisine, où, il est vrai, nos droits pourraient nous être garantis, mais où aussi on pourrait nous les arracher par l'adoption d'un amendement constitutionnel.

Voilà pourquoi nous sommes loyaux et pourquoi nous désirons le maintien de la connexion britannique et nous continuerons à l'être aussi longtemps du moins que nous jouirons des avantages et des garanties que nous possédons aujourd'hui.

Mais, M. l'Orateur, il faut se rappeler un peu l'histoire que ce n'est pas en affamant le peuple qu'on le rend loyal, content et tranquille. Il faut se rappeler l'état où était le pays en 1849 lorsque les Galt, les Holton, les McPherson, les Abbott signaient un manifeste déclarant qu'ils désespéraient de l'avenir du pays et que leur seul espoir était dans l'annexion aux Etats-Unis. Il faut se rappeler, M. l'Orateur, qu'à cette époque-là le pays était dans une excitation considérable, et que ce n'est qu'en établissant la réciprocité, c'est-à-dire, en donnant au Canada les avantages commerciaux de l'annexion, que l'on a évité une crise et une révolution, que l'on a évité l'annexion politique du Canada aux Etats-Unis.

Et qu'est-il arrivé aussitôt que la réciprocité a été établie ? La prospérité est revenue, la tranquillité s'est rétablie, des déloyaux sont devenus les chefs des loyaux, et aujourd'hui nous voyons ces messieurs porter les insignes de la faveur royale qu'ils ont sans doute bien mérités.

Eh bien ! les mêmes causes produisent les mêmes résultats. Si vous laissez dépérir l'agriculture, si vous laissez languir le commerce et les manufactures, les faits qui se sont produits en 1849 se renouvelleront. Vous aurez de nouveau de l'agitation, de l'inquiétude. Vous créerez un nouveau mouvement annexionniste que vous ne pourrez encore arrêter qu'en ayant recours au même remède, c'est-à-dire à la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. Voilà pourquoi de ce côté-ci nous voulons donner à notre commerce, à notre agriculture et à nos manufactures toute l'extension et le développement dont ils sont susceptibles, persuadés que c'est de cette manière, et de cette manière-là seulement, que nous éviterons les perturbations politiques et que nous pourrions continuer longtemps à nous appeler les loyaux sujets de Sa Majesté, tout en restant fidèles au Canada, notre patrie.

M. DUPONT: M. l'Orateur, "Le Canada pour les Canadiens" telle a été la devise inscrite en 1878 sur le drapeau conservateur laquelle lui a assuré une victoire signalée et sans précédent dans nos annales politiques. La fidélité à cette devise, la bonne foi et la loyauté avec lesquelles le parti conservateur est parvenu au pouvoir en 1878, lui a mérité le nouveau triomphe qu'il a obtenu en 1882.

Et, M. l'Orateur, le parti conservateur, dans l'intervalle qui s'est écoulé de 1882 à 1887, malgré les fautes qu'il a pu commettre pendant cet intervalle, a encore triomphé en 1887, grâce à cette devise "le Canada pour les Canadiens."

M. l'Orateur, il est inutile après ces trois épreuves consécutives, d'insister pour faire comprendre à la Chambre, ou à ceux qui s'occupent de la politique, que le système de protection est certainement accepté par le pays, quoi qu'en ait dit, l'autre jour, l'hon. député de Montmagny (M. Choquette), qui déclarait que cette politique n'avait pas été soumise loyalement aux voteurs. Nous devons affirmer, et tout le monde devra le croire, et le croit,—à part l'hon. député de Montmagny,—que ces trois luttes consécutives ont établi la protection d'une manière définitive dans notre pays. Tout le monde est convaincu par la manière dont ces luttes ont été faites, que le peuple savait ce qu'il faisait quand il établissait la politique de protection.

En effet en 1878, en 1882 et en 1887, plusieurs des députés de la province de Québec qui sont ici dans cette Chambre, ont pris part à la lutte et se rappellent qu'elle s'est faite, d'une part sur la question du tarif protecteur, et d'autre part en opposition à ce tarif, lequel, disait-on, devait augmenter les impôts. Jamais lutte ne peut avoir été faite plus loyalement, et personne ne peut nier que la nation a accepté volontairement la protection, qui favorisait la fondation d'industries nationales. M. l'Orateur, la nation avait un motif pour en agir ainsi, et si l'on veut rechercher ce motif, on n'a qu'à jeter un coup d'œil sur l'état de choses dans lequel se trouvait le Dominion du Canada, de 1874 à 1878. M. l'Orateur, les Américains, après la guerre de sécession travaillaient à refaire leurs industries, à développer les ressources de leur pays, et en particulier leur agriculture. En 1874 l'agriculture américaine avait pris un tel développement, que les produits agricoles des Etats-Unis faisaient une compétition aux produits agricoles du Dominion sur son propre marché. Tout le monde se rappelle aussi qu'à cette époque les produits de l'industrie américaine nous faisaient une concurrence ruineuse malgré un tarif de revenu pour les industries canadiennes, c'est-à-dire malgré que nos industries fussent protégées par un tarif de 14 à 17½ pour cent.

Dans cette lutte que nos industries eurent à soutenir contre celles des Etats-Unis et des autres pays étrangers, elles faillirent succomber, et il était grand temps que la protection nous fût donnée, car nos industries ainsi que le commerce et l'agriculture étaient à l'agonie dans tout le Dominion.

Et je me demande sur quoi se base l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) pour déclarer maintenant que si nous avions le libre échange absolu, c'est-à-dire aucun tarif contre les marchandises venant des Etats-Unis, nos manufactures, qui n'ont pris développement qu'avec le tarif protecteur pourraient subir le choc de la concurrence sans être ébranlées. Il n'est pas possible de faire pareille assertion et de la soutenir par un raisonnement appuyé sur les faits.

De 1874 à 1878 l'industrie était donc tombée dans une prostration absolue. De même les hangars de nos agriculteurs étaient bondés de produits agricoles sans qu'il fut possible de trouver de débouchés. Nos fabriques étaient en grande majorité fermées. Nos négociants étaient pour la plupart en banqueroute, notre population, comme un flot, laissant les rivages de notre pays, franchissait la frontière et s'en allait demander du travail dans les manufactures de la république américaine. Je me rappelle fort bien qu'à cette époque néfaste,—de 1874 à 1878—près de la moitié des propriétés dans la paroisse où je réside, furent vendues par le shérif. Je me rappelle également que de grands négociants, amis politiques des honorables députés de la gauche, tombèrent en faillite, et que leur ruine entraîna d'autres avec eux.

C'était à peu près la même condition d'affaire dans les autres comtés de la province de Québec, et voilà l'état de torpeur dans lequel se trouvaient notre commerce, notre industrie, et notre agriculture. C'est à cela, c'est à ces maux considérables qu'est due la politique de protection, et qu'est due aussi la popularité qui c'est attachée depuis à cette politique-là. C'est le souvenir des misères que le peuple a endurées sous le tarif de revenu qui l'a attaché d'une manière presque inébranlable à la politique de protection, et qui l'a fait maintenir quand même au pouvoir le gouvernement actuel.

Il est étonnant, que tant d'hommes politiques intelligents et expérimentés qui se trouvent parmi les honorables mem-bres de ce côté-ci de la Chambre n'aient pas encore saisi le sentiment populaire exprimé d'une manière aussi tranchée qu'il l'a été en 1882 et en 1887.

Quelle a été, M. l'Orateur, depuis 1874, époque où le tarif protecteur a été établi dans la province de Québec, quelle a été la condition des affaires? Personne ne doit hésiter à admettre que depuis cette époque on a vu notre industrie se relever; on a vu notre agriculture se développer; on a vu notre classe mercantile se lancer dans les industries commerciales et remporter des succès si encourageants que le commerce ne s'est guère ralenti depuis, que l'industrie a toujours prospéré et que l'agriculteur,—je ne crains pas de le dire malgré ce qu'ont dit l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) et d'autres honorables députés de ce côté-ci de la Chambre,—est satisfait de sa position, quoiqu'il n'est guère possible de trouver dans le monde des hommes entièrement satisfaits de leur position.

Le changement opéré par la politique nationale a été tel que nous avons maintenant un marché local pour la consommation non seulement d'une grande partie des produits de notre agriculture, mais aussi pour la consommation des produits de nos manufactures. J'ai entendu l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) dire que notre industrie s'était tellement développée dans la province de Québec qu'il y avait un surplus de marchandises fabriquées qui restaient sur les bras des marchands de gros, et que c'était un inconvénient grave.

Que font les Américains, M. l'Orateur, quand ils ont des surplus de marchandises,—et personne n'hésite à croire qu'aux Etats-Unis il arrive souvent des pléthores dans les différentes lignes de fabrique. Ce que font les Américains, l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) ne doit pas l'ignorer. Ils font ce que l'honorable député appelle des coalitions, et ils s'en viennent en Canada sacrifier des lots énormes de marchandises à plus bas prix qu'ils les vendent sur leurs marchés. C'est pour conserver leur prix sur le marché américain qu'ils font du marché canadien et du marché des autres nations qui n'ont pas un tarif suffisant, un marché à sacrifice. Et c'est avec ces sacrifices qu'ils viennent à bout, comme ils sont venus à bout de le faire ici de 1874 à 1878, de faire périr l'industrie dans les pays où ils ont intérêt à écouler leurs marchandises. Pourquoi les Etats-Unis qui ont une industrie si solidement assise, une industrie qui date de cinquante années, pourquoi n'établissent-ils pas de libre échange avec la Grande-Bretagne? Pourquoi n'ouvrent-ils pas leur marché aux autres nations du globe? L'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) dit qu'en Europe le travail est trop bon marché. Mais, M. l'Orateur, si le travail est à bon marché en Europe, il y a aussi la distance à parcourir pour venir faire la compétition aux Américains sur leur marché, il y a le transport des marchandises qui équivaut à quelque chose; et comment se fait-il que les Américains qui réservent pour eux leur propre marché, pour leur industrie, pour leurs produits agricoles aient le moyen d'aller faire de la compétition sur le marché anglais? Ils devraient se trouver sur un pied d'égalité avec les manufacturiers de la Grande-Bretagne. Mais les Etats-Unis paraissent comprendre autrement leurs intérêts que ne les comprend mon honorable ami. Le député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) et quelques honorables députés de cette Chambre ont prétendu qu'en ayant la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis, les Américains viendraient ici nous bâtir des manufactures. Ah! M. l'Orateur, quelle illusion! Un peuple qui depuis cinquante ans s'impose des sacrifices pour faire progresser son industrie, pour développer ses ressources naturelles irait, après avoir fait tous ces sacrifices, jeter ses capitaux dans un pays étranger pour y développer des industries! Il irait faire cela, lorsque ce pays étranger aurait enlevé les barrières qui existaient entre eux, c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il serait libre de transporter ses marchandises dans ce pays et d'y ruiner les manufactures fondées aux dépens du crédit national! Je ne crois pas que les Américains tiennent une telle ligne de conduite. Au reste, sous l'ancien traité de réciprocité, de 1854 à 1866, peut-on mentionner un seul cas dans lequel les Américains nous ont fourni des capitaux pour fonder des industries dans notre pays ?

Donc, je erois, et tout homme raisonnable devrait croire qu'il est peu convenable de compter sur le manque de patriotisme de la nation américaine pour avoir une industrie nationale dans la Puissance du Canada. Une nation doit compter sur elle-même avant tout pour développer l'industrie nationale. Si nous ne pouvons pas développer notre industrie, personne ne viendra la faire pour nous. Et si nous ne le faisons pas, ou si nous laissons périr celles qui existent il arrivera ce qui est arrivé de 1874 à 1878 : nos ouvriers prendront la route de l'étranger ; nos cultivateurs se trouveront sans marché local pour l'écoulement des produits de notre agriculture, et l'émigration augmentera dans une proportion effrayante.

Voilà quel sera le résultat de la banqueroute de notre industrie nationale. On a prétendu que nos manufactures étaient en état de faire de la compétition avec les manufactures des Etats-Unis. Cette prétention n'est pas raisonnable pour la raison que j'ai donnée tout-à-l'heure, et il y a encore d'autres raisons qui militent contre cette assertion.

M. l'Orateur, l'industrie américaine est autrement développée que la nôtre. Les capitaux engagés dans ces industries sont immenses. Ils représentent des centaines de millions pour chaque million que nous avons d'engagé dans les nôtres. Comme je le disais, il y a un instant—et j'aime à le répéter encore pour faire comprendre à la Chambre toute la force de cet argument,—il est très facile aux manufacturiers des Etats-Unis qui représentent des centaines de millions de capital de faire des sacrifices, et de faire la guerre aux industries canadiennes de même nature, dans lesquelles il n'y a que quelques millions de piastres d'engagés, et ensuite, ces industries étant disparues, messieurs les Américains auront le contrôle de notre marché comme du leur.

Tel serait le résultat du libre échange absolu entre les deux pays.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, un homme d'Etat très distingué, un penseur profond, s'écriait un jour en parlant des industries nationales de la France :

« Je comprends qu'une nation puisse hésiter pour s'imposer les sacrifices si lourds qu'il faut faire pour créer chez elle l'industrie nationale ; mais ce que je ne puis concevoir, ajoutait-il, c'est qu'une nation ayant fait ces sacrifices, laisse ensuite périr l'industrie nationale.... »

M. l'Orateur, que fait l'horticulteur qui veut orner sa résidence ou planter des arbres fruitiers ; que fait-il pour protéger ces jeunes arbres après la plantation ? Il les assure, en leur donnant, ce que les hommes de l'art appellent un tuteur. Quand ils ont grandi, qu'ils commencent à porter des fleurs, et que tout fait prévoir qu'ils pourront bientôt porter des fruits, l'homme de l'art élève ce qu'on appelle des brise-vents pour empêcher les vents impétueux qui soufflent à travers la campagne, de renverser les jeunes arbres ou d'en briser les rameaux qui devront bientôt donner des fruits ; ou pour empêcher que les fruits ne soient jetés sur le sol avant d'avoir atteint leur maturité. Ainsi, M. l'Orateur, fait l'homme prévoyant qui veut fonder l'industrie nationale.

Après l'avoir enracinée dans le sol de la patrie, il l'assure à un tuteur qui est la politique nationale.

Il fait aussi des brise-vents, c'est-à-dire, il établit le tarif protecteur afin d'empêcher la compétition étrangère de joncher le sol de la patrie des ruines de l'industrie nationale.

Voilà ce que doit faire l'homme qui a à cœur, les progrès de l'industrie nationale.

Une nation qui n'a pas d'industries nationales mérite-t-elle le nom de nation ? Non ; jamais. Une nation qui ne peut pas se suffire à elle-même et qui est toujours obligée de tout acheter à l'étranger, mérite-t-elle de porter le nom de nation ? Dans mon opinion une telle nation ne sera jamais au premier rang. Elle occupera toujours parmi les nations du globe, un rang inférieur, et passera toujours, quel que soit son nombre, pour une nation de cinquième ou de sixième ordre. Est-ce que telle doit être notre ambition ? Non. Nous devons faire comme les Américains.

Les honorables membres de la gauche nous vantent continuellement la république américaine ; ils font briller devant nos yeux les progrès qu'elle a accomplis dans le cours de sa carrière. Comment se fait-il qu'il ne nous parlent pas des sacrifices qu'ont faits les Américains pour créer leur industrie nationale.

L'honorable député de Berthier n'a pas toujours été député. Et, bien qu'il soit parmi les hommes politiques de son parti, l'un des membres les plus remarquables, il fut aussi un publiciste distingué. Il a dit qu'il avait été protectionniste. Il n'a pas été seulement protectionniste, mais il a été aussi prohibitionniste. Écoutez ce que dit l'honorable député de Berthier, et les conseils qu'il donnait aux députés de la campagne quand il était publiciste distingué, en 1871, justement à l'époque où il nous a dit qu'il prônait la protection. Que dit-il à cette époque à ceux qui veulent à tout prix favoriser le commerce extérieur sans s'occuper de l'industrie nationale :—

Grâce au peu de connaissances économiques des représentants des comités de la campagne, ceux des villes sont promptement parvenus à leur persuader que le commerce est tout ; que l'imposition des droits élevés aurait pour effet de peser davantage sur l'agriculture et d'élever le prix des choses nécessaires à la vie. C'est ainsi qu'on est arrivé à inspirer aux cultivateurs l'horreur des taxes et à rendre impossible toute amélioration sensible de l'état économique du pays.

Puis au moyen de théories brillantes, on a persuadé sans peine que le commerce est la source de toutes les richesses.

L'exemple des grandes villes venait à point pour convaincre les récalcitrants.

Voici les conseils qu'il donnait aux députés de la campagne. L'honorable député nous donnait alors, et donnait aux députés de la campagne un conseil que je crois qu'il ferait bien de suivre.

Que dit-il, M. l'Orateur, en parlant des objections que font les libres-échangistes. Il ne fait pas d'exception pour les Etats-Unis, sa manière de traiter la question est contre toutes les nations ; contre la mère-patrie et contre toutes les autres nations du globe. Voici ce que disait alors l'honorable député de Berthier, et vous pouvez le comparer avec ses arguments d'aujourd'hui. Vous serez à même de juger, M. l'Orateur, ainsi que la Chambre, si c'est à cette époque qu'il avait raison, ou si c'est aujourd'hui. Quant à moi je n'hésite pas à croire que son raisonnement était plus fort alors qu'il ne l'est dans le moment.

Des tentatives étaient faites pour élever le tarif et le rendre protecteur, ainsi qu'il a été fait en 1878. Voici ce qu'il dit :

Deux obstacles s'opposaient au succès : l'intérêt des importateurs et des expéditeurs d'abord, et en second lieu, les préjugés et les sophismes qu'ils ont propagés parmi le peuple. Les partisans du régime actuel ont eu une foule d'objections à toute réforme économique. Mais la première et celle dont toutes les autres découlent, est généralement formulée dans les termes suivants.....

Vous allez voir, M. l'Orateur, que c'est la réfutation complète, à mon sens, des arguments présentés à la Chambre, ce soir, par l'honorable député de Berthier. Il continue :

Protéger l'industrie nationale, c'est taxer le plus grand nombre pour l'avantage de quelques individus....

Voilà bien ce que disent aujourd'hui ceux qui demandent le libre-échange.

C'est augmenter le prix de toutes les marchandises, et conséquemment, opprimer le consommateur et le forcer à payer plus cher des objets qu'il pourrait obtenir à meilleur marché. C'est en conséquence, peser sur l'agriculture, dont l'existence n'est pas déjà si brillante, et appauvrir généralement tout le pays.

Il n'y a pas de doute qu'à première vue ce raisonnement paraît concluant.

Nous espérons cependant prouver par les faits, par l'histoire et par le raisonnement, qu'il est fallacieux, et que c'est tout le contraire qu'il faudrait dire.

M. BEAUSOLEIL: L'honorable député me permettra-t-il une question? Prétend-il que j'ai parlé autrement aujourd'hui? Est-ce que je n'ai pas dit que j'étais pour la protection? Je pense que je suis protectionniste et que je continue de l'être.

M. DUPONT: M. l'Orateur, je ne comprends pas qu'un homme puisse être protectionniste et libre-échangiste en même temps. L'honorable député est pour le libre-échange avec les Etats-Unis et il se dit encore protectionniste. C'est là un phénomène de logique qui échappe à ma compétence; et je ne puis pas comprendre que l'honorable député soit pour son pays et soit en même temps pour le commerce libre avec les Américains.

M. l'Orateur, permettez-moi de faire encore une citation des admirables écrits de mon honorable ami lorsqu'il était non-seulement protectionniste, mais lorsqu'il était prohibitionniste. Que disait-il alors?

Nous posons d'abord les principes suivants, avec la réserve de les développer plus tard.

Le gouvernement doit prohiber l'importation de tous les objets de manufacture étrangère qui pourraient être fabriqués dans le pays.

Il doit aussi empêcher l'importation de la matière première, à moins qu'elle ne se trouve pas dans le pays. En ce cas l'importation devrait être libre.

Comme vous le voyez, l'honorable député était alors prohibitionniste.

A l'appui des merveilles opérées dans le pays par la politique de protection il est à peine utile d'en rappeler quelques-unes. Comme je l'ai dit en commençant, malgré les fautes qu'a pu commettre le gouvernement le peuple a cru devoir lui continuer l'administration des affaires publiques, —les honorables députés de ce côté-ci de la Chambre devront l'admettre,—justement parce que la nation avait confiance que le gouvernement qui avait établi la protection la maintiendrait. J'ai été étonné l'autre jour d'entendre l'honorable député de Montmagny (M. Choquette) nous dire que Cartier avait pu, dans sa jeunesse, exprimer des opinions libres-échangistes.

M. LANGELEIR (Québec-Centre): Ce n'est pas dans sa jeunesse; c'est dans sa vieillesse.

M. DUPONT: Qu'il aurait pu même dans son âge mûr exprimer des opinions libres-échangistes. J'ai été étonné, M. l'Orateur, d'entendre l'honorable député déclarer à la Chambre qu'il ne reconnaît plus les héritiers de Cartier dans cette Chambre. Je crois que si Cartier, le grand patriote canadien français eût été à la place de ses successeurs, il eût fait ce que ses successeurs ont fait. Cartier n'aurait pas vu son pays dans l'état de pauvreté; il n'aurait pas vu l'industrie de son pays dans l'agonie; il n'aurait pas vu le commerce de son pays dans un état de banqueroute; il n'aurait pas vu la misère générale dans tout le pays, sans s'émouvoir. Cartier était assez patriote pour sacrifier n'importe laquelle de ses théories les plus chères au bien de ses concitoyens. Et je ne crois pas qu'il se trouve en cette Chambre un seul homme pour nier cette qualité-là à Cartier. Si Cartier eût compris, comme il eût été forcé de le comprendre en 1878, qu'un tarif de revenu ne pouvait plus subsister sans causer la ruine du peuple canadien, Cartier n'eût pas hésité un instant à sacrifier ses théories et à établir un tarif protecteur.

M. l'Orateur, on donne à entendre que nous sommes de beaucoup en arrière de la nation américaine. On n'a qu'à se donner la peine de comparer notre commerce avec le commerce extérieur de la grande République voisine pour se rendre compte du commerce extérieur des deux nations, proportions gardées, chacune à son nombre. En regardant le Tableau du commerce et de la navigation des Etats-Unis pour la dernière année, on constate que les Etats-Unis avec une population de 60,000,000 d'âmes ont exporté pour $1,408,000,000; la population canadienne de la Puissance du Canada, dans la même année, a exporté pour $202,000,000.

et en exportation et en importation elle a fait un commerce extérieur de $208,000,000. Qu'est-ce que représente par tête de la population $1,408,000,000 pour les Etats-Unis et $208,000,000 pour la Puissance du Canada? Cela représente $24 par tête de commerce extérieur aux Etats-Unis, et au-delà de $40 par tête pour le Canada. Peut-on dire, M. l'Orateur, que notre commerce extérieur eu égard à notre nombre soit inférieur à celui de la République américaine? Pour le dire, il faudrait être en état de se baser sur des chiffres, sur des faits, et il n'en est aucun que les honorables députés puissent amener de l'avant pour convaincre la Chambre et le pays.

Un honorable député, celui de Norfolk-Nord (M. Charlton) je crois, a établi que le commerce intérieur de la République américaine était égal en tonnage au commerce intérieur de toutes les nations de la chrétienté réunies ensemble, à l'exception des Etats-Unis. Ces statistiques établissent justement que si une nation veut développer son commerce intérieur elle doit de toute nécessité établir un tarif de protection et pourvoir elle-même à ses besoins et au développement de l'industrie nationale. Cela vient donc à l'appui de mon assertion qu'une nation ne peut être une nation, et ne peut être véritablement maîtresse chez elle, qu'en étant capable de suffire à tous ses besoins.

La nation américaine n'a pas toujours eu un commerce intérieur aussi développé ni aussi florissant que celui qu'elle a aujourd'hui. Elle a été pendant un certain nombre d'années la proie des théoriciens. Il faut voir ce que disait en 1824, sur l'état des affaires, un illustre orateur et homme d'état, Henry Clay, dépeignant la désolation qui règne aux Etats-Unis, en proie au libre-échange:

Nous avons sous les yeux, disait-il, des exemples du terrible effet sur nos manufactures de la politique indécise et flottante du gouvernement à leur égard. Des villages et des parties de villages nés sous l'influence de la haute protection dont je parlais tout-à-l'heure, sont tombés en ruines et sont abandonnés.

En parcourant la Nouvelle Angleterre, on aperçoit de hauts et spacieux édifices, les vitres brisées, les contrevents abattus, mornes, sans bruit et sans activité. Si vous demandez la cause de ce triste état de choses, on vous informe que ces bâtisses étaient autrefois des manufactures de coton ou autres dont les propriétaires ont dû abandonner l'exploitation à cause de l'écrasante concurrence étrangère.

M. l'Orateur, cette peinture n'est-elle pas celle de notre pays avant l'établissement du tarif protecteur? Dans la petite ville qui nous avoisine, la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe, remplie aujourd'hui de manufactures prospères, là aussi sous l'ancien régime, on voyait de grandes bâtisses désolées et abandonnées, où autrefois régnait l'activité et la vie.

Depuis que la protection a été établie, non-seulement ces bâtisses ont été occupées, non-seulement des manufacturiers y exercent leur activité, mais une foule d'autres industries ont surgi sous le souffle de la politique nationale.

J'ai entendu l'honorable député de Berthier nous lire tout-à-l'heure une longue liste des produits agricoles que nous exportons aux Etats-Unis, et nous faire connaître que sur ces produits nous payons un droit, et qu'en ayant le libre-échange, nous n'en payerions pas. L'honorable député de Berthier a omis avec soin de mentionner cependant qu'en ayant le libre-échange, il y a une autre liste de produits qu'il aurait pu mettre à côté de celle-là, lesquels viendraient en compétition avec les produits de notre agriculture. Il a oublié de mentionner cet autre fait qu'en ayant le libre-échange, notre marché local serait perdu, notre industrie serait anéantie par l'industrie américaine plus forte que la nôtre.

Je me permettrai de lire à la Chambre un état des prix des différents produits agricoles aux Etats-Unis, pour démontrer qu'il n'y a pas qu'ici que les produits agricoles ont baissé en valeur, mais que cette baisse s'est produite sur tous les marchés de l'univers.

Prenons les Américains qui sont la nation du globe qui exporte le plus de produits agricoles, et si la République américaine est une de celles qui exportent le plus de produits agricoles, où serait l'avantage, je vous le demande, d'établir le libre-échange avec eux, puisque nous commerçons aussi dans la même ligne ? Ne vaut-il pas mieux ouvrir des marchés plus éloignés, avec des nations qui se livrent exclusivement à l'industrie, et qui ont absolument besoin de chercher en dehors de leur territoire les produits nécessaires pour nourrir leurs habitants, tel que la Grande-Bretagne par exemple ?

En 1881 le blé d'inde valait aux Etats-Unis cinquante-cinq cents du minot. En 1887 il ne valait plus que quarante-sept cents. Quel serait le résultat si les blés d'inde américains qui sont exportés en dehors des Etats-Unis, pour un chiffre d'environ $20,000,000, entraient libres de tous droits dans les ports du Canada ? La même compétition aurait lieu pour nos pois, l'avoine et autres grains que nous produisons.

Quel serait le résultat ? On l'a connu le résultat de 1874 à 1878, et les cultivateurs de ce pays ont demandé à grands cris des impôts sur les denrées qui cependant nous venaient des Etats-Unis en moins grande quantité, alors, qu'elles ne pourraient être importées aujourd'hui si nous avions le libre échange.

La farine de blé d'inde a également baissé ; le lard fumé de 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ centins est tombé depuis à 8 $\frac{1}{10}$ centins par livre ; le lard salé de 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ centins à 6 $\frac{1}{10}$ centins ; le bœuf salé de 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ centins à 5 $\frac{1}{10}$ centins ; le beurre de 19 centins à 15 $\frac{1}{10}$ centins ; le fromage de 11 centins à 9 $\frac{1}{10}$ centins. La première liste des prix que je viens de donner est la liste de 1881 ; la seconde, qui est la plus basse, est la liste des prix en 1887. Donc il n'y a pas qu'ici que les produits agricoles sont en baisse. C'est qu'il y a eu pléthore dans le monde entier de produits agricoles. Cet encombrement a été causé surtout par l'immense développement de l'Ouest des Etats-Unis, lesquels pourraient exporter dans ce moment presque assez de blé et de viande pour nourrir l'Europe entière.

M. l'Orateur, l'exportation du foin aux Etats-Unis a été mentionnée comme l'un des produits que nous pourrions exporter le plus avantageusement.

On oublie cependant, comme l'a fait voir l'honorable député de Rouville, (M. Gigault) que l'exportation du foin aux Etats Unis diminue graduellement. Quelle est la cause de cette diminution ? c'est que les Etats-Unis ont d'immenses espaces de terres fatiguées par la culture du blé. Quand on a vu que dans la Nouvelle-Angleterre on pouvait vendre des fourrages, on a commencé à faire des prairies dans l'Ouest des Etats-Unis. D'immenses prairies se font chaque année ; le foin devient plus abondant, et même aujourd'hui, si les droits étaient enlevés sur cet article, nous serions obligés, comme nous le sommes maintenant, de souffrir la compétition des foin de l'Ouest. Et je nie complètement que nos cultivateurs auraient tout le bénéfice de la réduction des droits, car du moment qu'il y a compétition sur un marché étranger, les droits se paient partie par le consommateur, et partie par le producteur.

Notre marché le plus avantageux pour l'écoulement de nos produits agricoles sera toujours la Grande-Bretagne. Le jour n'est pas éloigné, je crois, où les Etats-Unis seront obligés de faire comme a fait, en 1842, l'Angleterre sous le ministère de sir Robert Peel, d'établir un libre-échange, du moins pour les produits naturels. Leur agriculture sera bientôt arrivée à un état de perfection et de développement tels quelle n'aura plus à craindre la compétition étrangère. Au reste, M. l'Orateur, vous connaissez l'état de chose qui se produit maintenant aujourd'hui aux Etats-Unis ; vous savez que le trésor américain est obéré par les fonds qui s'y accumulent. Le Président déclarait dernièrement au Congrès qu'il fallait absolument retrancher des droits, et du coup, on résolut d'en enlever pour $80,000,000. Dans ces $80,000,000 est compris le bois qui vient du Canada ; c'est un des articles qui devra entrer en franchise à l'avenir. On nous a mentionné que les Etats-Unis étaient un marché favorable pour l'exportation de la patate, et il paraît que ce tubercule est placée sur la liste des effets qui doivent entrer en franchise aux Etats-Unis. Beaucoup d'autres articles, pour favoriser l'exportation de nos produits aux Etats-Unis, sont sur la liste des effets qui devront être admis en franchise.

Alors, pourquoi l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright) vient-il demander, dans de telles circonstances, d'établir le libre-échange avec les Etats-Unis ? Pourquoi tant se presser si les Américains, justement à cause de leur condition économique, à cause du développement de leurs industries, voient s'accumuler dans le trésor public un tel nombre de millions que le président lui-même en est effrayé ; qu'il déclare que ces impôts pèsent inutilement sur les consommateurs ? Puisque aucun besoin public ne le requiert, puisque la compétition n'est pas possible sur plusieurs produits de l'agriculture, pourquoi le président des Etats-Unis déclare-t-il ces impôts inutiles ? pourquoi demande-t-il qu'ils soient levés ? Et il est certain qu'avant de lever la barrière qui empêche les effets manufacturés d'entrer aux Etats-Unis, les Américains lèveront la barrière pour faire entrer chez eux les produits naturels des autres pays du monde.

Donc, M. l'Orateur, en demandant maintenant le libre-échange aux Etats-Unis, c'est fort possible que nous demandions une chose que les Américains désirent, car ils sont dans la nécessité peut-être de l'accorder. Mais si tel est le cas, la motion de l'honorable député d'Oxford Sud (sir Richard Cartwright) demande à la nation un sacrifice purement inutile.

Il y a plus, M. l'Orateur. Peut-on raisonnablement, comme l'a dit avec tant d'à-propos l'hon. député de Westmoreland (M. Wood), peut-on accorder le libre échange aux Etats Unis et le refuser à l'Angleterre. Qu'est-ce que nous accorderaient les Etats-Unis que l'Angleterre ne nous a pas accordé depuis longtemps ? Le libre échange, nous l'avons avec la mère-patrie. Alors, quelle serait la raison d'élever un tarif préférentiel contre l'Angleterre qui nous permet d'exporter chez elle nos produits agricoles et manufacturés. Et il est à remarquer que nous exportons plus en Angleterre de produits de notre agriculture que nous en exportons aux Etats Unis. Or, l'Angleterre ne faisant aucune compétition pour les produits agricoles, quelle serait la raison qui pourrait nous forcer convenablement de donner le libre-échange aux Etats-Unis, de leur ôter tous les droits qui les empêchent d'importer leurs marchandises et leurs produits agricoles qui viendraient faire concurrence aux nôtres pour certaines classes de produits ? Quelle serait la raison qui pourrait nous obliger de refuser à l'Angleterre ce que nous accorderions à une nation étrangère ? Ce serait une position tout à fait singulière que la mère-patrie ne permettrait pas, car il serait ridicule de compter sur l'Angleterre pour défendre et protéger la Puissance du Canada et d'accorder des faveurs commerciales à une nation étrangère à son détriment.

Au reste, M. l'Orateur, le libre-échange n'est pas possible quoiqu'aient fait pour en démontrer la praticabilité, l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil), et les autres honorables députés qui ont parlé sur cette question. Si nous voulons établir le libre-échange, il faudra ou adopter le tarif des Etats-Unis, ou que les Américains adoptent notre tarif. Si nous adoptons le tarif américain, quel est celui qui pourra prétendre que nous avons des capitaux suffisants, que nous avons une classe commerciale suffisante pour lutter contre les classes commerciales et contre les capitaux de la république américaine ? Les Américains feront les importations pour la Puissance du Canada ; toutes les marchandises seront importées pour nous dans les ports des Etats-Unis, et ce sera la ruine de notre commerce ; ce sera la ruine de nos villes maritimes et de nos ports de mer. Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, peut-on croire que les Américains devront adopter notre tarif. Je ne crois pas que nous puissions raisonnablement avoir cette prétention; il faut mieux y renoncer de suite et ne pas en parler.

Un autre résultat du libre-échange sera la taxe directe. L'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) qui n'est pas un des hommes les moins habiles de son parti, il s'en faut, a pris le soin de faire comprendre à la Chambre et de dire ici, pour que ses électeurs le sachent, qu'il n'y a pas de danger du tout pour la taxe directe; qu'en faisant un peu d'économie nous arriverons à ce résultat surprenant de réduire les dépenses publiques aux chiffres où elles étaient quand ces messieurs ont laissé le pouvoir.

M. l'Orateur, on juge des hommes politiques par leur passé. Je vais me permettre d'examiner un instant avec l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) ce qu'ont fait ses amis quand ils étaient au pouvoir; s'ils ont ramené les dépenses à la plus basse année du régime conservateur.

D'abord, quant à l'augmentation de la dette publique, de 1874 à 1878, ils l'ont augmentée d'un peu au-delà de $10,000,000. Quant à l'augmentation des dépenses, elle a eu lieu dans les proportions suivantes: prenons l'année 1873-74. Les dépenses pendant la dernière année du gouvernement Macdonald-Langevin étaient de $19,174,000. Durant la première année du régime Mackerzie elles ont dépassé un peu $23,000,000. L'année suivante, elles ont atteint $24,000,000. L'année d'après, $23,500,000, et l'année suivante encore $23,500,000. Qu'est-ce que prouvent, M. l'Orateur, l'histoire des deux partis politiques dans cette Chambre et dans le pays? Elle prouve le contraire des assertions faites par l'honorable député de Berthier.

Les dépenses, bien loin de diminuer iroient en augmentant si le pays progresse. De 1874 à 1878, les dépenses ont augmenté quoique le pays ait peu progressé; quoique ce soit une des périodes où nous ayons le moins de progrès à constater dans l'histoire politique de notre pays, c'était une période de véritable décadence sous le tarif de revenu. Et cependant, la dette publique et les dépenses ont augmenté alors considérablement. Comment l'honorable député peut-il raisonnablement prétendre qu'un pays continue à se développer et à produire ce phénomène prodigieux qu'aucun gouvernement passé ni futur ne produira, de diminuer les dépenses en même temps que le pays progressera.

Donc, M. l'Orateur, malgré les promesses fallacieuses faites par les honorables députés de la gauche, nous n'avons aucun espoir si nous les jugeons par leur passé. Je ne veux pas leur faire un reproche de l'augmentation des dépenses de 1874 à 1878, vu que ce n'est pas le temps de discuter ce point-là. Je veux seulement constater le fait que sous leur administration la dette a augmenté considérablement. Je constate de plus, qu'un pays qui progresse doit en même temps augmenter ses dépenses, le service public l'exige.

L'hon. député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil) ayant tourné son télescope par le petit bout, voit qu'il n'est pas possible que le revenu de nos douanes diminue de plus de 7 millions de piastres. Il dit que c'est à-peu-près ce que nous prélevons sur les importations actuelles des États-Unis. Mais, M. l'Orateur, je vous le demande, et je le demande à la Chambre, est-il raisonnable de dire que nos revenus douaniers ne vont diminuer que du montant que nous percevons sur les importations des États-Unis? N'est-il pas plus raisonnable de dire que l'industrie américaine, développée comme elle l'est actuellement aux États-Unis, pourra exporter tout ce qu'il lui plaira au Canada, quand nous aurons, comme l'a dit l'honorable député de Berthier (M. Beausoleil), un tarif protecteur contre toutes les autres nations de l'univers? N'est-il pas raisonnable de dire que les États-Unis fourniront à la Puissance du Canada presque tous les articles, toutes les choses dont nous avons besoin pour la consommation. Qu'est-ce que les États-Unis ne nous peuvent fournir en fait de lainages, de cotonnades, de cuirs, de produits agricoles, de ferronneries? Or, M. l'Orateur, si les États-Unis peuvent nous fournir tous ces objets sous un traité de réciprocité, qu'aurons-nous à demander aux autres pays étrangers?

Je crois donc que nous devons raisonnablement présumer que non-seulement nos douanes diminueront de 7 millions mais que la diminution se chiffrera plutôt par 15 à 16 millions de piastres. De 22 millions que sont les revenus de nos douanes aujourd'hui, nous aurons à payer environ 15 millions de taxes directes, et nous aurons gagné, en exportant, sans droits, nos produits aux États-Unis, environ 3 millions de piastres. Ce sera probablement le montant de droits qui nous restera au pays sur nos exportations, lorsque le tarif américain, tel qu'il doit être modifié par le Congrès, l'aura été prochainement. Ainsi, nous perdrons 15 millions de droits pour éviter de payer 3 millions de taxes indirectes. Et ces trois millions, imposées surtout sur des marchandises de luxe et de fantaisie, ne sont pas supportées par les cultivateurs, comme mon honorable ami le prétend; mais par les classes riches des villes, qui peuvent se donner le luxe de porter de beaux habits. Voilà la classe de personnes qui se trouve obligée de supporter les taxes indirectes, car ces taxes ne pèsent pas sur le cultivateur qui confectionne généralement ses vêtements d'étoffes indigènes faites de produits domestiques.

Si les produits de la ferme ne se vendent pas, le cultivateur n'achète pas d'étoffes de manufacture étrangère. Il est ainsi en position de contrôler chaque année le montant qu'il paie au trésor public. Si les produits de la ferme ne trouvent pas d'écoulement sur le marché local ou sur le marché étranger et qu'il est obligé de les garder, il économise sur ces achats, et conséquemment, il paie moins de taxes. Mais quand nous aurons la taxe directe, bon an, mal an, le cultivateur aura toujours à payer le même montant. Sur 12 à 15 millions, de piastres que nous serons obligés de répartir sur une population de cinq millions d'habitants, il aura à payer, chaque année $3.00 par tête pour chaque membre de sa famille, d'après l'évaluation si la taxe pèse sur sa propriété; ou sur son revenu si la taxe est imposée sur son revenu. Mais, bon an, mal an, il lui faudra payer cette taxe et il ne pourra pas contrôler le montant qu'il paie au trésor public.

Je dis donc que la taxe directe pèse plus sur le cultivateur que sur toute autre classe de citoyens.

M. l'Orateur, la taxe directe est-elle possible dans notre pays sous le contrôle surtout du gouvernement de la Puissance du Canada? En Angleterre, on a la taxe sur le revenu, mais il ne faut pas oublier que le gouvernement anglais a le contrôle sur les municipalités. Ce sont les officiers des municipalités dont il a le contrôle qui évaluent les revenus des citoyens ou les propriétés foncières, tandis qu'ici, le gouvernement fédéral n'a aucun contrôle sur les municipalités, ni pour l'évaluation des propriétés ni pour l'évaluation des revenus. Quel sera le résultat, si on impose la taxe directe? Il faudra une légion innombrable d'employés publics.

Il n'y a pas longtemps, je me joignais aux honorables membres de ce côté-ci de cette Chambre et je leur donnais la main pour opposer une mesure du gouvernement, et une des raisons pour lesquelles je me joignais à eux, c'est qu'il s'agissait, en empêchant l'adoption de cette loi, d'empêcher l'augmentation du nombre des employés publics. Les honorables membres n'hésitent pas en ce moment à préconiser un système qui devra lancer dans le pays et dans chacune des municipalités de la Puissance du Canada, un nombre innombrable de collecteurs. Quand on porte à un chiffre le nombre des taxes directes qu'il faudra prélever si nous avons le libre-échange je crois que l'on se trompe encore et que l'on fixe ce chiffre trop bas; car il faudra un montant énorme pour couvrir la perception de ces impôts et payer toutes les personnes qu'il faudra pour faire cette perception.

Les honorables députés se sont plaints de la loi électorale, se sont plaints aussi de la subdivision des comtés faite par le gouvernement conservateur, car disaient-ils, par ce moyen, le gouvernement a exercé une pression sur l'électorat à notre détriment. Que serait-ce si une légion d'employés avaient entre les mains l'électorat, et pouvait le contrôler par le paiement des taxes directes ? Que serait-ce quand viendra le temps des élections, le temps d'en appeler au peuple pour faire changer le gouvernement quel que soit le parti au pouvoir ? Le résultat serait que les officiers du gouvernement pressureraient l'électorat pour obtenir son suffrage en faveur du parti au pouvoir, quel qu'il soit. Les honorables députés ne semblent pas craindre cet état de chose. Je considère qu'ils ont gagné beaucoup en hardiesse depuis quelque temps. Je crois que nous ne serions pas justifiables dans les circonstances d'adopter la résolution proposée par l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright), ce serait tenir une conduite étrange à l'égard de la nation si nous adoptions une telle politique.

Je crois que bien que nous en ayons le pouvoir, il n'est pas raisonnable d'adopter une telle proposition, lorsqu'il y a à peine un an la nation entière s'est déclarée pour la protection, puisque le gouvernement a remporté les élections pour la troisième fois sur cette question, malgré toutes les prévisions des honorables membres de ce côté-ci de la Chambre. La nation serait en droit de nous reprocher notre conduite à son égard. Notre conduite envers elle serait celle qu'on tient à l'égard de cette fille qu'on allait marier : le père la promet, la mère la donna, et la famille se réjouissait de l'union désirée. Quand vint le tour du prêtre de demander à la fiancée, selon l'usage, si elle acceptait l'alliance qu'on lui proposait. Homme de bien, dit-elle, vous êtes le premier qui avez songé à me faire cette question, et elle refusera.

M. l'Orateur, au jour des comices populaires, lorsque l'officier de la loi demandera à la nation si elle accepte l'alliance commerciale qu'on lui propose, je crois qu'elle répondra : Homme de bien, vous êtes le premier qui songez à me faire cette question-là, et elle refusera sa confiance au parti actuel, s'il est résolu de l'engager dans une alliance qui devra avoir pour elle des suites si funestes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, this important subject has been discussed at such great length and with so much ability, that there is very little left for me to say, and I do not know that I can add any interest to the debate. I can, perhaps, hope to do more than to answer an objection or two that have been raised, and can, perhaps, endeavor to impress upon the House a few of the points that have been touched upon. I am aware, Sir, that in discussing this question we were called upon by the Minister of Marine to give weighty and important reasons why we should introduce this resolution, because, he said, it was a question so far reaching in its importance, so vast in its magnitude, that he considered the responsibility very great for any one to introduce such a resolution into this Parliament. Well, Sir, our reasons have been given, given more ably than I can hope to do. Instead of reciting them, I would say that I consider they might, perhaps, be summed up in this, that the reason that we have introduced this motion is in order that we may materially benefit the people of Canada. Sir, it has been charged upon us that we picture the country in blacker colors than it should be pictured. It has been charged upon the Opposition that they decry their country, charges of lack of patriotism have been hurled at us because the mover of this resolution, and some of the gentlemen who succeeded him in debate on this side, have felt it necessary to point out that there has been, during many years past, a large exodus of the young men and the old men of this land into other lands, and they claim that is decrying the country, and say that we ought virtually to be ashamed of ourselves. Now, Sir, I do not think that we have decry the country, I do not think these gentlemen, in stating what they do, decry the country.

I hold, Sir, that we have a good country; I hold there is no country under the canopy of heaven that is a better country than Canada. If I were asked to prove it I think I might do so by asking hon. gentlemen present if they know of any other country under the sun that could manifest so great a degree of prosperity as Canada does to-day, whose affairs have been so mismanaged as those of Canada, Sir, it is the mismanagement of the country, it is the mismanagement of the Government, that these gentlemen complain of; and when they point to the fact that our population is leaving us, it is not that they glory in it, they regret the fact, they point out the causes, they seek for a remedy in order that this exodus may be stopped. But I do not wish to dwell upon this point, I am one of those who would be delighted if it were not necessary to allude to these things at all. But when we find that during the last decade, instead of 20 per cent. being added to our population, which would only be a small estimate of the natural increase of this country alone, to say nothing of immigrants coming to us of other lands, there has only been an increase of 16 per cent. to our population, in 10 years, when, from the natural increase alone, it should be 20 per cent.; when you find that you have lost every immigrant that came to the country and 4 per cent. of your natural increase besides, it is time to enquire whether we are managing affairs in such a way as will redound to the best interest of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look out to see where the hundreds of thousands of Canadians that have left us, have gone, where do we find them ? In England ? No. In France ? No. In Germany ? No. In Australia ? No. Where then ? Almost wholly within the borders of the nations to the south of us. Why did they go there ? Was it because they loved the flag that floats o'er that nation more than the flag that they left ? No, for they loved the old flag. Was it because they admired the political institutions of that country more than the political institutions of this country ? No, I am satisfied they would tell you that was not the reason. Was it because they had greater liberty there than in this country ? I am prepared to say that was not the reason. On being asked the reason, what would they say ? They would tell you that they went there because they thought they would obtain there a larger field and a better field for their energy and their enterprise. To the Minister of Marine who asked us to give an answer why we had brought such an important question as this before the House, I would say that one of the objects we hoped to attain by this resolution is to ascertain upon what terms we can acquire the right to work that field without leaving our own homesteads to do it. That, Sir, is one of our reasons. It has been said to us, it was said to us by the hon. member for Picton (Mr. Tupper) who spoke so fluently and pleasantly the other night, that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Macdonald) and others who instituted comparisons between this country and the United States did so in a very unfair manner. The hon. gentleman was forced, however, to admit that when a comparison was made it was not to the advantage of Canada, and he took refuge in a statement, which I think upon reflection he himself would not have cared to make. Possibly I am wrong, possibly the growth that is expected in this country by our Conservative friends may be measured by the standard he set up on that occasion, possibly their desires with respect to the development and extension of the country may be no higher than the standard he set up; but I must say for my part that I am not content to measure the standard of Canada, and Canadian progress by the standard set up by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. What did he say when he lectured those who had preceded him on this side of the House for instituting comparisons with the neighboring republic ? He said that it was not fair to compare Canada with four or five millions of people with the United States with sixty millions. Could anything, he asked, be more unfair? If they had been honest and fair in their desire as regards making a comparison, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would have compared the progress made by Canada with the progress made by the United States when that country contained four or five millions. Sir, is that the standard set up by the Conservative party by which to measure our country and to rest content with it. No wonder we are depressed, no wonder that we are confined within narrow bounds, no wonder there is a lack of enterprise on the part of the men controlling our destinies if they are content with Canada progressing in the same ratio as the United States prospered when they had the same number of inhabitants as Canada has at the present time. In 1800 the United States had half a million more people than Canada has to-day. Seven years before the waters of the Hudson were disturbed by the steamboat that Fulton built upon its banks, thirty years or more before Stephenson built his first locomotive to run upon an English railway, thirty years before Faraday had experimented with electricity, forty-four years before Morse had flashed the first message across a telegraph wire, the United States possessed half a million more people than we are to-day. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) asks us in this nineteenth century, in this year 1888, with a cable lying in the depths of the Atlantic ocean across which we flash our commercial and other messages to the people of England, when the whole world is encircled with telegraph wires by which we can read in newspapers the news transpiring in every part of the world, when we have steamboats traversing the ocean and arriving in fleets at our ports, when our country and the countries all about us have lines of railways built, not hundreds, but thousands upon thousands of miles—with this state of things existing we are asked to be satisfied because we prosper as well as the United States did in 1800? What labor-saving appliances have we had since then? The hon. gentleman talked of the volume of trade, and said that even in 1840 the volume of trade in the United States was not as great as that of Canada to-day. Would he expect it? Has it not been by the great labor-saving appliances brought into use that the rapid advance has been made of recent years? Would you expect an increase of commerce in 1840 in proportion to the advance and development that might be expected in a young nation like Canada? No, the standard is too low. I regret that such a standard is set up by one of the principal speakers of the Government in this House as a standard by which we are to judge our progress, and if it comes up to that standard we should be content. We have been told that this is a bold and revolutionary measure we propose. That was one of the utterances, I think, of the Minister of Marine, that it was a bold and revolutionary measure. Yet the same hon. gentleman before he finished his speech declared that this Government had on the Statute-book of the land a standing offer to the Americans to reciprocate with us in trade. And the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) told us that the Finance Minister had in Washington made an offer for reciprocal trade with the neighboring nation in the broadest and freest possible manner, and yet we are denounced as guilty of treason because the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has seen fit to introduce a resolution to sanction just what Sir Charles Tupper, the British plenipotentiary, according to the statement of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) offered to the American plenipotentiaries when in the city of Washington but a few weeks ago. The hon. gentleman for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) told us that this proposition involved national degradation and abject surrender, and that we are called upon to commit a deed of infamy. What does the hon. gentleman think of the Minister of Finance proposing the consummation of such a deed of unparalleled infamy? The Minister of the Interior told us in his speech, in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford, that he very much doubted if people so high spirited as Canadians would be content to accept a measure of unrestricted reciprocity, even if Great Britain were willing to grant it. I was rather amused when the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) called our attention to the fact that if that were treason now, if that was a mean and despicable thing to propose, the members on this side of the House were not alone in venturing to propose such resolutions. The Minister of the Interior brought to the attention of the House the fact that leading business men in this country assembled in convention, sent to advise upon this question and to promote the welfare of this country as well as possible, meeting in the National Board of Trade have discussed this question in the year 1874, and in the year 1874 the representative business men in Canada had decided that it would be a wise, and a proper, and a just thing, and a prudent thing to do, to initiate measures looking towards the renewal of the reciprocal trade arrangements that existed between the United States and Canada for some years previous. Sir, it will not weary the House, I think—for, perhaps, some gentlemen present now were present then—if I read the propositions of those prominent gentlemen, so as to let you know what their views were, and to show you that this is not a question suddenly sprung upon the country, as those gentlemen would lead us to believe. It is a question which has exercised the business men of this country and those who have thought of the interests of this country ever since the day that the treaty was abrogated. It was in the year 1874 that this matter was brought up. At that meeting which I have referred to there were representatives of the National Board of Trade of the United States and Canada present and a prominent gentleman of our Board, always active, for he has always been an active man in business so long as I can remember, made some remarks upon the desirability of renewing the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States prior to submitting a motion for adoption by that body. He had been speaking of the abrogation of the treaty and stated that we had got along without it, and he says:

"Therefore I believe we have great reason to trust that before long we will realise what is the fond desire and hope of every true patriotic Canadian—that we should have more extended commercial intercourse with our neighbors."

And again:

"Now, Sir, although the figures which I propose to present indicate that we have prospered in spite of the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, yet the progress of the country during reciprocity will show that it cannot but be for the advantage of Canada as it certainly will be for the advantage of the United States that closer commercial relations should exist between the two countries."

It would be well worth while, Sir, to read it all, but I am not very fond of reading extracts or of troubling the House with them, but to get the views of an eminent business man as this upon this question, I think we should hear something of what he says. He concluded with summing up the figures of how the country had prospered under the old Reciprocity Treaty and continues:

"I think the figures I have given prove that this country has prospered and can prosper without that treaty. But I think no one can look to the position of both countries on this continent—coming to the discussion of this question on equal terms, each feeling that it can prosper without the treaty—without realising that it would be to the advantage of both to have the freest possible intercourse."

I do not know any stronger words than those: "The freest possible intercourse." And again;

"Here we are with a common line of frontier extending some four thousand miles, with many interests in common, with the same language, religion, and traditions, each proud of and loyal to his own form of government but willing to respect the national sentiment of the other; and it does seem to me that the closer we can bring our commercial relations the more prosperous will both countries become."

Entertaining those views, Sir, and expressing them in such admirable language you will not be surprised to learn that he closed his remarks by moving the following resolution:—

"That this board desires to express its gratification at the growing sentiment among our neighbors in the United States in favor of more intimate reciprocal trade relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada as evidenced by the resolutions passed by the National Board of Trade;

"And that it be instruction to the Executive Council to take whatever steps it may deem necessary in order to secure the adoption of a treaty for reciprocal trade with the United States upon a broad, comprehensive and liberal basis."

Sir, the mover of that resolution upon which every patriotic Canadian should unite, is the name of a distinguished gentleman, a gentleman whose name has long been known to the Boards of Trade of Canada, a gentleman whose name is known in the history of this country—the name of the Hon. Thomas White, Minister of the Interior. This is the gentleman who thinks that no Canadian ought to be too high spirited to accept a treaty even with the United States of America. Sir, this resolution was seconded by another prominent gentleman and in seconding the resolution he said:

"I feel indisposed to make any lengthy remarks after the eloquent speech of Mr. White. He has established the fact that this Dominion can prosper without the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty; and he has also established the fact that in the interest of the progress of both this country and the United States we ought to have reciprocal trade between the two countries."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I commend the next statement to the gentlemen who greeted me with "hear, hear."

"This question should be regarded in the broad light of humanity. It is a matter of the greatest consequence to us in this country that we should live on the most amicable terms with our friends across the lines. We should cultivate peace in every possible way, and I believe there is no manner in which peace can be more thoroughly cultivated between two great nations than by reciprocal trade relations between them."

Who was the seconder of that resolution? It was Adam Brown. Yet, Mr. Speaker, you saw how that patriot's breast heaved and how he throbbed with feeling as he contemplated the dire act of treason about to be consummated by my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); how he looked into different authors, if possible in order to find words that would faithfully describe the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), yet he was the gentleman who in 1874 seconded that resolution and seconded it in the "broad spirit of humanity."

Mr. LANDERKIN. He has got inside of the tiger since then.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, he has got inside of the tiger. Possibly it may be so. It is nothing much in the debate of course and it is nothing much to be considered because those gentlemen in time have altered and changed their views. But I would just say this, that when their views have changed and changed so radically, it would befit them in describing their opponent to use somewhat milder terms than they did, for as they have seen new light it is possible others may see new light too, and, therefore, they ought not despise men whom they consider to be in the darkness in which they themselves grovel. We are told, Sir, that this is "cringing" to the United States. I do not see any cringing to the United States in making this proposition. I do not consider it cringing to the United States when Mr. Bayard, a leading statesman of that country, invites a proposition like this on our part. When Mr. Bayard writing to Sir Charles Tupper, a couple of months ago, used such language as this:

"I am confident we seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement and there is but one way to promote it and that is by a straight forward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

When Mr. Bayard makes a proposition of that kind in writing to Sir Charles Tupper, I see no "cringing" to the Americans if we say: "We are willing to accept the proposition you have made, we are willing in the great legislative halls of this country to pass a resolution stating that we also desire that which you have said." And, Sir, it seems to me it would have been a fit and proper thing, if the health of Sir Charles Tupper had permitted it—and we all regret his absence through illness—for him to be present and move the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, to give effect to the very views he expressed in reply to those entertained in common with him by Mr. Bayard; for what is the reply that he made to Mr. Bayard's letter proposing that we should take this means of dealing with the entire commercial affairs of these people:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straight forward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Can there be stronger language? We cringe not to the Americans. The proposition suggesting the solution was first made to us by Mr. Bayard in this letter to Sir Charles Tupper; Sir Charles Tupper concurs in the sentiment; and the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford simply asks this House to concur in the sentiment held both by Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Bayard. But we are told by the hon. member for Pictou that Mr. Bayard receded from that position on the 7th of December in his reply to the offer of the British plenipotentiaries. I do not so read it. I understand Mr. Bayard in the correspondence—and I have read it carefully—to say, that we do not desire to mix up in the consideration of the question we are now met to consider, another question of great importance. I understand him to be ready and willing to enter upon negotiations in regard to that matter, and to endeavor to carry out what he himself had suggested; but he did not deem it wise to ask Congress to give the Administration power to do it in that connection; for he looked for a solution of the fisheries question, as he said, by agreeing to an interpretation or modification of the treaty, and in that way alone. But we have no right to say, because he took that position in reference to the method of dealing with the question, that he had receded from the position he had taken, that it was in the interest of both countries that the entire commercial relations of both countries should be reviewed with the view of effecting permanent reciprocity of trade between them. But, Sir, it has been charged upon us that in this proposition submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford, there is some covert treason; it has been hinted that there is a desire for an annexation, and that the adoption of this resolution would mean a change in the political relations of the country. Sir, I do not believe it; I trust it is not necessary for me to say in this House that I do not desire that. Where is the danger? What does Mr. Bayard say in reference to that matter? Does he stipulate that in adjusting our commercial relations, and in effecting reciprocal trade relations with the United States, either country shall alter its political status? No; he is very positive on that. After having used the words I have quoted, he adds:

"I say commercially, because I do not propose to include, however, indirectly, or for any intentment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to affect the legislative independence of either country."

I say, Mr. Speaker, that no words can more fitly describe the resolution offered by the hon. member for South Oxford. And now, we come to consider the question as to how it will affect us. Our opponents have argued on this matter, it seems to me, on different lines. Their arguments have been somewhat contradictory; the positions taken by them have been—I trust I may speak it without offense—somewhat mixed; I have endeavored to listen to them. I have noticed, and I think, you, Sir, cannot have failed to observe that they would in many cases lead off with an argument that no reciprocity could benefit the agriculturist, the miner, or the fisherman, that instead of that, it would possibly do them harm, and yet before they would resume their seat, they would point with pride to that standing offer which we have on the Statute-book of the country as something they could boast of. Why, Sir, I can scarcely understand their position; yet it may, perhaps, not be as contradictory as it first appears. It may be that, they think they are safe in offering that, as the United States will never accept reciprocity on such terms. That may be the solution of their position. Now, Sir, we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States for twelve years, and what was its effect on the trade of the two countries. I do not intend to use more than one or two tables of figures. I do not think they have been given just in the way I propose to give them, or I would not submit them to the House; but in considering this question, I think it well to look at the extent of our trade with the United States under that old treaty, to see whether the Americans have been to blame in refusing to treat on the old lines; and if it should be found that that old treaty was working much more advantageously to Canada than to them, we could not find great fault with them if they manifested a reluctance to renew it on precisely the same basis, but that there would be much to be said for their contention that if there was to be a renewal of trade relations, the treaty must be somewhat broader, and they must participate somewhat more in the benefits intended to be secured by it than they did before. What are the facts in regard to our trade in the last year of the treaty? I have looked up in the Trade and Navigation Returns the trade in horned cattle, horses, sheep, wool, butter, and cheese under the head of animals and their produce, and I found that our imports from them and exports to them compared with our total imports and exports in these articles in that year were as follows:—

| Article. | Total Imports. | Imports from the U. States. | Total Exports. | Exports to the U. States. |
| Horned cattle..... | 92,224 | 91,624 | 4,312,222 | 4,312,142 |
| Horses..... | 104,404 | 101,767 | 2,590,725 | 2,590,505 |

| Total..... | 943,775 | 872,505 | 10,447,152 | 9,514,333 |

The only item in which we took more from them than they took from us was that one item of cheese. I then took agricultural products—barley, rye, oats, corn, flour, beans and peas, and vegetables—and I found our imports from them and our exports to them compared with our total imports and exports in these articles in the same year to have been as follows:

| Article. | Total Imports. | Imports from the United States. | Total Exports. | Exports to the United States. |

| Animals and their produce..... | 943,775 | 872,505 | 10,447,152 | 9,514,333 |

Total Exports to United States.....$28,806,979
Total Imports from United States.....5,067,272

Balance in our favor.....$23,739,707

*Price per barrel, $4.90.

†Price per barrel, $6.

Thus you will see that of these different articles which I have enumerated, the products of the farm, the fisheries and the forest, we imported from the United States to a total value of $5,067,272, while we sold to them to the extent of $23,806,979; or in that year we sold to them $23,739,707 more than we bought. Looking at these figures, it will hardly be expected that the United States would be very anxious to renew the treaty upon the basis of the old Reciprocity Treaty; and you must remember that I have quoted only the figures from the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I have not had time to examine the returns of the Maritime Provinces, but no doubt they would very much swell the balance in favor of our exports. I was a little anxious to ascertain how the trade is running to-day; and on taking the returns of precisely the same articles, I find that although the treaty has been abrogated we send a very large quantity of the products of the farm, the forest, the sea and the mines to the United States, despite the imposition of heavy duties. The following is a list of our exports to as compared with our imports from the United States of animals and their products since the abrogation of the treaty, for the year ending 30th June, 1887, taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns:

| | Imports from the U. States. | Exports to the U. States. |
| Horned cattle..... | $50,497 | $ 887,756 |
| Horses..... | 83,624 | 2,214,338 |
| Sheep..... | 73,447 | 974,482 |
| Wool..... | 2,098 | 288,251 |
| Butter..... | 51,733 | 17,207 |
| Cheese..... | 4,573 | 30,667 |
| Total..... | $275,972 | $1,412,701 |

Or, we imported from the United States of these articles to the value of $275,972, while we sold to them to the value of $1,412,701, so that you will see the balance is in our favor even to-day, notwithstanding the very high duties imposed against us. I will now give you, Sir, a statement of our imports from and exports to the United States of agricultural products:

| | Imports. | Exports. |
| Barley..... | $ 2,557 | $5,245,969 |
| Oats..... | 9,611 | 12,216 |
| Corn..... | 884,125 | 105 |
| Wheat..... | 18,307 | 265,940 |
| Flour..... | 630,592 | 3,201 |
| Beans..... | 7,588 | 206,617 |
| Peas..... | 6,399 | 331,349 |
| Rye..... | 2,539 | 12,350 |
| Hay..... | 4,936 | 670,749 |
| Potatoes..... | 35,837 | 328,602 |
| Total..... | $1,600,491 | $7,077,094 |

Or, taking the total of the two statements, I find we imported from the United States goods to the value of $2,433,087, while we exported to them to the value $23,195,330. Hon. gentlemen will therefore see that the United States having access to Trade returns just as we have, will find the balance of trade too largely in our favor, and it seems to me that when we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that they are willing to negotiate a reciprocity treaty on the basis of natural products, which was the basis of the old treaty, they are simply declaring that they are prepared to accept something it is not likely they themselves believe the United States will be prepared to concede.

Mr. BOWELL. Are you quoting from the Trade and Navigation Returns of Canada.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, I am. Does it make any difference?

Mr. BOWELL. It would take too long for me to explain.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think I know what the hon. gentleman means, judging by a question he asked the other night; and I contend that the duties paid on this $23,000,000 worth of goods, which we send to the United States, and on which the United States levy a heavy duty, comes almost entirely out of the pockets of the farmers, the lumbermen and the fishermen of this country. The reason is clearly to be seen, and has been fully explained by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald). There is such an immense production of these articles in the United States, that the quantities sent in by Canadians do not swell the volume of supply to such an extent as to affect the prices; and there is this further fact to be borne in mind, that the amount I have mentioned here is already embraced in the volume of supply in the United States, because the goods have been sent there notwithstanding the duty. I contend, therefore, that if the duty were off, the supply would be no greater, the demand remaining the same, and the prices would remain stationary. Thus the whole of the duty would go into the pockets of the Canadian exporter, who has to find a market for those articles in the United States. The hon. the Minister of Customs asked, how do you know there is any duty paid on them at all; they might have gone there in bond? So they might. It is true our trade returns do not show that; but in order to be sure on that point, I also took the returns of the United States, and I found that the articles I have enumerated are on the dutiable list in the United States returns, equal in amount to the total amount of the returns sent from here. There need, therefore, be no doubt about that matter, and the American tables are here for reference if the hon. the Minister thinks I have made any mistake. The hon. the Minister of the Interior gave us tables to show that the products of Canada were selling in the United States at lower figures than in Canada. He solemnly read the figures here, and almost wound up his speech with a table of that kind. What was his object? If the hon. gentleman believed that that was the actual state of the American markets as compared with Canadian markets, then I ask him how he can justify himself in keeping an offer on our Statute-book to induce the farmers of the United States to send in their cheap products here and to put down the prices in all agricultural products? Then I ask how does he justify himself in keeping an offer on the Statute book of Canada to give the markets of Canada to our neighbors, to allow them to send in their cheap products here and to keep down the price of our products? He knows, and he admitted that the price of products was higher in the United States than it was in Canada, and, if we had a free market here, the duty which is paid into the American treasury would go into the pockets of the Canadian exporter, and we would be so many of millions of dollars richer than we are now. You will find that he admits that the farmer would get more for what he sells to the States if the American duty was removed. He said the whole of our exports to the United States upon which duty was charged amounted to about $26,000,000, and the duty paid on that amount to about $5,000,000, and that assuming that we paid that duty we would save by unrestricted reciprocity that $5,000,000, but would sacrifice the duty on American goods coming into Canada, amounting to over $7,250,000. That is his position. He admits that we would save the $5,000,000, though we would lose $7,250,000. Is not that rather hard on the farmer? If that amount were saved, it would go into the pockets of the farmer and the lumberman and the fisherman. Is that to be taken out of the pockets of these classes in order to benefit one class alone? Certainly not. I notice that he uses another argument and that is this: Admitting, he said, that we paid the duty, as he did admit, the price could only be increased to the farmers of Canada in relation to one-tenth of their whole product. They produce $400,000,000 and they only export $40,000,000 of goods, and, therefore, he says, you would only benefit them by one-tenth of their whole yield, if you had reciprocity. What he said you wanted to do was this: Do not be so careful to enhance the price of the surplus export of one-tenth of what you produce. What you have to do is to improve the home market where you sell the great bulk of your produce. Let us examine that statement a little. He admits that the 10 per cent. which we export would be advanced in price by the amount of the duty. Let us illustrate that. We will take Buffalo and Toronto or Montreal, and Boston and Halifax, or Charlottetown and Boston. We have a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. The duty of 20 per cent. is taken off horses. The horse that was selling in Canada at $80, the buyer from Buffalo offers $100 for, because the duty is taken off. He buys that horse, he gets, according to Mr. White's own admission, $20 more for that horse than he would have got when the duty was on; but he says, what does it matter if you do; there are nine horses that you have to sell in Canada; that is what you want to look at. We will suppose that the buyer from Buffalo is there and has paid $100 for the horse. A buyer from Toronto wants the other nine horses for $80 a piece. No, says he, I want $100 for those horses. I got $100 for the horse I sent to Buffalo, and, if you do not give me $100 for the others, the man in Buffalo will get them instead of getting one; and therefore, if you increase the export price of your horses, which he says amounts to one-tenth, you increase the price of the horses for sale at home as well as in the foreign market. I think that is patent and apparent to every one. The hon. gentleman asked how the home market was to be improved. He says it is by building up an urban population, that the market is to be improved. How is that going to be done? Look at the city of Toronto, I am glad to agree with the Minister of the Interior in this matter. I hold that it is a benefit to the farmers of this country to have towns, and cities, and villages built up in this country. I have always maintained that the justification for the incidental protection that was given to the manufacturers of this country by reason of the imposition of duties was to give a market to the farmers; I thought it tended to build up towns and cities so that the farmers would find a market for their produce. I thought it was a great thing to see cities like Toronto, Hamilton, Halifax, Charlottetown and other cities spring up, because, as you increase the number of the dwellers in towns and cities, you are creating a larger demand for the products of the farm and the field. But, while that is true, it is also true that we are growing more produce in this country than will supply the market, and a portion has to be sent abroad. Nevertheless, it is a benefit to the farmer to have a home market, to have cities and towns built up in his own country, and I desire to see them built up, and to see these cities and towns that will provide a home market for the Canadian farmer, giving more demand for what he grows, and I propose to accomplish that by voting for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford and by seeing it carried into effect. The growth of Toronto has been great, the growth of Montreal has been great, but, if you carry out the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford, what do you have as a home market for the Canadian manufacturer, and the Canadian farmer? You have the city of New York, you have Brooklyn, you have Jersey City for a home market, with their three millions of people, and if you pass the reciprocity treaty, you have Buffalo with its 200,000 people for a home market, you have Boston with its 400,000 inhabitants for a home market, you have Chicago with half a million people for a home market, you have the great and growing city of Detroit with its 200,000 people for a home market, the moment you carry this treaty into effect. If the hon. Minister of the Interior wants to see towns, and cities, and villages built up to give a market for the Canadian farmer, I point to a more excellent way by which the Canadian farmer can get a home market with millions of people in cities which have not to be built up but which are built up, and are waiting to buy the produce of the Canadian farmer, and will become his home market. One of the very serious charges made against the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and more particularly against our honored leader, is that we have broken faith with the people of the country and have broken faith with our late leader, Mr. Blake—who, we are glad to learn, is getting benefited in health by his residence abroad—by the introduction of this resolution, and they say that we, as a party, are pledged by Mr. Blake in his speech which they refer to as the Malvern speech, fully pledged to the National Policy, and not to disturb existing arrangements. This has been dwelt upon by every speaker, I think. It has been one of their strongest points. The Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Marine, the member of Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and, I believe, all the other gentlemen who have spoken on that side, have urged this point very strongly. A breach of faith, a something that should not be done—and the Minister of the Interior gave to us a portion of that speech as delivered by our leader at Malvern, and, Sir, I may just repeat again what was said, and which he quoted as being said:

"We have no longer a large surplus to dispose of. We have a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet, and it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear. I then declared that any re-adjustment should be effected with due regard to the legitimate interests of all concerned. In that phrase, 'all concerned,' I hope no one will object to my including, as I do, the general public. In any re-adjustment I maintain that we should look especially to such reduction of expenditure as may allow of a reduction of taxation, to the lightening of sectional taxes; to the lightening of taxation upon the prime necessities of life, and upon the raw materials of manufacture, to a more equitable arrangement of the taxes which now bear unfairly upon the poor as compared with the rich, to a taxation of luxuries just so high as will not thwart our object by greatly checking consumption, to the curbing of monopolies of production in cases where, by combination or otherwise the tariff allows an undue and exorbitant profit to be exacted from consumers, and to the effort—a most important point—to promote reciprocal trade with our neighbors to the south."

And, Sir, here is the speech which the late leader, the hon. Mr. Blake, delivered at Malvern. Now, I would like to know what breach of faith there is with reference to this matter. Do not the hon. gentlemen opposite know what the National Policy is? Do they know what it was they propounded to the country? Do they believe that they themselves are standing by the National Policy as they said they would? Let me recall to them what their National Policy is. Let me read to them the resolution that was offered by the present Prime Minister of Canada when he was leader of the Opposition, in 1878, the resolution upon which, he said, they took their stand, upon which they would fight their contest, and which, if they were victorious, they would carry into effect when they came into power, and which they claim, having come into power, they have carried into effect. Here is the resolution:

"That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious re-adjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; and such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen, now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada will demand, will greatly tend to produce for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade."

What does that mean?

Mr. HESSON. It does not mean unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Oh! Well, I would like the hon. gentleman, as he has been kind enough to give an explanation—I would ask him, in all good faith, what reciprocity of trade it referred to?

Mr. HESSON. The natural products of the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The natural products only? Yes, I see. Very well. Then here is the position gentlemen are in now. They represented—for I have the right hon. gentleman's words and could read them—how agriculture was depressed as well as the manufacturing industry, and mining, and all others, and the only remedy proposed for the agricultural depression, as well as for the manufacturing depression, was this, that they would put the duties upon Yankee grains coming into this country, so that the farmers might have release, by the imposition of these duties, just as the manufacturers were to have. And now we are told that since they did that, they are willing to take these duties off Yankee grains and let that come in here, but you cannot take it off your manufactured goods, for it will do them harm. Is that the position the hon. gentleman takes? Sir, there is no distinction in the industries there, and hon. gentlemen are as much bound by that resolution to promote reciprocal trade with the United States in manufactures as they are in agricultural products, every bit, and in mining, and in all other interests. Why, Sir, I can read you where the First Minister, in making this speech, pointed out the condition of the farmer; I can read you how he alluded to the fact that his interests were being greatly damaged by the introduction of these articles. Why, he gave us the case? He said:

"I find that the farmers of West Canada and East Canada could not understand there was anything in barley, for instance, being obliged to pay a duty of 15 per cent. upon going in the United States, whereas the produce of the American farmer was allowed to be brought into this country free."

And his voice trembled, I can remember, almost, as he pictured the state of the farmer. I put a simple case—which I have done frequently and I can get no answer—I put the case of a man in the Eastern Townships, dwelling near the imaginary line between this country and the United States. Suppose a man has 100 acres on the Canadian side and 100 acres on the American side of the line. He grows 100 bushels of barley on the American side and takes it to the American market and gets $1 a bushel for it; he takes his 100 bushels of barley grown on the Canadian side to the same market and gets but 85 cents a bushel for it, because he has to pay 15 cents for taking it across that imaginary line. How can it be said in this case that the consumer pays the duty? It comes out of the pockets of the Canadian farmer. And so he goes on to show why the agricultural interest was depressed as well as the manufacturing, mining, and all other interests, and there was only one remedy that would give us relief and that was reciprocity with the United States, and failing getting reciprocity with the United States in all these industries, duties were to be imposed upon all the products of the farms as well as upon manufactures in order that Canadian farmers might get relief. And these are the gentlemen who say that faith is broken with the country; these are the gentlemen who, themselves, stand pledged by their own policy to secure reciprocal trade arrangements in all the industries of the country, as soon as it can be effected. They have to do that or they have to take the line already adopted by the hon. member for North Perth, that when the First Minister moved that resolution, he was moving it as a direct rod on the farmers of this country, to treat them differently from other classes. They can adopt which form of the dilemma they choose.

Mr. HESSON. The farmers are not fools.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The farmers are not fools, but all men are not farmers. Now, then, what did Mr. Blake say? Mr. Blake was the leader of the Liberal party. It was not a strange thing for Mr. Blake to think that it was possible that he might be successful in the contest, that the Liberal party might be called upon to assume the reins of Government and to manage the affairs of the country. Sir, I say it was not an impossible thought for him to harbor, if he did harbor it, of which I am not able to speak positively, because I think the people of Canada, if they had understood their own interests, nay more, if the battle had been fought out in a fair, honorable and manly manner, would have put the Liberal party in power; and he had a right to expect it. Canada should never, in my judgment, have sent back to power a party with such a record as gentlemen opposite left behind them, a record foul with injustice, a record of which they themselves ought to be ashamed. I say it was not an improbable thing, then, that he should have thought that it was probable that the country would, when it had the opportunity, say to hon. gentlemen opposite: You have misgoverned us, you have mismanaged our affairs, you have heaped up the debt of the country, you have demoralised our public sentiment, you have done things unmanly and unfair, you have used your power to place your opponents at a disadvantage and you have not dared to meet them on a fair and open field. He had a right to expect that the Liberal party would be entrusted with the reins of Government. What did he do? He did what it was his duty to do. Expecting he would be called upon to take office, knowing he had protested against the burdens placed upon the country, knowing that he had set his face as a flint against imposing burthens, he perhaps thought within himself; the people will expect that when I am in power that I will be able to greatly reduce the burdens of taxation upon them, but this Government has so increased the expenditure of the country that no man, however desirous he may be to reduce the burdens, can accomplish it except by doing it gradually. He, therefore, gave the country to understand just in what position the people had been placed by the extravagance of the Government, and just what they might expect him to be able to do when he attained office. In stating that he said he was not able to promise such reductions in taxation as he would desire should be made, and therefore there was no danger that the taxation would not be enough to afford all protection to the manufacturing interests of the country, and his policy would be in the future, as it had been in the past, that in raising revenue he would levy duties upon the articles such as could be produced in this country, and at the same time allow the manufacturers to have that degree of protection that was afforded through the operation of a revenue tariff. That was the position Mr. Blake took at that time. But, as the Minister of the Interior read himself, while that was to be the position of affairs so long as the then condition of trade between the two countries existed, he stated in the very same speech, as the Minister of the Interior was fair enough to read, that a most important point to which he would devote himself was the procuring of reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States; and therefore if he had been with us this year, he would have been found, I have not the least doubt, moving on the same lines on which we are now moving and seeking to attain the same object we seek to attain by endeavoring to carry the resolution offered. He did not propose to take off the duties that we had imposed on manufactured goods coming in from the United States, unless the United States removed the duties they charged upon manufactured goods going into that country. The manufacturers were therefore safe, but he told the manufacturers, as he told others: If the United States will consent to have reciprocity trade relations, and will take the duties off goods going into that country, we will remove the duties from their goods coming into this country. That is the position he took at that time, that was his faith, and that was the faith he was obliged to keep with the manufacturers, and that was the faith he did keep, that if the Americans did not consent to remove their duties, then our duties would remain as at the present time. That brings me to consider the point as to how this resolution will bear upon the manufactures of the country. No one attempts to prove seriously—they cannot prove it—they cannot refute the arguments given by a dozen speakers during this debate, that it is impossible for our lumbering and mining interests not to be benefited by reciprocal trade relations with the United States. But they say they will be benefited, but you will drive out one important industry and that is the manufacturing industry. Therefore, the manufacturing industry must be saved at all hazards, even though at a great loss to other interests. Would that be just; would it be carrying out the principles of good government, the greatest good for the greatest number? Is that the principle that governs the hon. gentleman's administration of the affairs of the country. It certainly ought to be so. No one will believe I am anxious or desirous to kill off our manufacturing interests. I certainly would not desire to see the manufacturing interests of the country destroyed, but I am satisfied that our manufacturers will not be destroyed by a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) gave us some instances of gentlemen who telegraphed him and whose telegrams he read to the House, and to them I desire the attention of hon. members. The hon. gentleman has made them part of the history of this country. He has assumed that responsibility, I have not done so. I desire to injure no man in his business, and many of them are gentlemen whom I do not know. I suppose they were conscious of what they were doing, and that the hon. member for Hamilton had permission to read those telegrams to the House. At all events they have become the property of the country, and no one will wonder if they are canvassed over; and all I say in regard to them is to express my surprise that there were in an enterprising city like Hamilton gentlemen who would be willing to say over their own signature that in a fair field they were not able to hold their own. That is the position in which the hon. member for Hamilton has placed certain manufacturers of that city. The amusing part of this is the evidence of the peculiar patriotism that affect some of our friends on the other side. Listen to this:

"Commercial Union would close our forge and preside at the funeral of our rolling mills."

I would not have found such fault if the writer had stopped there, for his declaration would then have been simply a statement that they were unable to hold their own with other people. But the writer adds:

"As loyal Canadians we protest against the possibility of our tariff being arranged for us in Washington."

They protest against the tariff being made at Washington because commercial union will put out our forge and preside at our funeral—there is the prophecy, there is the argument. I can respect one or two of those gentlemen who simply say—I do not find many of them say what I thought, but all speak in about the same strain—I think there was some one here who had stated that commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity would be hurtful to the interests of the country, and abstained from saying it would have a disastrous effect upon themselves. It seems to me that most all of them seem to think that the prosperity of the country is depending on those gentlemen from Hamilton in their own estimation:

"If commercial union should be adopted it would utterly destroy the pipe industry and certainly lead to annexation. Don't let Washington dictate our tariff."

Which are the most particular about—"destructive of their industries or annexation."

"Under commercial union we would have to shut down our works entirely."

ONTARIO ROLLING MILLS."

I much more admire that statement than the other. They say we cannot stand under that, they do not put in any of your loyalty and try to raise up a patriotic cry. This is one of the telegrams I was looking for, I admire that:

"Commercial union would destroy our business in carriage and saddlery hardware, and scales, and would seriously damage stove business."

"BURROW, STEWART & MILNE."

Another telegram saying that we are not equal to our fellow men, not equal to fight our battle on a fair line. A humiliating confession to make, but nevertheless they do not put the loyalty cry into it:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would close every sewer pipe factory in Canada."

"CANADIAN SEWER PIPE CO."

"Unrestricted reciprocity would be hurtful to the country and ruin our business."

"OSBORNE-KILLEY MANUFACTURING MACHINISTS CO."

"We consider that commercial union would be most disastrous to our interests."

"HAMILTON COTTON CO."

That is the kind of telegram I like. They simply state that they are not able to hold their own in competition with their fellow-citizens, and with the men who dwell in the States. If men wish to take that position I have no objection, but I object to people working on their loyalty cant as they do in others of the telegrams. The Managers of the Wheel Works, who employ a large number of people, say:

"After considering the question of Commercial Union in all its different bearings, political, commercial and social, we are of decided opinion that it is not for the interests of this country to entertain the idea. It is but the stepping stone to annexation. As far as our particular business is concerned we are positive it would injuriously affect it, if not altogether destroy it."

Again I want to know whether it is their dread of annexation or their dread of their business being ruined that dominates in the minds of those men. Sir, it makes me suspicious.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is both.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is both, I think the hon. the First Minister says. Well, he will agree with me in this. I have no doubt they are excellent gentlemen and enterprising men, but if unrestricted reciprocity should be carried and as a result it benefits the nine-tenths of the people of this country, is it necessary for the other tenth—comprising Mr. Gartshore, Mr. Beddoe, the Canada Sewer Pipe Co., and D. Morton & Co, who make the National Policy soap, and who say that unrestricted reciprocity if it came into force, they would at once take their business to the United States—is it necessary to keep those gentlemen up at the expense of all the other people of this country? That is the question that is to be considered. Now, they are very important men I have no doubt, and I also think that those gentlemen feel they are important. If Mr. Morton feels he must take his soap works to the United States I presume that Canada would be able to establish another soap works. I fancy so. There have been important men in this world. Mr. Speaker, Palmerston was considered a man of great importance and of great use in his day, but Lord Palmerston served his generation and he fell to sleep. The commercial affairs did not pause one moment in England. There was not even a lull in its rush, and he was quite as great a man as the makers of the National Policy soap. The late Emperor of Germany was a man exercising great influence, and it was considered that it would be a serious matter if he should be removed by death. Death came and he was removed. But the German Empire exists to-day and the German Empire is going on. I fancy, Sir, that probably he was of as much use and as necessary to the existence of Germany as Mr. Beddoe is to the existence of Canada. I fancy that if those gentlemen feel that they must go that Canada will exist. It is not for me nor for you, Mr. Speaker, to take the position because the industries we have will be destroyed that we will not be in favor of a project of a proposal or of a plan that will given millions of increased wealth to be scattered among all classes of the community. And, Sir, I think it is a piece of unparalleled cheek for any member of Parliament to rise in the Canadian House of representatives and seek to sway the people from carrying out a measure designed, and admitted to be greatly in the interest of nine-tenths of the people of this country, because he has secured half a dozen telegrams from as many men in his city saying—"If you do that it will ruin our industries." Sir, I do not believe it would ruin our industries. I trust our manufacturers have got more backbone, pluck, spirit, courage and enterprise than they seem to manifest here.

An hon. MEMBER. Are they Tories or Grits?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Tories, every one of them. I do not know that, but I went over the list and I was told they were Tories.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Every man of them is a Tory.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Now, Sir, it is not only those men who have said this. They can afford to do it. The representatives of the Canadian people have risen in their places, Ministers of the Crown have risen in their places, prominent supporters of the Government have risen in their places, and others will follow them I suppose, and told you "if you adopt reciprocal trade relations with the United States in manufactured goods you will destroy and wipe out the manufacturers of the country."

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." What an insult is implied in that "hear, hear," what are to the men of Canada, to patriotic men, for others to talk and mouth their loyalty and their patriotism, and declare to the whole world that Canada has produced a race of men inferior to the men growing in the United States. That Canada is unable to hold her own I deny, that Canada cannot compete in a fair field without favor from Americans or any other nation under the sun I deny too. The enterprising manufacturers deny it, and, Sir, if this proposition is ever given legislative effect I venture to say that the people of Canada and the manufacturers of Canada by their enterprise and their energy will cause the blush of shame to come on the cheeks of any one who in the past has risen to say that they were not able to hold their own with any man come from where he might, and against all nations of the earth, if they have but fair play. Sir, I ask that gentleman opposite as I ask any hon. gentleman opposite, do you deny that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the United States to-day? You deny it not. Your census placed in your hands and prepared by your own officers declare it. I ask you what position do those Canadians occupy in the neighboring Republic? Are they hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I think not. Go into their cotton and other industries in the neighboring States, and what will you find? You will find that the energy, the enterprise, the skill, the brains, which have made those successful factories, have been supplied, and largely supplied, by the Province of Quebec.

Mr. FISHER. And members of Parliament too.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, go to the legislative hall, and high among the highest you will find Canadians. Sir, they undertook an enterprise of tunnelling one of the everlasting hills. The task defied the skill of their best engineers. Their State took hold of the enterprise, but was a failure; the work was stopped. Money was sunk; what was to be done? Two Canadians say: We will take the job, we will tunnel your mountain. They undertook it; they tunnelled it, and to-day it is a success—a wonder in the eyes of the world. Yet hon. gentlemen tell us we cannot hold our own with the Americans.

Mr. BOWELL. And they were cheated out of their pay.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, you say they were cheated out of their pay; but does that lessen the fact that Canadians were able to do the work that the most skilled engineers in the United States were afraid to attempt? Go into their churches, and you find that their pulpit orators are drawn from the people of Canada. Who are the foremost among their leaders in the legal and medical professions? They are Canadians. And take any position you please, and you will find Canadians at the top.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And who command the Gloucester fleet? Nova Scotia capitalists.

Mr. PATERSON. (Brant). Yes, who sail American ships? Why, Canadians. A great portion of the power and the development that has been given to that country has been given to it by Canadians; and I ask the hon. First Minister, if he is logical, to give an answer that logic demands to this question: If Canadians can leave this their native land, and go to that which is another land, and there, unknown and unfriended, take positions and work their way up to the highest places in the land—not a solitary instance here and there, but the most of them attaining positions as high as the most of the other inhabitants who are native born to that country—if under these conditions they can go and compete with the inhabitants of that which is a foreign land, will he say that they cannot hold the trade of their own country when it comes into competition with that of the Americans in a fair field and with no favor? Sir, I am glad that it is left to hon. gentlemen on the other side to declare that Canada has grown a race of men who are not able to hold their own with the people who dwell in the United States. Why, Sir, go to their marts of commerce, and there their finest business men are Canadians. Go and examine their farms, and then come back and tell me if they know how to till their lands as the Ontario farmers do. My experience is that they do not. No, Sir; in every department and walk of life, in every trade and profession, Canadians are the equals of the dwellers in the United States and the peers of any other people under the sun. But hon. gentlemen take the ground that we are equal to the citizens of the United States, but they claim that they have a larger field for their operations than we have, and therefore we are at a disadvantage. Well, if they take that ground, there is some force in that. A manufacturer in Canada could not be expected, in my judgment, to hold his own in Canada if the manufactured products of the United States were allowed to come into Canada free of duty, while the United States charged a high duty on Canadian manufactured products going in there. The Canadian would be at a disadvantage. The American would slaughter his goods in Canada, as we have been told; and therefore Mr. Blake took the position, and it was the policy of the Mackenzie Government, as it is the policy of this Government, only to a greater extent, to impose duties on articles coming from the States. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who spoke this afternoon, for he is a large business man, speaking of the slaughtering goods in Canada as a result of the adoption of reciprocal free trade with the United States. Sir, if they could do that, I should oppose the proposition. I say Canadians are able to hold their own with the people of the United States, but I do not think you ought to ask Canadians to hold their own weighted down against Americans. But how are you going to slaughter goods under reciprocal trade between the two countries? It is absurd for hon. gentlemen to make a statement of that kind. They lose sight of the fact that the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford is not to take the Canadian bars down and leave the American bars up; it is to take all bars down, to let Canadians go into their fields and then come into ours, and to let the best men win. Under reciprocal trade relations with the United States we will suppose an American manufacturer to try to slaughter goods in this country. We will suppose that a manufacturer of the city of Ogdensburg comes to the city of Ottawa with that intention. He is dealing in a certain line of goods, the price of which at home is 10 cents a lb.; but he has manufactured more than he can sell at home and keep his price up to that figure; so he says: "I will run over to Ottawa and sell my surplus stock there at 8 cents, and I will not break my home price. I will do very well; I will get cost for what I sell in Ottawa, and for what I sell at home I will get 25 per cent. profit." That would be a very good arrangement, but how could he do that if the Canadian bars were down and the American bars were up? But the proposition is all bars down; and how long do you suppose it would be under those circumstances before my traveller from Ottawa would be in every store in Ogdensburg offering that same article at 8 cents a lb? Not twenty-four hours. It would be utterly impossible for slaughtering of goods to go on under reciprocal trade relations, because we could go into their markets and do the same thing there. We would be to all intents and purpose commercially one country; and therefore to say that Canadians cannot hold their own under perfectly equal conditions, is to say something that is not warranted by the facts. Now, I do not wish to read a great deal from the books, but I wish to read something which I think is rather valuable. If you remember, we had a committee on trade depression in the year 1876, when trade was very bad in Canada. There was a committee appointed by the House which took evidence to ascertain what was the cause of the depression in trade and whether any remedy could be applied. Some of the first men of the country were summoned before that committee and examined with reference to the condition of business, and the difficulties in its way. I have not time to read all the evidence; but there was one question put to all these gentlemen, as to whether reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States would remove the difficulties they were laboring under, the answer to which will be found interesting. Many of these gentlemen were advocates of the National Policy, and were seeking to impress upon the committee the necessity of imposing higher duties, which the right hon. the leader of the Government proceeded to do as soon as he obtained power in 1878. I will give you first the statement of W. G. Perley, lumber merchant—I suppose, the present member for Ottawa. Among other questions, he was asked:

"Q. Have the lumbermen any theory as to any steps that might be taken by the Government to relieve this depression of the lumber trade? Do you know of any remedy which the Government could apply? Mr. Perley answered. There is no definite theory among us that I am aware of. Of course, we are all anxious to have the privilege of sending lumber into the United States without duty, if we could have it on fair terms. That would help us greatly. I do not know that there is any direct way of relieving us in any other way.

"Q. Reciprocity, if it can be secured, is the only practical remedy that can be applied? A. I do not know of any other practical remedy."

That is the statement of Mr. Perley. The lumbering industry is the largest manufacturing industry in the country, engages vastly more hands, and, I think, has four or five times more capital invested in it than any other except the flour industry. The next person examined was Mr. J. R. Booth of this city, also a large lumberman. He was asked:

"Q. Do you find the lumber business very much depressed at present? A. Yes.

"Q. Can you suggest any remedy that might be adopted by the Government for your relief? A. I think reciprocity and free trade would relieve it.

"Q. You think free trade would be the best relief you could get? A. In my opinion it would.

"Q. You mean reciprocity with the United States? A. Yes."

Mr. John Ferris, a very large lumberman from New Brunswick, was also examined, and gave the following evidence:

"Q. Your trade with the United States, because depressed when the Reciprocity Treaty was repealed? A. Yes, I have no doubt of it."

Mr. A. H. Gilmour who has been a large lumber merchant in his day was examined. He is a man of this House at present, and I need not read his testimony as he can speak for himself. His testimony was to the same effect as the others. They also examined Mr. George A. Drumond, manager of the sugar refinery, which is an industry that is a good deal talked about and its value to the country debated. Now, he was not asked that question direct. Mr. Drumond was complaining that he was subject to unfair competition by the United States, and what he wanted to urge on the committee was that they should lower the duties on the raw sugar which he imported or else impose a higher duty on the refined sugar; and I think you will find that he claimed he was not fighting the United States without the aid of any protection, but that he was fighting the United States refiner with 55 cents per 100 lbs. discrimination against him. He said:

"It is capable of proof for example, that under the old tariff of Canada I have been paying higher ad valorem duties on raw material than have been charged on refined sugar coming from Boston or New York. It must be admitted that I have been at a disadvantage. I have been carrying on my business not in consequence of the tariff, but in spite of it, not in consequence of protection but in spite of discouragement."

Now, there is the testimony of that gentleman, head of the sugar refinery, that he had held his own against the refiners of the United States, not on equal terms, as he would have under reciprocal free trade with the United States, but with the positive discrimination of 55 cents per 100 lbs. on the American sugar. If that were true, why could not that gentleman hold his own in competition with others? I want to refer to the flour industry, which is the next largest industry to that of the saw mills in this country. And here I might, in passing, allude to the remark of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who contended that under the old Reciprocity Treaty a large quantity of flour came into Canada, and that it was a very ruinous business. If that hon. gentleman would only take the trouble, he would find that if we brought a large quantity of flour into Canada from the United States under the old reciprocity treaty, we sent out a vastly larger amount, and the difference was what we imported we paid $1.90 for, while for what we exported we got $6 a barrel. We simply brought in their wheat and ground it into flour and made money out of the transaction. So the millers will not be found among those who will object to a reciprocity treaty. Let me read you the following letter from Mr. W. H. Howland:

"It may be said that, in spite of all disadvantages, in spite of the bulk of supply for the Lower Provinces comes from Ontario, and why? Because we poor devils have no other market on this side of the Atlantic; and if we do not sell to our own people, we must ship our stuff 3,000 miles away, and take very serious risks of markets. Rather than do this, we are glad to be permitted to undersell the Americans."

He thought we should shut out American flour because they charged duty upon ours. His complaint was not that we could not hold our own against the United States, but that we had to hold our own with our bars down while the United States' bars were up. Here is also the testimony of Mr. William Luke, of the Millers' Association, one of the fathers of the National Policy, whose testimony will certainly be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite. He was engaged in a flour mill, and having been summoned to give his evidence, gave it as follows:

"Q. Why could you not manufacture a particular grade? A. From the fact that I am under the necessity of manufacturing a certain percentage of a very superior grade which must bring me a corresponding value with the American superior flour which they manufacture and sell. If we had the United States market to-day, we would be pleased.

"Q. Then that which would cure all your grievances, as far as legislation could cure them, would be reciprocity? A. I don't know that will be all we would ask. I would, as a miller, rather have the United States market than any tariff or duties.

"Q. If the United States markets were opened to you, you could fairly compete with the millers of the States? A. Yes. There are grades of flour manufactured in the United States at $1 or $2 per barrel higher than in Canada."

Now, then, I propose to give you the testimony of James Goldie, one of the largest flour manufacturers we have in the country, a gentleman who became a supporter of the National Policy, and who opposed my hon. friend from South Wellington, I think on three different occasions, but nevertheless he is one of the largest flour manufacturers in this country, and he was examined in reference to it; and what is his statement when he is asked whether he, as a manufacturer, would be afraid of reciprocal free trade with the United States and of holding his own with them. He was asked:

"If you had free trade with the United States, would you not be able to get wheat in this country from which you could make as good flour as the United States?"

He says:

"I would undertake to compete with all the world if we had the United States market to send it to."

Then he was asked:

"Q. What effect would reciprocity in wheat and flour with the United States have? A. I would not like to say.

"Q. You think that would be the best thing which could be had? A. Of course we would not ask any favors.

"Q. At the time you had reciprocity did you not manufacture very largely for the United States? A. Yes, very largely, and since that, even since paying the duty, I had a large trade—10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 barrels a year."

It is absurd to state that a manufacturer like James Goldie, who sold 15,000 or 20,000 barrels a year in spite of the duty, could not hold his own under free trade, with the United States with their bars down as well as ours. Then, there is the evidence of Mr. Millarky, boot and shoe manufacturer of Montreal, who, I believe, employs some 1,700 or 1,800 hands and has a very large amount of capital invested. What is his testimony in this matter? He was asked:

"Q. Then reciprocity of tariff you think would benefit you? A. Yes.

"Q. Would you prefer a rise in our tariff or a reduction of the American tariff? A. I do not care which it is.

"Q. Then you do not come here to ask for protection? A. I come here to ask for reciprocity of tariff with the United States. If they take their tariff away altogether, I am perfectly willing that ours should be taken away. If they ask for a 35 per cent. duty, I want a 35 per cent. duty.

"Q. You are willing to compete with the United States if we have reciprocal trade with the United States? A. Yes, I should be perfectly delighted with reciprocal trade.

"Q. Free trade then would suit you very well? A. Or reciprocity in tariff. It is immaterial which."

There is the representative of the Boot and Shoe Association of the Dominion, who was summoned here as a witness, to give his testimony in reference to that industry. Then, take the agricultural implement industry, which is one of the largest we have in this country, and is a growing and extending industry. Do you mean to tell me that the men who are engaged in that industry, who have built it up, the men who have the enterprise, and skill, and the inventive mind, the push and the determination of these men, would not be able to hold their own even in the New York market with the Americans. I give their testimony, and first I give that of Mr. Frost, a well-known and prominent manufacturer of agricultural implements. He was asked:

"Q. How does the cost of material, rent and labor in the United States compare with the cost in Canada? A. The machine we sell at Prescott for $75, twelve months' credit, is sold by the American manufacturers at Ogdensburg at $100, American currency, cash down. The difference between the American and Canadian prices is 25 per cent. We can sell at 25 per cent. cheaper than they can in the United States."

"Q. Then it would be an advantage to you to have reciprocity with the United States? A. Yes, we could undersell them."

He says further, when the question is asked:

"Q. You drove the Americans out by being able to undersell them? A. Yes, there was one firm at Worcester, Mass., which took machines into Nova Scotia, to Halifax, from Boston. They sold them for $95 or $100. We sent our machines of the same class down by the gulf port steamers to Pictou, and sold them for $75."

So he does not fear that he will not be able to hold his own. Then John Watson, one of the most enterprising manufacturers in the west, is asked:

"Q. How does the cost of production here compare with the United States? A. I think we can produce as cheap as they."

"Q. What would be the effect, if we had reciprocity with the United States, in your line of business? A. We would hold up both hands for that. There would not then be so many manufacturers conflicting with each other here, for we would strike out with particular branches of the trade, say in one or two articles, and after we had supplied Canada, we could send the balance into the States."

He proposes to do a great business, as a live Canadian, and not to allow the Americans to do it for him. That is the stuff of which true Canadians are made. Then we have Messrs. Corsitt & Bro. They were not able to attend the sittings of the committee, but they wrote a letter which wound up as follows:—

"What we have written answers your enquiries, but we beg leave to remark that our idea of the cause of depression in trade is summed up in this: The supply exceeds the demands in all departments of trade, also, that if allowed an equal chance in honorable competition, we can successfully sell our machines anywhere against American manufacturers."

The Massey Manufacturing Company were not able to come here before the committee, but they sent a letter. They are known to be one of the largest firms we have in Canada, and they sent the following letter:—

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to a communication received this day from the Clerk of Commons, would say. We are engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements and farm machinery. Our average trade is about $100,000 per annum, and this season we are increasing the business about 20 per cent., and with very fair prospects. During the past season we did a foreign trade in Germany to the extent of some $8,000 or $10,000, and we anticipate a continuation of that trade. We may also add that the existing tariff is satisfactory to us, and is sufficient protection; perhaps even a little less would also be. A still further advance in the tariff would certainly prove adverse to our interests."

Now, I have given all these industries and I propose to refer to the cotton industry. What did the manager of the Hochelaga cotton industry state in reference to this matter? He was asked:

"Q. There were a great number of Canadians engaged in the cotton mills of the United States, and now they are desirous of working in Canada, are they not? A. The majority of the help I have, learned in the United States. I have had applications enough from the States lately to fill two or three such mills as mine."

Why, Sir, I have often heard the hon. the Minister of Public Works talk about repatriating his fellow countrymen, and inducing them to come back to Canada. I should not be surprised if one of the results of the adoption of reciprocity were to induce them, that modest, temperate, moderate and able race of people to come back to Canada so that our manufactures could be worked by these men, who would be only too happy to come back to work under the flag they had to leave in order to get work elsewhere. This witness was also asked:

"Q. What would be the effect on your trade providing the duties of the United States were repealed? If we had free trade, could you compete with the American manufacturers? A. I should go for free trade very quickly."

"Q. Do you think you could compete with the American mills? A. We would try."

Then, I give you another, the Cornwall Cotton Co., on page 143.

"Q. Can you produce in your mills, with the same amount of money, labor and machinery, as large an amount as they can in the United States? A. If we had the same labor, yes."

"Q. You say the cost of production in the United States is about the same as here? A. Yes."

He is asked again.

"How do your goods compare with American goods? A. They compare so favorably that we have no trouble in selling against them."

"Q. Are yours not superior to American goods? A. Some kinds are; the Americans make some very fine goods."

"Q. Do they not use more waste than you do? No; A. we try to make good use of all our waste."

"Q. How would reciprocity with the United States affect your business? A. I think that our people would be inclined to go for that, as it would give them access to a larger market."

"Q. You think you can compete with them in their own market? A. Yes; it might bother us for a little while, but I think in the long run it would come out better for us. It would give us what we want by putting us on an equal footing."

The managers of that cotton mill, the largest mill I suppose, we have in the country, give this testimony. I do not know that I have time to read it all, all the other testimonies given here; but I merely mention that the testimony of Robert Mitchell, brass founder, of Montreal, is to the same effect; the testimony of Samuel Platt, Goderich, in the salt industry, is to the same effect; the testimony of Edward Gurney, with reference to the foundry business and stove business, one of the largest manufacturers in that line, is to the same effect. I think it is worth while to put his testimony on record in reference to this matter, because it will be interesting to some to know what his views are, for he is a leading man and considerable importance is attached to his views. Edward Gurney is asked:

"Q. Have they any facilities for manufacturing stoves any cheaper than you can? A. No."

"Q. Suppose you were selling at cost, do you suppose they could sell as low as you can sell, looking at the rents, labor, taxation and everything? A. About the same when you come to take into consideration all the circumstances, and their having to introduce their goods into a new country."

"Q. But yours is an established business? A. Yes. Well, assuming what you presume to be the case, we could make the goods a little cheaper than they. Then we have connection in this country already established, and they have to form one, and any difference there might be would be overcome by this fact."

Then he is asked again.

"Q. If we had reciprocity with the United States in your business, you would be in favor of it? A. I would be more than content."

That is the testimony of Edward Gurney, one of the leading stove founders. Here is the statement of Mr. James Smart, founder, in reference to the same, only he does not speak as positively; the testimony of Wm. Buck, in the same industry, but he does not speak as positively as Mr. Gurney in reference to the matter; he declared that at the time he was making as good a stove as they could make in the United States; and I will vouch for it that he is making as good now. He says, theoretically, he believes free trade would be right, but he is not as sanguine as to holding his own as some others profess to be. I have not tried to overstate these testimonies. These are the men who say that if you give them free access to the United States market, you may let the United States manufacturers come in here and they will be able to hold their own. R. H. Smith, with reference to saws, knives and similar goods, and D. McCrae give the same testimony. In the Canadian market they can hold their own. B. Rosamond, woollen cloth factory, representing the tweed industry, the strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and their candidate in the elections—let me read what Mr. Rosamond says with reference to our woollen cloth industry, on page 208:

"Q. Is the present rate of duty satisfactory to you? A. Yes, under ordinary circumstances it would be. We are in an exceptional position, being alongside of a country which has a high tariff against us; but, under ordinary circumstances it would be satisfactory. The duty is certainly high enough; if we had a country alongside of us which was reasonable, as our people are disposed to be, we would have no difficulty.

"Q. You would be content to have reciprocity with the United States?"

A. Yes, I believe it would be for the benefit of everybody."

That is the testimony of Mr. Rosamond, of the woollen mills. I am afraid I have wearied the House with these quotations, but I thought it would be worth while to place the views of this gentleman upon record in order to show that he and others, who were contending against the Americans when gold was 112 and when there was only a 17½ cents tariff here, were willing and able, under those circumstances, before they had acquired the strength they have now after many years' prosperity, they were willing then and anxious, "they were ready to hold up both hands," as some of them expressed it, for reciprocal free trade with the United States. Now, the hon. the Minister of the Interior made one statement that struck me as having considerable force, and I gave it a good deal of consideration, as, I am bound to say, I endeavor to do with all the statements that come from the other side. He said that if we made a treaty with the United States, it would have to be necessarily a time treaty, and that at the expiration of that time, if the United States were to abrogate the treaty, we might find ourselves, as one result, probably, of reciprocal trade relations, with larger manufactures established, and running on special lines—he thought that we would find ourselves in Canada with large mills and a vast number of them, and would daily be shut up to the restricted market of 5,000,000 instead of having the enlarged mutual market of 65,000,000 as we had during the continuation of the treaty. I say, Mr. Speaker, that statement struck me as having considerable force, and I have given some reflection to it. I do not know whether the conclusion I arrived at would be shared by other hon. gentlemen, but it seemed to me to solve the difficulty, and to remove the danger which I confess I thought there might be. Under reciprocal free trade with the United States there would be an accession to the number of our manufactures here; and I believe, of course, there would be some displacement of capital, there would be some disarrangement of trade. I speak quite cognisant of the fact that I do not know how it would be in my own business. I do not know whether I should be able to hold my own with them. I would be sorry to say that I could not, but I am free to say this, as a representative of a Canadian constituency, charged with the duty of trying to promote the best interest of the people of this country, that I am bound to go for what I consider would be the best interests of the country at large, no matter how it might affect me. There will be displacement, no doubt, of capital, and some men may have to fall in the change. There are misfortunes overtaking people all the time; there are changes taking place even now, within our limits. These things cannot be avoided. Suppose this change were brought into effect, there would be warning given of it, men would arrange their matters accordingly, and I look for this, I believe Canada will not secure all the manufacturing establishments that are going to manufacture goods for the whole continent of America. I do not believe they will all come and locate in Canada; all I expect is that a certain number will, that we will get our full shares in some lines, that we are suited for, will get more than they will, and that having got them, there will be a prosperity to the country resulting from these reciprocal trade relations that will give us an increased population in a ratio greater, I believe, than we can venture to hope at the present time. Therefore, I think that is the solution of the difficulty suggested by the Minister of the Interior. Yes, we will have more factories, the ones that we have in existence will be enlarged and we will be enabled to turn out more than enough products for 5,000,000 people. But I consider before the time limited would expire you would have as many more inhabitants as would make a market for such mills as were erected within the bounds of your own limits. Therefore that objection, to which I attach considerable weight when I first heard it, I have worked out to a satisfactory solution according to my own idea, whether it answers the difficulty in the minds of others I cannot tell. What is the condition of the manufacturers of Canada to-day. Some of them are enjoying very great protection and some are not, and one of the difficulties experienced by many hon. gentlemen on looking at this question is this: they percise the tariff and see that a certain article is proteced 20 per cent, another 25, another 30, another 35, and they say: If those manufacturers require that protection in order to exist, and you wipe out that protection, does that not mean the crushing out of the industry? That would appear to be so on the face of the tariff. I am glad the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is present, for he is a business man and will understand the argument I will address to the House, and will be able to correct me if it is not true. While it is a fact that there is that amount of duty levied on manufactured products in this country, you must bear in mind that the manufacturers are not protected to that amount of duty in many of those lines. That circumstance does away with a great part of the difficulty. Let me explain. I do not like to talk about my own business, but every man understands his own business best, and it may serve as an illustration, and no doubt the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) can give other illustrations from the locomotive works and other industries in which he is interested. The article may be taxed 20 or 25 per cent, and may increase the cost to the consumer, but it is not due to the manufacturer having, say 20 per cent. protection, but it is due to the system of protection itself running through all its ramifications, protecting that which is the raw material as well as the finished product, thereby increasing the cost to the consumer. The protection the Canadian manufacturer has is the difference in the duty on the manufactured article and the duty on the raw material out of which the article is manufactured. Applying that test you will find the great bulk of the manufacturers of Canada are not enjoying a very great degree of protection at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER. Give them more.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No. The consumer has to pay more for the goods, but the manufacturer does not get the protection, owing to the pernicious system running all the way through and the duties imposed on raw material. For instance, one line in which I am engaged myself will serve as an illustration. There is a manufactured article upon which 20 per cent. duty is imposed. You would naturally say that the article is protected to the extent of 20 per cent. Not so, because on 40 per cent. of the raw material entering into the manufacture of that article there is a specific duty of 2 cents per pound, which is equivalent to from 25 to 33 per cent. duty. The House will, therefore, readily see that the protection that is upon the manufactured article is the difference in the duty between the duty on the finished article and the duty on the raw material. There is on some other goods of the same kind, sweet goods—I have been speaking of a line that embraces nine-tenths of all manufactures of that kind, while as regards the other tenth sugar comes into it, and as the Minister of Customs seeks to obtain as much revenue as possible, it comes in under the sugar duty—when you come to that class you have an extra cent a pound on the sugar, and 30 per cent. on the molasses, in fact all the ingredients that enter into it are protected, and therefore the protection given to the manufacturer is only the amount of the difference between the duty placed upon the manufactured product and the duty on the raw material. Take agricultural implements. There is 35 per cent. protection. It means an increased cost to the consumer, but the manufacturer does not get the benefit of the 35 per cent. protection, because the duty he has to pay on the raw material reduces the protection he obtains, and in this case again his protection is the difference between the duty levied upon the raw material and the duty on the implement itself. There is a firm, I may be pardoned for mentioning names, and I do not think individual instances prove anything, but the cases are useful as illustrations—there is the Osborne-Killey Manufacturing Company who declare that under unrestricted reciprocity they could not hold their own. But the Waterous Engine Company located in my own city, one of the most enterprising firms in the Dominion, have been doing for years an export trade and have successfully competed with the Americans in Australia, Hungary, Russia and Chili, and they say that if they have been able to hold their own against the Americans in distant lands, they would be able to hold their own against Americans in the United States, because much of the raw material that goes into the manufacture of their articles pays a duty of 30 per cent. on coming from the States, while in that case it would be free. They say give us the American market, and as proof of their desire to obtain it two of the sons of members of the firm have left Winnipeg, I am sorry to say, and have removed to Minneapolis, and in that young giant city they are carrying on business by their own energy and enterprise, and in a competition by tender for a fire engine they have been successful against rivals in the United States. Those young men who are unknown go into that city and build up an industry, and no wonder the Waterous firm says: If we can do that among people with whom we are unacquainted we can hold our own in this market and we will manufacture for the United States in portion as well. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), whom every one regrets is unable to say what he would like to say in this House, asked me to do this for him. He received a letter from a manufacturer and he desired a portion bearing on this question be read. He did not feel himself at liberty to mention the name of the manufacturer and therefore he could not give me permission to use it, and so if there is any danger of hon. gentlemen opposite requiring me to give the name after reading it I will prefer not to read it, and will not read it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Read it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It bears directly on this question. I may state that this is from the president of a large wood working company who make waggons and agricultural implements and a great many other things in that line. After alluding to some private matters he says:

"There are some points that in my opinion have not been so fully demonstrated as they should be."

That is in reference to the discussion on this question.

"Take the injury to the manufacturers for instance. In our own business, that of the ———— Manufacturing Company, of which I am president, when Messrs. Fuller, Wiman and Smith commenced their crusade, Mr. ———— our manager, was wonderfully exercised and feared a flood of waggons from the American side would be slaughtered in our Canadian market, and that we could not receive any return therefor. I argued that free and unrestricted intercourse with them would open up a trade beneficial to both, and that we would get a fair share of American trade. He thought that impossible, but while we were discussing the question an order came from a railway contractor in the State of Maine for thirty carts, on condition that we should pay the duty. The price offered was such that we paid the duty of 35 per cent., and realised our regular Canadian prices, and subsequently sold 120 carts in the same country alone. Had we had free access to the American market our trade would have been largely increased and profitable. This is only one example. Give us a chance to enter the markets of America untrammelled and we have the energy, intelligence, skill and resources to take the lead in our own markets, and secure a fair share of the United States trade. The extra profit on stock, such as horses, cattle, &c., if sold to American buyers without or free from duty impositions would more than quadruple the loss of such revenue. Dozens of American buyers come to East York annually to purchase horses, who plainly tell the farmers that, if it were not for the duty they, could and would pay $20 to $30 more for the animals they purchase than they now pay. So that our farmers, whether Reform or Conservative, are rapidly becoming supporters of unrestricted reciprocity."

I, Sir, was requested to read that. It is just on the line of what I have stated that our manufactures will not be inferior to any others in competition. I grant you that if there are a class of men who naturally may feel timidity in this matter it would be the manufacturer, but it is our bounden duty, as he says, in the interests of the whole country to take this course, and I believe that what is in the interest of the whole country must be in the interest of the manufacturers too. We cannot increase the wealth of the people of this country; we cannot put extra money into the pockets of the farmers and other industries of the country without their being able to expend more money, and in the end it must redound to the benefit of all. What has been the progress of our manufactures? They have extended and increased, I grant you, but to what extent? And what is their position to-day? Is there not a stage of congestion? Is there not debt? Is there not trouble? Is there no trouble among combines just now, and is it not being enquired into? What has brought about those combines? It is because men have combined, when they were not able to get prices that were remunerative, and when they were losing money, to try and form arrangements and agreements among themselves in order if possible that they might save themselves from bankruptcy. Others, I believe, have been formed for the purpose of getting more than a proper profit out of their investment. But, Sir, our over-supply and our export trade, owing to our protective system, is almost a nullity. In 1878 we exported some $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, but this year we have exported only a little over $3,000,000. So it is that our Government recognises this state of affairs as much as anyone else, and to-day we have agents sent away to distant countries to try and open up trade. We have voted here year after year thousands of dollars to establish commercial agencies, and we are making expeditions out to Australia and different places in order to get an outlet for the excess that we are manufacturing in this country. But, Sir, just imagine for one moment sending agents thousands of miles away; sending agents away to Australia, to the Argentine Republic and to other countries in order to open up a trade with their people and to extend our trade and our commerce, while here is a proposition made by a nation of 65,000,000 of the richest people on the face of the earth to open their markets to us, and yet we find men rising in their places and saying that it would be an injury to us to accept this invitation. It is something marvellous that that line of argument should be taken in a Canadian House of Representatives, by men who ought to be as intelligent as Canadian representatives are supposed to be. Sir, the Minister of Marine made a very true statement in reference to this subject when he was speaking of the prosperity of Canada and regretting that we had not a very large import trade. He said:

"After all it is the inter-provincial trade that is of more profit to us than our foreign trade and we ought to cultivate that."

I agree with him that this inter-provincial trade and this inter-provincial commerce is an enriching, and profitable, and paying thing, but the trouble is here as has been pointed out by many gentlemen, that deeply as we regret it there is but a very small inter-provincial trade and the facts are these. There are geographical difficulties in our way as a Dominion. The hon. Finance Minister was, I consider, the father of the National Policy, and in my mind I give him credit for an earnest desire to promote inter-provincial trade as one of the features of his National Policy, but it has been tried, it has been in operation for years, and we have failed to overcome the geographical difficulties that are in our way. We are forced to come to the conclusion that our inter-provincial trade has not been the success we would desire. I agree with the hon. Minister of Marine that if inter-provincial trade could be promoted, it would be a source of wealth to us, but there are great difficulties attending it. Carry out the proposition of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and give us commercial relations with the United States of America and what would happen? Why, Sir, we become entitled to participate and will participate in all the great inter-state commerce of that mighty republic, which has made it to-day one of the greatest nations of the earth. We become participants and sharers in the prosperity of that inter-state commerce which is two-thirds times greater than all their foreign commerce. We have access to the millions of people in the United States, and, Sir, if they have improved by this trade we cannot help sharing in that benefit, to improve also, as commercially we will be the one people in that respect. They will enter and trade with us, 5,000,000 of people, and we enter a trade with 65,000,000. Perhaps we may lose some inter-provincial trade, or part of it, that has been forced into unnatural channels, but we gain a vastly greater amount from that great intercontinental commerce which will sweep through this land, enriching it, I believe, as it has enriched the people of the United States. Sir, if it be an undenied fact that their interest commercially has been the great means of making them a rich and prosperous people, does it not logically follow that the securing to us as free a right as they possess to participate in that intercontinental commerce must be a benefit for us? And, Sir, are we not justified when we contemplate this in offering this resolution? Would the Ministry not be justified in taking that proposition into consideration, and, if they agree in the arguments that have been advanced in its favor, seeking to give effect to it, as they have been invited by Mr. Bayard to do. It has been argued—and I will touch this point very briefly—that this proposition discriminates against Great Britain. Sir, that is one thing I do not just exactly like—not so much because Great Britain has done so much for us in that regard; but it looks as if when a nation takes your products free you should not raise a wall against it, while you take down the wall that separates you from others. But I regard the matter in this way. We have been given permission—nay, more, I believe it is our duty to our Queen and country, as British subjects, located in the Dominion of Canada—to see that the interests of the Empire are furthered, and we can only do that in this part of the Empire by being true to Canada and Canada's interests. In that way we show ourselves the most devoted and loyal subjects of Her Majesty. But even in the tariff we have enacted you find discrimination. You find us taxing Britain now, and yet Britain is receiving our products by the millions and tens of millions year after year without taxing them; and what is the reason? Certainly not to benefit Canadians. She does it because it is to her interest to do it; and while she has received our products free, she has also received the products of other nations free. England has not treated us with greater favor than she has treated other nations.

Mr. HESSON. How about the cattle question?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is right in that; but speaking in the main, England treats us as she treats other nations. The English people look after their interest and we must look after ours. But we find that the very import duties designed by the hon. Minister of Finance to operate more against the United States than against Great Britain have actually discriminated against Great Britain and in favor of the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. Quite the contrary.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman must not say that, because I have figured the matter out, and I give the result as I have obtained it from the Trade and Navigation Returns. The values of the dutiable and free goods entered for consumption in Canada from Great Britain and the United States respectively during the year 1887 were as follows:—

| | Dutiable goods. | Free goods. | Total. | Duty Paid. |
|---------------------|-----------------|--------------|--------------|-------------|
| Great Britain... .. | $35,766,273 | $ 9,195,960 | $44,962,233 | $9,318,920 |
| United States..... | 30,570,609 | 14,536,450 | 45,107,059 | 7,268,914 |

The value of the British goods imported was a little less than the value of the American goods, but we levied over $2,000,000 more duty on the former than on the latter. The percentage of duty on the British goods, taking free and dutiable together, was 20½ per cent., and taking the dutiable alone, 26 per cent., while the percentage of duty on the American goods, free and dutiable together, was 16½ per cent., and on the dutiable alone 23½ per cent. The hon. Minister of Customs will also remember that these figures do not show as much discrimination against Great Britain as I believe will be shown by the figures for 1888, because the operation of the iron duties is not yet as manifest as it will be when we get the returns for this year. A loss of revenue is to be encountered, but we hope that retrenchment and economy, combined with greatly increased prosperity, will enable us to overcome that. I notice that the Government do not venture to ask us to vote down the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford on the ground of disloyalty to Britain, though speakers have greatly enlarged upon that; their resolution speaks of the interest of Canada, and of Canada alone, and that, I think, is as it should be. We have had great speeches on the subject of loyalty. I do not like to profess my loyalty in loud words, and very often I would rather act my loyalty than speak it. If I know myself, I am loyal to Great Britain; I believe I am loyal to Canada, and I think it is our first duty as Canadians—it will be regarded as our first duty by the people of England, by the Parliament of England, by the sovereign we are proud to have reigning over us—to attend to the interests of Canada, to build it up, and in building it up to bring added glory and dignity to the Empire. Now, Sir, I would say in conclusion, that one of the strongest reasons in my mind leading me to favor the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford, is that if I am anything, I am a Canadian; I believe in Canada; I love Canada; I want Canada to go on to prosper, to increase, to expand, to develop, to become a Canadian nationality, on this continent, happy at present in the tie that binds us with the mother country, but fitting ourselves, if at any time it should be thought in the interest of the Empire better for us, to become, as the hon. First Minister himself has spoken of us, a kingdom—an auxiliary kingdom—that we should go on, so that if that time should come, soon or late, we should be able to take our position among the nations of the earth, and reflect honor upon that nation of which we now form so important a part. Mr. Speaker, this is what I want to say, and I say it with feelings of regret: I have been through the Dominion, or have endeavored to go through it not with much time at my disposal, but I have at intervals of a few years endeavored to take time enough from my own affairs, if possible, to make myself acquainted with the different portions of this Dominion; and in doing that, while I was rejoiced at the hospitality and the kindness with which I was greeted in all parts of the Dominion, I could not fail to notice that there are commercial difficulties in our way, which produce a certain amount of friction, and prevent the cement that ought to bind us together from hardening as fast and as strong as I, as a Canadian, desire it should. I could not blame the people, when I found them in certain Provinces saying: It is reasonable that you should be more content with Confederation than we, because you have us for your customers, you send your goods down to us and you make us pay for them in hard cash. You take nothing in return from us, and we have to sell at reduced prices, at 20 or 30 per cent. less than the value of our goods to get the gold with which to pay you for yours. Sir, that is the difficulty under which these people labor; and we cannot wonder, under these circumstances, that that sentiment should be voiced in this House; for a man should be honest in his utterances, and if the Province from which he comes is dissatisfied, if there are grievances under which his people suffer, the way to heal them, the way to discover a remedy, is not to cry peace! peace! when there is no peace. Now, as I said, one of the strongest reasons that induced me to support the resolution of my hon. friend from South Oxford is this, that I know, although I do not like to contemplate the fact, that unless we can develop a larger inter-provincial trade, unless we can become cemented more closely and firmly together than we are, unless the present difficulties are removed—and I do not see very well how they are to be overcome, unless that friction is smoothened away and the feeling of dissatisfaction engendered by this state of things dispelled, there cannot be that strong bond which it is desirable should combine the members of a new nationality. It is not because these men are discontented or dissatisfied with the Canadian flag. They are as proud of the Canadian flag, it may be, as we are, it is not that they have a dislike to Confederation politically, but it is because their material interests are not as well served by Confederation as they conceive the interests of the older Provinces are served. I believe if we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, we would open up natural markets for our productions; the people of Ontario would trade with the people with whom they desire to trade, and with whom it is natural they should trade, and the people of the other Provinces would do the same. We would lose perhaps some of the trade that we may have forced, by means of this high tariff, with the more distant Provinces, and some of the neighboring States might share part of that trade with us; but what could prevent our going in and taking our share of the immense trade that could be developed there and of participating with those people in its profits? Trading in our natural markets, the tariff barriers removed on this continent, there would then be peace and prosperity. All the Provinces of this Dominion, free commercially and prospering commercially, would politically become united and banded together as one, strong in upholding the Canadian flag, which I hope will ever be upheld in the hands of freemen worthy to dwell on the soil of Canada. I thank you, Sir, and the hon. members of this House, for having listened to me as patiently as you have, while I have gone over ground that has, no doubt, been gone over already. But I feel some interest in this subject. I feel that it is one of the most important subjects that has ever been before the country. I feel that its effects will be greatly in the interests of the country; and therefore I desired to say a few words in the hope that I might strengthen the arguments that have already been advanced.

Mr. RYKERT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:15 a.m. (Saturday).

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Monday, March 26, 1888.

No. 23.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 26th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPRESENTATION OF PRINCE EDWARD.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election return of John M. Platt, Esq., to represent the Electoral District of the County of Prince Edward.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Buffalo, Chippawa and Niagara Falls Steamboat and Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

RAILWAY LEGISLATION.

Mr. SMALL moved:

That it be an instruction to the Committee on Railways and Canals that they have power, if they think fit, to divide the Bill intituled: "An Act to confirm a certain agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Canada Southern Railway Company and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company, and a certain agreement made between the London and South-Eastern Railway Company and the Canada Southern Railway Company, "into two Bills."

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to explain what is contained in this motion.

Mr. SMALL. The Bill as originally introduced consolidated those several agreements. It has been proposed by the solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway that there should be two charters instead of one in confirmation of the agreements between those different lines of railway. The motion proposes two agreements and two charters, instead of one.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if notice has been given of this application? It is in the nature of a private Bill, and I think the practice is for a private Bill to be introduced and to be presented to this House, and not to originate in the Select Standing Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. SMALL. I was under the impression it ought to have been introduced in the Railway Committee. This motion has been made at the suggestion of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Has notice been given for the application of this private Bill?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, yes. The Bill is before the Committee and has been read a first time.

Mr. LAURIER. It is a mere matter of form, as I understand.

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT FOR EASTER.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government if they have come to any definite conclusion as to the adjournment of the House on Wednesday, and as to what time the adjournment would take place? It would be important to know this before getting through the present debate which we have now on hand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is contemplated that the House should adjourn on Wednesday at six o'clock, and stand adjourned until the following Tuesday at eight o'clock. While I am up I would say that, from all I can learn, there is not much probability of finishing the debate on the question before the House to-morrow night, and if a vote is not taken to-morrow night I would ask the House to adjourn the debate until we meet again after Easter on Tuesday night. The debate would then go on on Wednesday and I hope it will invite the House soon to come to a vote, as the House, I am sure, feels inclined to do.

BILLS ON BANKING.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire of the First Minister whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce speedily the Bill with respect to banking which has not, as I understand, been printed yet—the Bill as to banks and banking?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no Bill on that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought the hon. gentleman, or one of his colleagues, stated his intention to introduce a Bill with reference to banks and banking?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked the question as the impression had gone abroad, and a great many questions have been addressed to myself and my hon. friend about it. I take it for granted then, if the hon. gentleman will permit me, that there will, in all human probability, be no legislation on that subject by the Government this Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In all human probability there will be no legislation in this respect during the present Session. I think that what I did say with respect to the question relating to banking was, that probably the Committee on Banking and Commerce would, during the present Session, strike a sub-committee for the purpose of considering that question. The charters expire in 1890, and before that period I think the time and attention of those gentlemen who are accustomed to finance and fiscal matters should be directed especially to that subject, with a view to having legislation, if required or thought necessary, before the expiration of those charters.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I would remind the First Minister that the Bills relating to the Franchise Act and the Contested Elections Act promised in the Speech from the Throne have not yet been laid before Parliament. It is of the highest importance that those measures should be in the hands of members before adjournment takes place. We certainly want to know, and the country wants to know, what legislation the Government proposes. It is a matter of the first consequence, because it relates to the constitution of this House. Unless those measures are in the hands of members before the adjournment takes place, there will be no adequate opportunity of consulting the country with regard to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would say to the hon. gentleman that not only those measures, but all the measures promised in the Speech from the Throne, and all the principal measures that the Government proposes to submit for the consideration of Parliament, will be laid before the House for immediate discussion and action on the reassembling of the House after Easter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That will not suit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might point out to the First Minister that this would render it very difficult to get the views of the constituents, unless we sit for an unusually long time, which I do not suppose that he nor anybody desires.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sceptic enough to doubt whether the time of the hon. gentleman during the short recess will be materially occupied in explaining any of the public measures to their constituents. I think my hon. friends opposite, and on this side of the House as well, will find their time fully occupied in looking after their own domestic interests and religious duties during the short recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have now been a month in session and have not had those measures yet.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take this opportunity of saying, for the comfort of the hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces who use the Intercolonial Railway, that free passes will be given going and returning during the Easter recess.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. WELSH. I have been waiting for the last few days for the Minister of Marine to be in his place, to ask when those papers I have spoken of in connection with the captain of the Northern Light will be laid on the Table of the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will take the opportunity at six o'clock to put the question, I will see that my hon. friend is in his place.

Mr. WELSH. That is all right.

COUNTY OF RUSSELL.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House the fact that the seat for the County of Russell is vacant, and has been vacant for some time. I notice that Mr. Speaker received the report of Judge Osler and the final report of the Supreme Court at the opening of the present Session. Looking at this report I find it is very much in the same line as the report of the same judge in the case of the County of Kent, and though the report has been before the House, and therefore, within the knowledge of the Government, for more than a month, the Government have not thought proper to take action, for reasons which I myself would agree justifies us in making the House consider as to the issuing of a Royal Commission to further investigate the matter. As the report is very much in the same line as the report made by the same judge in the case of the Kent election, that is to say, the question was whether further enquiry would be desirable, I think the House should not delay any further the issue of the writ. I therefore move:

That the Speaker do forthwith issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the Electoral District of the County of Russell in Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend to allow his motion to stand until to-morrow. The only objection I have to it is the rule which I think ought to be observed as much as possible, that in every case of this kind connected with the issue of a writ, we should act on a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Motion allowed to stand.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879, and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other, and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. RYKERT. Mr. Speaker, I think the only deduction that can be drawn from the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, and from his speech in introducing that resolution, and the several speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite in support of it, is, that it is nothing but an insidious attempt to commit this House to the policy of free trade. Running through all their speeches from beginning to end is an evident disposition to advocate the policy of free trade. They seem desirous, as it were, by a snap verdict, to commit this House to a reversal of the National Policy which was adopted in 1878. It seems to me, Sir, that before this House can pass judgment in a proper manner upon a resolution such as that which is now before it, this House ought to be satisfied that some opinion has been expressed by the people of Canada in favor of such a policy as hon. gentlemen opposite have now adopted. I cannot understand why this House should now, within twelve months after a general election, be called upon to reverse a policy which was then passed upon and approved by the people. If the National Policy has been a failure in this country, that fact has not yet been established by hon. gentlemen opposite; but the country having adopted that policy on three different occasions—first in 1878, when they transferred hon. gentleman opposite from the Treasury benches to the Opposition side of the House, in 1882, after the matter had been fairly and fully discussed before the people and in Parliament, and in 1887, when every person in the country was fully alive to the importance of that question—it seems to me that there ought to be some strong and satisfactory reason why this House should now be called upon to reverse that policy. There is no doubt, in coming to the conclusion they did, in 1878 particularly, the people of this country were largely indebted to the speeches made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). My hon. friend from South Brant has drawn the attention of the House to the year 1876, and I am glad he has, because I shall perhaps be able to refresh his memory as to some very important speeches made by him and by the hon. member for North Norfolk in this House and in the country. If there are any two persons in this country to whom we as Conservatives are indebted for the establishment of the National Policy and the education of the people in favor of it, they are those two hon. gentlemen; and I have no doubt that when they expressed their opinions in Parliament, they expressed what they really felt. At any rate, whatever they did say met with a hearty response from the people. Now, Sir, it would perhaps be well, as a matter of history, that I should refer to some of those speeches, so that some of the younger members of this House who were not here at the time, may be informed to some extent as to what were then the sentiments of these hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for South Brant would have been a little fairer, I think, if he had gone back one year, and had referred to the report of the Committee on the Manufacturing Interests made in 1874. He has made copious extracts from the report of the Committee on Agricultural Depression appointed in 1876; but I would also like to refer to the very important report made by a Committee of this House in 1874 when the hon. member for East York had control of the Government. The whole question of the effect of the then fiscal policy upon the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the country was then discussed, and a report was presented by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Wood, then a Reform member for the city of Hamilton, and that report, to my mind, has been vindicated by subsequent events. In that report I find this language:

"This disturbing element in the manufacturing industry of the Dominion, arising out of our geographical position and out of the trade policy of our neighbors, should induce even those who may regard free trade as a correct principle in the abstract, to recognize the necessity for a modification of that principle as a measure of self-protection, and your Committee respectfully recommend the enactment of such laws as will regulate, if it cannot altogether prevent, the evil complained of."

"2nd. The almost uniform testimony before your Committee was to the effect that an increased protection to manufactures will not necessarily increase the cost of the manufactured article to the consumer; and, in the opinion of your Committee, the witnesses have made out a very strong case in support of this view."

"It appears to be well established that the cost of manufacturing decreases as the quantity of goods manufactured increases. Thus a large manufacturing establishment can afford to sell its products at a lower rate than a smaller one. If, therefore, Canadian industry is relieved from the pressure of such undue competition as that referred to in the first paragraph of this report, the effect will be that the manufacturing establishments will be worked to their full capacity, and the cost of production, and the consequent cost to the consumer will be proportionately reduced."

Subsequent events have shown the correctness of that report. Manufactures have increased in this country, everything has been reduced in cost to the consumer, and all over the country, instead of a slaughter market, we find a home market for the produce of our farmers. In 1876, when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), then Minister of Interior, made a motion asking for the appointment of a committee, the hon. member for North Norfolk, who was a very strong protectionist, uttered sentiments with which I think every member on this side of the House and the vast majority of the people of this country will agree. This language has been repeated in this House on several occasions, but, like a good story, it will stand frequent repetition.

"It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce and manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions. * * * I believe that the interests of the nation would be promoted by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufactures being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away."

In that connection, to show that these sentiments were not only those of the hon. member but of leading gentlemen on the other side of the line, I would like to quote from a speech made by a gentleman in Congress in 1878 upon the Wood tariff, in which speech he seemed almost to have adopted the language of the hon. gentleman. The Hon. Mr. Tifton, on 3rd May, 1878, made these observations in Congress on the Wood tariff:

"Mr. Chairman, I want these gentlemen who favor this Bill to advise me where the operatives of all the manufacturing interests of this country are to find employment when the manufacturing interests are stricken down. I oppose this Bill because England is for it. I oppose this Bill because every English free trader in this country is in favor of it. I oppose this Bill because English manufacturers are for it. I oppose this Bill because I think it erring and inexpedient at this time. I oppose this Bill because it strikes down our home markets, by striking down labor, by striking down the consuming extent of the country—I mean the factories."

That speech made in the House of Congress is in entire accord with the speech made by the hon. gentleman. The speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk was seconded by that of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who, upon that occasion, seemed to grow somewhat wild in his endeavors to induce the hon. the Minister of Finance to adopt a fiscal policy for the protection of our manufactures. In his appeal to the House, he told them that he had pledged his electors that when he came to Parliament he would ask for protection upon wheat. He was satisfied protection upon grain would be a grand thing for the farmers, and, moreover, he told the House that if they did not agree to his recommendation, he would bring down a petition signed by 100,000 grangers asking the Government to grant his demand. He was kind enough, however, to tell the House that the Government had yielded, to a certain extent, as regarded the fiscal policy, and he pointed out the benefits which would accrue from the adoption of that policy as far as he, a manufacturer, was concerned. This is the language he used in his strong appeal to the Minister of Finance:

"I trust that the wisdom which led him to yield that point will induce him to grant the same to other industries, and that no sectionalism will tie his hands. I hope that other hon. gentlemen will speak on this subject, and whether the Committee is appointed or not, the interchange of views will lead the Finance Minister to bring in a tariff which will redound to the prosperity of the whole Dominion."

He pointed out that if one industry languished, all the others would. That was not the tone of the hon. gentleman's speech on Friday evening last. Then, on the contrary, he pointed out that if this resolution were adopted and the policy it proposed carried out, it might have the effect of destroying some industries. He thought, however, the larger industries would be able to hold their own although the smaller ones might collapse. He said:

"I have confidence that he will arrive at a conclusion on this point. I know the difficulty he will have in satisfying all parties, but we should keep in mind the fact that we are one people, and when one of our industries prospers all must benefit, while if one languishes all must suffer more or less."

That was the language then used by the hon. member for South Brant. In speaking of the pledges he had made to his electors, in showing what the people demanded at his hands, and in order to satisfy the electors when he went back to them that he had redeemed his pledges, he, on the floor of Parliament, said :

"At my last election when my opponents told them that they need not expect any protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that whenever this subject came up in the House I would raise my voice in their behalf, and I think it is hardly possible that the duty on wheat will give increased prices."

I wonder what the hon. gentleman says now? Then, as I said, he threatened the Government with bringing down his 100,000 grangers to compel the Government to grant what he thought should be granted :

"It is true some hon. gentlemen here think the United States pursue a commercial policy that is utterly nonsensical in some respects ; but until the duties on agricultural products are removed, it is prima facie evidence that the farmers believe protection to be in their own interests."

We have often heard the hon. gentleman speak of immigration to this country. We have often heard him denounce the policy of the Government with reference to immigration, but in those days, when the question of immigration was in its infancy, when the policy of the Government of Ontario was strongly in favor of immigration, the hon. gentleman, in order to show what effect the adoption of the policy he recommended would have upon immigration, pointed out the advantage it would bring to some of our industries. He said :

"It is well known that we pay a cash bonus to the inhabitants of other countries to come into Canada and settle in our midst. It is a fact that some of those who have been thus induced to emigrate to Canada have been compelled, from want of employment to which they have been accustomed, to go to the United States. I believe by a defensive tariff you would not have to pay to bring those men here. Adopt it, and you will find the steam-whistle of our factories will be the call for them to come."

He also contended very strongly that the duty on wheat would not raise the price :

"I think it is hardly possible that the duty on wheat will give increased prices, because we raise a surplus and export it. Nevertheless, it will be a protection to our millers, and if any can be given to our agriculturists by a revision of the tariff they should get it. The party to which I belong, and which is led by the Premier, will make a mistake if they refuse to grant this Committee."

Then, in order to illustrate the beneficial effects of protection, the hon. gentleman points to his own industry. He said :

"The other year the Finance Minister, in revising the tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry which it never had before. The result was that a thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany were literally transported, by the change in the tariff, to Canada and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit. The middlemen suffered a diminution of profits ; but for them nobody seems to care much, the producer and consumer receiving all the sympathy. It is inevitable that a like result would flow to other manufacturers under the same policy. If the Finance Minister finds such is the case, I trust that the wisdom which led him to yield that point will induce him to grant the same to other industries, and that no sectionalism will tie his hands."

Then the hon. gentleman was a little afraid that his friends from the Maritime Provinces might find some fault with the policy of protection, and he gave his opinion upon that question. He pointed out that if this policy was adopted, manufactures would spring up in the Maritime Provinces ; and he thought, if they would look at the latter squarely, they would be satisfied, on a full investigation, that a protective policy was the best system for those Provinces. He said :

"I would remind the hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces that Ontario is not given up to manufacturing. That interest bears but a small proportion to others in this Province. It is the same in Quebec. That being the case, what is to prevent Halifax under a pro-Mr. RYKERT.

protective tariff from having its manufactories? What is to prevent the establishment of industries in St. John, Charlottetown, and the other towns of the Maritime Provinces? Protection does not mean Ontario's interests at the sacrifice of the interests of the Maritime Provinces. It is to stimulate the manufacturers of this Dominion irrespective of Provinces ; but if any part of Canada could more successfully compete in our markets I think it is Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, from the fact that they have coal and iron lying side by side. They would be able to manufacture cheaply and compete with Ontario."

That, Sir, is another of the strong arguments which the hon. gentleman made, and I think that we, on this side of the House, are strongly indebted to them for those arguments, and the effect they had on the country. There is nothing which had so strong an effect on the country, there is nothing which so strongly endorsed the opinions expressed by the leader of the Government, as the speeches made by those two hon. gentlemen. They corroborated everything laid down by our party, and the result was a change of Government, for which those hon. gentlemen have to thank themselves. Let me, for a minute, point out briefly what I consider the National Policy has done for Canada. I will not go into any elaborate statements, because this House thoroughly understands the question. It has been discussed over and over again, and it would insult the intelligence of this Legislature for me to go into the matter fully again, but the evidence is incontrovertible that we have got rid of the slaughter market of which we heard so much ; we have got a home market ; our manufactures have reached a much larger number, and a much larger amount of capital has been expended on them, and, instead of our farmers having to carry their produce 2,000 or 3,000 miles away, they have a market at their own doors. The hon. gentleman said that the prices have increased. Well, the other day, what I was going to call the Grit organ but I do not know where to place it now, I do not think it is the Grit organ now, the Globe, made a statement in regard to certain prices. It was in regard to the price of hosiery, and one of the manufacturers in Dundas was accused of making enormous charges. Mr. Lennard, of Bickford & Lennard, addressed a letter to the Globe saying that the prices in 1879, under the 17½ p.c. tariff, were for No. 1, $1 a dozen ; for No. 2, $1.20 a dozen, and for No. 3, $1 a dozen ; that in 1883, under the 30 per cent. tariff, the prices were 85 cents for No. 1, $1 for No. 2, and 77½ cents for No. 3 ; and that in 1888, under 10 cents a pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem, they were 82½ cents, 95 cents and 75 cents respectively. Then in regard to agricultural implements. There is a firm in the hon. gentleman's own constituency, the firm of Harris & Sons, of Brantford, who sold agricultural implements in 1873 for $300 which they sold in 1887 for $159. That shows that the farmer has not been very much injured by this policy. There are one or two more items which I will point out for the benefit of my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who I see is taking notes. In the years 1878 and 1887, we imported the following quantities of the grain and other articles named :

| Oats..... | 2,162,292 bush. | 19,797 bush. |
| Wheat..... | 5,635,411 " | 22,534 " |
| Indian corn..... | 7,387,507 " | 2,029,061 " |
| Flour..... | 312,864 bbls. | 168,124 bbls. |

When you come to consider the report of Mr. Blue, you will find what has happened during this period. He points out that the following was the difference in the growth of grain from 1871 to 1881 :—

| | 1871. | 1881. |
|-------------|-----------------|-----------------|
| Corn..... | 3,802,830 bush. | 9,025,142 bush. |
| Wheat..... | 6,367,961 " | 20,247,452 " |
| Oats..... | 42,459,153 " | 70,193,131 " |
| Barley..... | 11,496,038 " | 16,844,868 " |

You will see that since the National Policy came into force the production has very largely increased, and, following it out to the present time, you will find that it has enormously increased. Then, if you look at the exports, you will see where the farmers have got their markets. They exported to England the following articles in the years named:—

|-------------|-----------------|-----------------|
| Cheese..... | 36,331,358 lbs. | 73,185,517 lbs. |
| Sheep..... | 11,985 " | 68,147 " |
| Cattle..... | 7,433 " | 63,832 " |
| Wheat..... | 3,402,625 bush. | 5,048,084 bush. |

So you will see who got the market. I think that is strong evidence to show that the farmer has been somewhat benefited and that he has a market under the National Policy. I was somewhat surprised to read a letter which appeared in the Mail on Saturday, in reference to the farmers of Ontario, from Mr. Shaw, who is the recognised author of these pamphlets upon the subject of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. He says that Ontario is so much retrogressing, that the production of the farms has fallen off:

"That the day is not far distant when we will have to import rather than export coarse grains from Ontario eastward. At least these are the indications, and this will apply to all kinds of coarse grain except barley."

The question at the polls last January was not a question of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, but a question between free trade and a protective tariff. We know what the platform was of the present Government, and that platform is fully laid down in the resolution passed by the Manufacturers' Association at a meeting which they held in Montreal in March, which says:

"Resolved, That the Conservative Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, with its clear, definite and emphatic policy of protection to Canadian industries, is alone worthy of support, and this meeting pledges itself to do all in its power to secure the return of candidates pledged to support the present Government, believing that the best interests of the country demand that there shall be no uncertainty in the tariff policy of the Dominion."

These gentlemen upon that occasion, as I understand, were compelled to accept the policy laid down in the Malvern speech of Mr. Blake, and the policy he laid down in Toronto was not a policy of free trade but a policy of revenue tariff. Upon that occasion in Toronto, Mr. Blake said:

"Our adversaries wish to present to you an issue as between the present tariff and absolute free trade. That is not the true issue. Free trade is, as I have repeatedly explained, for us, impossible, and the issue is whether the present tariff is perfect, 'or defective or unjust'."

"We have no longer a large surplus to dispose of, and a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet. And it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear."

There he was bidding for the manufacturing interest, and he stated there, as he did at Malvern, that there should not be any change. We remember that the Malvern speech came as a thunderbolt upon the people of the Province of Ontario, that it was the subject of discussion in Grip, and I recollect, Sir, seeing a Grip paper in that style (holding up the copy of Grip) called "The Sword Swallowed."

An hon. MEMBER. No, he is not swallowing it; he is showing how easy it can be swallowed."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Send it across when you have done with it.

Mr. RYKERT. It says:

Manager Cartwright.—"It's a real, genuine swallow, ladies and gentlemen! No deception! Any manufacturer in the country can come up and examine for himself."

Then we find some gentleman in the rear called

"Urgent Party in the Background.—H'm! wonder why he can't swallow this sword"— that is, the Prohibition sword. At any rate, we had in this paper the idea that the people were staggered at the idea of the hon. member for West Durham bolting down all his former principles on the free trade policy, and he is represented as the clown, and Manager Cartwright the one who showed round the circus. Now, I say that the issue at the last election was plain and unmistakable, but it seems rather extraordinary that on this occasion we could find these hon. gentlemen adopting a different course. Taking advantage, I suppose, of their leader's absence, they come down here with a policy directly antagonistic to the principles laid down by him in his speech at Malvern and also his speeches in Toronto and Hamilton. They pretend that the farmers of Ontario are in favor of this new kind of policy. I deny it in toto. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pointed out that a large majority of the Farmers' Institutes had passed resolutions in favor of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, or some thing of that kind. Now, I tell the hon. gentleman that the resolutions put to those meetings, with one or two exceptions, were not in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. But hon. gentlemen opposite embody all these—commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, or reciprocity. At all these meetings, what did they say? Why, Sir, they said to the farmers: "Look how you flourished from 1854 to 1866." They pointed to the past history of the country under the treaty, and said, "You flourished then." But they said not one word about discriminating against England; they dared not say one word about direct taxation; they dared not say one word about annexation; they dared not say one single word about the revenues of the country being deficient. Upon the contrary, they said: "Gentlemen, look how you have prospered; would you not like to prosper in the same way again?" Every resolution carried was carried under false pretences. I attended one of these meetings, and they tried to bolt that down the electors of Lincoln, and the electors saw plainly the other side of the story. They were told—exactly as the hon. member for South Oxford stated at Ingersoll—they were told that there was danger of annexation, there was danger of direct taxation, there was danger of discrimination against England. They would not point out these things, however, at the meetings held all over the country, and they tried to get a snap verdict. They moved a resolution at the close of the meetings, and at every one of these meetings the question was not what the effect of commercial union would be, but what reciprocity was. On Friday last the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) took occasion to have a little fun at the expense of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and also the senior member for the city of Hamilton (Mr. Brown), and he read from speeches at the Dominion Board of Trade, and he also read a copy of the resolution. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had been desirous of being fair to the argument used by the member for Hamilton, he would have admitted that the language used by him, and which he read, was exactly similar to what he used in this House. On the 20th of March, in this debate, the hon. member for Hamilton said:

"I am most sincere when I say that the Americans are a people with whom we should live in the greatest amity, with whom we should have the freest commercial relations so long as they do not affect the status of this country as a part and parcel of the British Empire. We propose now to have the closest relations with the people of the United States, and our Government have put in the Customs Act a standing offer to interchange with the United States in natural products; but beyond that this country should not and will not go."

These are the sentiments expressed by that hon. gentleman the other night, and they are exactly in accordance with his speech before the Dominion Board of Trade. Now, what did the Minister of the Interior say? The hon. gentleman quoted a speech which the Minister of the Interior made before the Board of Trade, but he was not exactly fair. The hon. gentleman complained that I did not read the whole of his speech. Well, life is too short to read the whole of his long speeches; at the same time I think it but fair that in challenging the conduct of the Minister of the Interior and trying to show his inconsistency, the hon. gentleman should have read all that he said before the Dominion Board of Trade. I have it here on page 95, which the hon. gentleman could have found in the library if he had looked for it. The Minister of the Interior, then Mr. Thos. White, said :

"It is quite true that the extension of our markets will be a benefit to the country. But it is equally true that a home market is the best of all markets, and we can create that by the building up of our manufactures. It would be a great boon to the farmers, if they will then have a market at their own doors for their produce. Therefore, I hold that anything injurious to the manufacturing interest cannot be to the advantage of the farming community."

Now, why did not the hon. gentleman read that? He did not think that worth his while, but he thought he would make a point against the hon. gentleman by misconstruing what he said.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why did you not read the whole of it? You have not read the tenth part of his speech?

Mr. RYKERT. I have enough to do to attend to the hon. gentleman. I have taken up the somewhat lengthy task of replying particularly to the hon. gentleman, and I do not feel disposed to read the whole of that speech.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then why does the hon. gentleman blame me for not reading the whole?

Mr. RYKERT. I think the hon. gentleman's speech is like grasping at the shadow and losing the substance. The hon. gentleman's speech seemed to me to point to the fact that he has some doubt about the policy now being enunciated. He has some doubts about the effect upon the country, he has some doubt about the effect upon his own industry, but he says, "I am a patriot, and I will sacrifice my own industry for the benefit of my country." That is the substance of the hon. gentleman's speech. Now, let me take the hon. gentleman again into my confidence for a few minutes. It is just as well that I should deal with him now. The hon. gentleman took up the Depression Committee Report in 1876, and he says, "Why, Mr. Gurney is against the National Policy—he is in favor of unrestricted free trade," and all that sort of thing. He took Mr. Massey, Mr. Goldie, Mr. Rosamond, and all those gentlemen. Now, let me tell the hon. gentleman that I took the trouble of telegraphing to all these gentlemen to know if what was said of them was correct. I have all their answers, and they are in the negative.

An hon. MEMBER. Read them.

Mr. RYKERT. I intend to read them. The hon. gentleman said, in reading a letter that the member for East York handed to him, that he did not mention names. Well, he did drop a name. Mr. Speight, manager. I happened to catch that name, so I took the liberty of telegraphing to that gentleman, and here is his answer, addressed to Frank Madill, M.P.:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would destroy our manufacturing industries and not benefit the farmer. Prices are low for all kinds of implements; further competition would destroy us."

That is from Mr. Speight, manager of the establishment to which the hon. gentleman referred.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He does not want to state what is not true. I did not say that Mr. Speight had testified. The Minister of Customs knows that. I give it an emphatic contradiction.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I do not.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes, you do.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I know what you are trying to do.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman read the letter and referred to the name of Mr. Speight as the manager, and that is the way we found who the letter came from.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not.

Mr. RYKERT.

Mr. RYKERT. I said the hon. gentleman read the name Speight.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I mentioned the name of Speight.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Allow me to explain. If the hon. gentleman was a gentleman, and if he was carrying out—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. gentleman was carrying out what was the understanding at that time with the First Minister and the members present, when the name slipped out inadvertently, he would not have mentioned it. I did not complain that it was mentioned. I did not say Mr. Speight; indeed the letter in which the connection with Mr. Speight came in was in respect to the manager, and Mr. Speight differed from the manager, the manager holding that unrestricted reciprocity would not injure their business, Mr. Speight holding the opposite.

Mr. RYKERT. We have the letter. The hon. gentleman is very strong in his language, yet he has never shown himself yet in the character of a gentleman in this House. From the very commencement of his career in Parliament till now he seems to have fallen a little from grace.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have caught you.

Mr. RYKERT. I sent a telegram to Mr. Speight to know what he thought of it—Mr. Speight and the manager of that concern, and we have the answer and you have the answer now. I also telegraphed Mr. Massey of Toronto. The reply I got was:

"I certainly do not favor unrestricted reciprocity to National Policy."

Mr. Goldie was also put down as one in favor of free trade. He telegraphed me:

"I am not in favor of commercial union. I consider the country is prosperous under the present policy."

"JAMES GOLDIE."

I have a letter also from him, which arrived this morning, and which I will also give to the hon. gentleman. Those are the names he quoted. I knew very well they did not hold those views—perhaps they have changed, like hon. gentlemen opposite. We are now discussing what is best for the country at the present time. The letter says:

"GUELPH, 24th March, 1888.

"J. C. RYKERT, Esq., M.P., "Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR.—I am in receipt of your telegram, informing me that Mr. Paterson had stated last night that I was in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, and asking me if this statement was correct.

"I am opposed to commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, as it is called. I am opposed to our people begging reciprocity from the United States or toadying to them whatever. I believe we can build up a country of our own, the future of which will surpass the imagination of the most sanguine now. The present policy of our Government has done great good to this country, and I am as strongly in favor of it now as in 1879. I am bitterly opposed to the degrading spectacle of a number of our legislators—"

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. member for South Brant among the number, I suppose.

"begging reciprocity from the United States."

I have also a telegram from Mr. Rosamond of Almonte, another gentleman quoted by the hon. member:

"Paterson's statement altogether incorrect. Am as much in favor of National Policy as I ever was. Totally opposed to any agreement with the United States that would interfere with Canada's right to regulate her own tariff."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Might I ask the hon. member how Mr. Rosamond knew the statement I made?

Mr. RYKERT. I telegraphed the gentleman.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I say the hon. gentleman telegraphed something I never said. What I read was those gentlemen said in 1876. Did he telegraph them that?

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish the hon. gentleman would not interrupt. It always leads to very unpleasant contradictions, and we had better proceed with the debate.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not object to it. The hon. gentleman does not know any better.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I always nail things when said.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hold that if an hon. member conceives that a misstatement has been made he has the right to nail it then, and that is the best time to set it at rest.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not understand that the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said there was a misrepresentation. He was only putting the question as to how the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) communicated with Mr. Rosamond. That is what I understood. If there had been any question of personal explanation or of misstatement or misrepresentation I would certainly have allowed it with pleasure, as I have done already. What I meant to say was this, that it is better for the House in a debate like this that hon. members should not interrupt a speech unless within the rule. I say it is against the rule, and it would be better to enforce the rule, because it always leads to something unpleasant.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I will avail myself of your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I distinctly claim that the hon. gentleman has made a misstatement. The hon. gentleman led off by saying that I had made certain statements with regard to those gentlemen, and he said he had an emphatic contradiction in regard to them, and he read certain replies. I asked how the gentleman knew the statement I made. He said: "I telegraphed him." The statements I read were read, as I said at the time, from the report of the Committee on Trade Depression in 1876. I read the questions, I read the answers published and submitted to this House. That was what I read. The hon. gentleman now rises and reads a telegram, having sent a telegram that Paterson said so-and-so—what I never said—that the gentleman is not in favor of commercial union. If you think that is an honorable course, Mr. Speaker, I will leave it in the judgment of the House.

Mr. RYKERT. It is quite evident what the hon. gentleman stated on Friday night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. After that has been raised, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) should, in courtesy and in justice to my hon. friend, read the telegram which he sent.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) induced this House to believe on Friday night that these gentlemen were in favor of this resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all.

Mr. RYKERT. That was his sole object in reading it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read the telegram.

Mr. RYKERT. His sole object in reading the extracts—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Produce your telegram.

Mr. RYKERT—was to satisfy the House and the country that they were in favor of it. I asked: Are you in favor of it or not?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I certainly think the hon. gentleman should read the telegram he sent. Here is a question of veracity raised between the two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman does not seem to grasp the question altogether. They had better wait till I get through with them and perhaps they will be satisfied.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The telegrams.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman knew that the whole question before the House that night was reciprocity or free trade.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The House knows what I said; it is here in Hansard.

Mr. RYKERT. I took the opportunity of reading the evidence that was taken. If the hon. gentleman wants more reading I can give it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; but there is a question of veracity.

Mr. RYKERT. There is no question of veracity. My word will go as far as that of the hon. gentleman, and I have a record of 500 majority to prove it. The hon. gentleman came to my city during the last election, and the result of the election was to increase my majority to over 500. It was never more than 100 before that time. The people were so thoroughly satisfied that the hon. gentleman was talking nonsense that they increased my majority very largely. If hon. gentlemen opposite hope to disconcert me by this kind of interruption they are very much mistaken: I rather like it. I want to give the hon. member for South Brant the evidence of a person nearer home, that is, J. K. Osborne, one of the leading members of Harris & Co., of Brantford. This gentleman addressed a letter the other day to the Empire, in which he gives his opinion on this question. He says:

"The avowed object of Commercial Unionists, from a commercial standpoint, is to secure for Canada the cheapest markets in which to buy, the largest markets in which to sell, and the development of her natural resources, which it is claimed would immediately follow. That such would be the result of unrestricted trade with the United States I very much doubt; but, granting that these expectations would, in some measure, be realised, would not far greater benefits accrue to Canada by making Great Britain, instead of the United States, the objective point for closer commercial relations."

He goes on to say:

"It may be true that Canadian agriculturists might derive some benefit from free intercourse with the United States, and it is on this large mass of the electorate that the strongest guns of the Commercial Unionists are brought to bear. I believe that the vast majority of the Canadian farmers are as well, if not better off, than those of the United States, and until something more tangible than a bare statement to the contrary is presented, will stick to my belief. I believe this to be true of all Canadian farmers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and if a comparison is instituted let it be a fair one, say Ontario farmers against those of New York, Ohio or Michigan, and Manitobans against those in Minnesota and Dakota.

"Unrestricted trade with our southern neighbors would certainly not enhance the price of wheat, cheese, butter or fruit, for the market for these great staples is Great Britain, and the farmers of the United States are our competitors in these markets. Our cattle also find largest sale in Great Britain, and if care was taken in the breeding of horses the market in Great Britain would be a limitless and a paying one. Even in smaller items, such as poultry and eggs, England will be our best customer as soon as the proper way of shipping is known and adopted.

"It is a mistaken idea, too, to imagine that were all the restrictions of trade removed, the Canadian article would be enhanced by the present American duty placed upon it. Such a result could not be expected by the most sanguine. The American buyer takes our horses and our barley because he needs them, not because they are cheaper, but they are better adapted for his purpose than any other. Were the tariff barrier removed there might be more trade, but it would not be at greatly enhanced prices to the Canadian seller. The American consumer would largely reap the benefit of the reduction of duties, otherwise the whole argument of free trade falls to the ground."

This is an important letter coming from one's own town. I have here a letter from Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, who has sent it to me unsolicited. It reads as follows:—

"I am informed this morning that I have been quoted as a manufacturer in favor of reciprocity with the United States. To this I would give a most unequivocal denial. Were I called upon to say whether my individual business could compete with United States manufacturers, I should probably declare my belief that it could, but that is not the question, but would it be wise to readjust my whole business, involving the sacrifice of two-thirds of my plant, on the basis of a treaty with such neighbors as we have on our southern border, to which I reply it would be the greatest blunder ever advocated by a business man, and what applies to the individual is equally applicable to the whole manufacturing and mercantile community. I write this with some haste, as I leave immediately."

That is the letter sent to me by Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, without his being solicited for it or even spoken to. The only inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks is just as I indicate, that the hon. gentleman quoted those gentlemen as being in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, otherwise what would be the use of quoting them at all. It seems somewhat singular, Mr. Speaker, that those hon. gentlemen should have so suddenly changed their front in this House. In the early part of the Session a resolution was given notice of by the member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), to this effect:

"That in the opinion of this House, commercial union with the United States would be mutually advantageous to both countries, and it is therefore the duty of the Government to use all proper means to secure such union."

Sir, after that resolution had been on the notice paper for a few days we find it suddenly withdrawn and a new motion introduced which is now the subject-matter of discussion in this House. My purpose in alluding to that is simply this, that those gentlemen do not seem to understand what they really want as regards this question. It is necessary for the members of this House to know exactly how they do stand when we come to discuss and express an opinion on this resolution, and I think I will be able to show the House what the position of hon. gentlemen opposite is. If they want union upon this question, I think, Sir, that I can show them that they themselves possess different opinions on the same question. I look upon this matter as simply a question of triumph for the Globe newspaper. That newspaper has come out in favor of direct taxation and free trade, and after it came out with this policy the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the member for South Wellington (Mr. Innes) went in for it too. I think I can show to the House and to the country that those gentlemen have no views of this question at all. First, we find commercial union thoroughly discussed by them, and we find it discussed by every newspaper in the country, then we find unrestricted reciprocity, then we find continental free trade discussed by the Globe newspaper and all the papers throughout the country, and then, at last, when the Opposition have been for a couple of months without a policy, the Globe comes out in favor of direct taxation and continental free trade, or something like that, and the Opposition members follow suit. I think I can show satisfactorily that that is not the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I think he is not in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. He will not answer that. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is in favor of unrestricted reciprocity? Yes. The hon. gentleman nods his head. I shall recollect that, because when I come to it by-and-bye I think I can show that he is entirely opposed to it, and I think it is our duty in discussing this question to know whether its advocates are sincere or not, whether they thoroughly discussed it and considered it, and whether they thoroughly understand it and are sufficiently in favor of it to propound such a policy for acceptance by the country. We are told in the plainest possible language by the mover of this resolution that he voiced the sentiment of the country. I would like to ask just here, why is it if this policy which is to be inscribed on the banner next election and which the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has told us he "has nailed his colors to the mast and will go to the polls," I should like to know, Sir, why the leader of the Opposition is not the mover of this resolution? Why, if this is going to be the policy of the Reform party, is the leader of the Opposition not the mover and propounder of this policy? I will tell you why, Sir. It is because he is not in favor of it; it is because he has not made up his mind on it, he has never made up his mind on it and as far as the records outside of the House show he has not pronounced an opinion on it. When I heard the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) state that he voiced the sentiments of the people of this country, I felt inclined to take exception to it, because I knew from what I had read that even his own party were not united on it. I read the Advertiser

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) I have nothing to do with the Advertiser.

Mr. RYKERT. Oh, no. I read the Guelph Mercury, the Brantford Expositor, the Canadian Post, the Galt Reformer, or whatever you call the Liberal papers up there, I have read all those papers published in the Reform interest and I find they are opposed to the Globe on this question. I find that they are all at sixes and sevens whether they shall have unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union or free trade and direct taxation. I find all those different opinions expressed and I have the right to ask myself how is it those gentlemen can come here now and boldly assert that the policy expressed in this resolution before the House is one in the best interests of this country? The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said he expressed the opinion of the country. I take issue on that point. I say he does not, and I am prepared to show it before I sit down. He used those words:

"It is true that I am fortified and encouraged in bringing forward this motion by the knowledge that in so doing I only voice the opinions of the representatives of the Liberal party in this Parliament; and, furthermore, that I have every reason a man can have for believing that when I give utterances to their opinions I also give utterance to the opinions of the vast majority of those who support us and of a very important section, to say the least of it, of those who, on other questions, have differed from us very widely."

That is what the hon. gentleman said. Well, let us see what his leader said. The hon. leader of the Opposition made a speech on 3rd October, 1887, in which he said:

"I am not quite certain that those who have constituted themselves the champions and promoters of commercial union can now present it as a certain or definite principle. It is yet vague, but the substratum in an aspiration towards reciprocity. The idea is still uncertain, it may be unhappily expressed, but the substance of it is that the most advantageous thing that, commercially, the people of Canada could look to, would be some form of reciprocity with the United States."

Then, the organ of the hon. member for South Brant, the Brantford Expositor, on 28th January last, had something to say on this subject; and I want to see whether the views of hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs are in accord, because there is no use of our voting for the resolution unless we know that hon. gentlemen opposite are in favor of it themselves. That paper, referring to the Globe said:

"We regret that such a powerful exponent of public opinion should seek to disseminate the idea that it is only by a free trade propaganda or something of that sort, that the Dominion can be redeemed from its unsatisfactory régime. We do not believe it, and we would ask to emphasise the fact, that the Globe in its new departure does not voice in any sense the views of the political party of which it is a leading advocate."

We also find that the Sentinel Review, of Woodstock, which has been fighting the Globe on this question for some time and discussing it very intelligently, on 20th February, discussed the policy advocated by the Globe in the following terms:

"The Liberal party needs a platform more stable than the shifting sands of evasion and inconstancy, and so long as the leader could be held responsible for the utterances of their hitherto recognised organ, it was absolutely necessary to repudiate the free trade dogma. It is not a grateful task, but until it is done throughout the whole country the Liberal party in Dominion politics will be a ghastly case of suspended animation."

There does not seem too much unity among leading Liberals of the country on this subject, although the hon. member for South Oxford, says he leads them. Then we find the

Lindsay Post denouncing free trade and direct taxation as follows:—

"The Globe in a month or two is like the little boy with the potatoes—will be digging up the hills to see if the free trade direct tax potatoes or principles it has been planting have really been making any growth. When the Globe essays to lay down a new line of policy for the Reform party it is time to pound a little common sense into our contemporary."

The hon. member for Halifax spoke in very strong terms the other night on this question, and in the city of Halifax on 8th December, 1887, he made use of this language:

"I know there is a strong feeling in the United States against admitting wheat free from Canada in competition with their own, and I believe there is equally a strong objection taken by the coal interest against placing coal on the free list. Cannot then these articles be eliminated from the contract?"

Then, we find a gentleman in this House distinguished for the cordial support he gives to the Opposition, speaking of the "unfortunate differences" in the party. I see him smile; no doubt he recognises the phrase. The Guelph Mercury came to the relief of the party as it thought it was going to pieces too rapidly, and that it was time for it to settle its differences. On 11th February, just before Parliament met, it said:

"The Globe has had pretty good proof by this time that his advocacy of the absolute free trade and direct tax finds no sympathy, and has had no support from the Liberal party of Canada, with two exceptions, that we know of, nor have its views been endorsed by any member of the party as far as we are aware. Of course the Globe is only responsible for its own utterances, but it is regretted that a paper which had for many years voiced the sentiments of the Liberal party, should now with a singular want of judgment go off at a tangent and take up a platform which in its sober senses it must know is utterly impracticable in the present condition of the country, and which were the Liberals, as a party, to adopt, would lead to its disintegration and ruin."

The hon. gentleman I suppose will not repudiate the Guelph Mercury; and we find him on 11th February opposing this very resolution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. RYKERT. He opposed the principle laid down by the Globe newspaper.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes; and the resolution brought before the House to-day is entirely in accord with what has been laid down by the Globe newspaper. And we find articles in that paper day after day calling upon this House to vote for that resolution; but hon. gentlemen opposite, finding that commercial union has been pronounced to be a political humbug, come down and go for something else. The Brantford Expositor is also very strong on this subject. In an article of 10th February, 1887, headed "Putting on the brakes," it says:

"It is pretty tough for those who differ from the Globe in its free trade direct tax platform to be dubbed the protectionist tail of the Liberal party. In fact, we may say it is cheeky for it to spring a new departure on the country, and coolly appropriate the whole Liberal party, always excepting the tail, as thoroughly imbued with its new found belief. And we would like to know where the protectionist tail of the Liberal party is? If it ever had one, those whom the Globe designates the rats of 1876 constituted it, and the leading organ's attitude towards them afforded little expectation of their ever returning to the fold."

Now, Sir, I give these extracts to show that when the hon. member for South Oxford stated that he was in accord with the Liberal party and with the great majority of the people who, though not belonging to the Liberal party are in favor of reciprocity, he does not voice their sentiments at all. On the contrary, I think I have shown that the different organs of the party are opposed to the resolution. What I object to in hon. gentlemen opposite is the course they have been pursuing on this question. I would like to know how we stand to-day as a Parliament. We stand as a Parliament with a resolution on our Statute-book pledged that as soon as the United States shall agree to reduce their tariff on certain articles, we shall pass an Order in Council admitting the same articles into Canada on the same terms. The Act of 1879 enacts as follows:—

"Any or all of the following articles, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees, shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked) and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation by the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada."

That is the position we occupy here to-day as a Legislature.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman approve of that resolution? That is contrary to the National Policy.

Mr. RYKERT. I will state what my own views are on that matter in a very few minutes; and, perhaps, they will not be in accord with those of the hon. gentleman, or those of hon. members on this side altogether. Now, that is our proposition, and that has been on our Statute-books since 1879. We, a short time ago, through the mouth of our representative in Washington, made overtures of which this House is well aware. Sir Charles Tupper, then acting as one of the commissioners on the treaty question, made a proposition with which all the hon. gentlemen here are familiar, but this proposition was not accepted by the commissioners on the other side. This was the proposition Sir Charles Tupper made:

"That with a view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

Then we find the answer. Now, if the American commissioners were disposed to treat on the terms laid down in our Statutes, there would be no difficulty whatever in at once arriving at a conclusion. But they were not prepared to accept that, and they would make no counter proposition. They refused, on the contrary, to discuss the question at all, their answer being:

"While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 30th ultimo—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration, to decline to ask from the President authority requisite to consider the proposal conveyed to them on the 3rd instant as a means to the desired end, because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action, which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment, through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing."

That shows, that so far as the present condition of affairs is concerned, we are willing to adhere to our offer of 1879, or even go further, as expressed by our plenipotentiary. The hon. gentleman asked what my view of the matter is? I will tell the hon. gentleman that I retain the same views on the question which I expressed in 1865, when addressing the Agricultural Society of Ontario, as their President, in the city of London. It was the year before the abrogation of the treaty, and I then publicly declared that I did not care whether the treaty was abrogated or not, because I believed that the Province of Ontario, and the Dominion at large, could flourish without it. I still am of the same opinion. I still believe that we can go on and prosper without a reciprocity treaty. I still believe that we can go on side by side with our neighbors in generous rivalry and prosper, as we have shown we can in the last fifteen years. But while I am of that opinion, I stand pledged, as a member of the Parliament which adopted that resolution, to support it as far as it goes and no further. I am not prepared to go further. That is my position in the matter. I am somewhat surprised—though perhaps I ought not to be—that hon. gentlemen opposite should persist in crying out that this Dominion is in a dilapidated state. It seems to be a matter for rejoicing to them that this country should not be in a prosperous condition. We all recollect that, some years ago, when speaking about the Budget, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was called upon to reply to the Finance Minister. That hon. gentleman then expressed the opinion and the hope that before very long Canada would come to that position when she would be in a state of almost degradation. He hoped to see the day when we would not be prosperous, and looked forward to the time, which, he said, has now arrived, when we would be in a state of decay. In response to the speech of Sir Leonard Tilley, then Finance Minister, he said:

"This country will, as I have said, pass through a period of stringency and trade depression as well as of prosperity, and I venture to prophecy that in two years from now, the hon. Minister, if he still retains his position as hon. Minister of Finance, will find that he will be compelled to offer apologies; he will explain how this factory and that factory was closed; how wages in this department were lowered, and how it occurs that the exports have declined. I believe this, and I am confirmed in my views by writers in commercial journals, equally well informed with the hon. Finance Minister. And then we, on this side of the House, will have the satisfaction of knowing that though we have had to wait for it a few years, till a period of trial came round, yet it was bound to come at last."

I hope the hon. gentleman is quite satisfied, now that he says we are in a state of decay, that there is no prosperity whatever in the country, and that we are rapidly going to the dogs. That cry has been raised throughout the whole country by hon. gentlemen opposite. The sentiment of every right thinking man must at once condemn their line of action. As was stated the other night, you may go to the other side of the line, and you will not find an American in his place in the Legislature or out of it, crying out against his country. Americans may be driven from the cities to the country, they may be driven from the East to the West, they may fail in their efforts to secure a competence, but you will never find them going back on their country. In this respect, they offer a striking contrast to hon. gentlemen opposite, to the hon. member for Bothwell and the others who seem to rejoice in declaring that our country is in a state of despondency.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What did you say in 1877?

Mr. RYKERT. Nothing that I am aware of.

Mr. MILLS. (Bothwell.) Read the resolution of your leader.

Mr. RYKERT. I said nothing in 1877 about it. I am answerable for my own statements. The hon. gentleman has referred to that resolution, but he will find nothing of despondency in it. The right hon. gentleman who moved it speaks hopefully of the future, but he said that the policy then pursued, if it were continued, would be disastrous to the country, and that the only remedy was the adoption of a new policy.

Mr. MILLS. (Bothwell.) And we say that is disastrous. We say the same thing of your policy as you did of ours.

Mr. RYKERT. But the hon. gentlemen opposite have been shown to be false prophets. These hon. gentlemen talk a great deal about their organ. I want them to listen to what I am going to read from their own organ on this question. The measure of these gentlemen is accurately taken by their own mouthpiece; their organ seems to fully understand what they were at; it seems fully to understand that they are determined to smash Confederation and destroy the whole country. No later than 8th September, 1887, I found this article in the Globe:

"One of the standing misfortunes of Canadians consists in the existence within our borders of many pessimistic individuals, often active and able, who have no desire to perpetuate our Confederation," and who further movements, good or bad indifferently, with a single aim to create general despair. For years past these men have been telling the people, who live together harmoniously enough, that it is obviously impossible for them to continue to jog along in agreement to disagree about creeds. Instead of trying to calm race disputes, they have seized every occasion to exacerbate these, that Ontario and Quebec, Canada and Canadien, might join in declaring any political fate more endurable than the continuance of the effort to build up a Canadian nation. They are the wailers over Canadian geography,"—

There they are—

"the whettors of every prejudice"—

There they are—

"the moaners over the wrongs of great majorities, the foes of tolerance"—

There they are—

"the enemies of all who counsel the people to make the best and not the worst of one another"—

There they are—

"the magicians of business troubles, the spreaders of panic, the growlers over every difficulty in Canada's development"—

There they are—

"When they join in demand for reform they cry that life is not worth living without it; when the reform is wrought they weep that the situation is as bad as ever."

The Globe took accurate stock of these gentlemen. Now, I entirely dissent from their statement that the Province of Ontario in particular and the Dominion in general is retrograding, and I am prepared to show from their own organ that to-day Canada is more prosperous than ever it was. There is an old saying that chickens come home to roost. In 1886—and I commend this to the attention of the leader of the Opposition, though I am sure he does not join in the crusade of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I observe that up to the present time we have not had any indication of his views upon this question. In 1886, a discussion was raised in the Ontario Legislature in reference to the terrible expenses of the Ontario Government. Of course, that was enough to make anyone cry out, because the leader of the Opposition knows very well what a terrible expensive Government that has been. When they are charged with the increase of expense which they were guilty of, we find the organ of the hon. gentleman—I beg his pardon—we do not know which is his organ, but it used to be the organ of the party—I find this language in the Globe, and I commend it to the attention of the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House because they will find in it the absurdity of their continuing to decry the country from day to day:

"The critics of the Budget in the Legislative Assembly have undertaken to show that the Government is extravagant because the expenditure is greater now than it was fifteen years ago. Do those persons believe that Ontario has been standing still for fifteen years? If they do not—if they admit that there has been growth and expansion—are they able to show that the country has not got value for the money paid out, or that payment has been in any degree disproportionate to the service? Let us have a knowledge of the facts before we condemn any party."

"In 1871 the Dominion had a population of 3,577,176, and an area of land occupied of 37,041,073 acres, while Ontario had a population of 1,618,245 and an area occupied of 16,128,999 acres. In 1881 the population of the Dominion—inclusive of the new Provinces and Territories—was 4,321,919, and the area occupied was 45,322,694 acres; while the population of Ontario was 1,920,337, and the area occupied was 19,224,362 acres. This shows that in the former the increase of population was 20·8 per cent., and of area occupied 22½ per cent.; while in the latter the increase of population was 18½ per cent., and of area occupied 19 per cent."

"No Province or State of America, we make bold to say, has such a record as this Ontario of ours; and if our representatives in the Legislative Assembly have the courage to act as true sons of Ontario, regardless of party ties in another place, and to insist upon a policy of 'hands off' when its rights and interests are threatened, the men of this generation will live to see it become the wealthiest and most populous commonwealth of the continent, as it is now the best governed."

There is the evidence of their own organ that Ontario is more prosperous than almost any country in the world, and is prospering and increasing in every respect. Let us go a little further. We have the report of Mr. Blue who has charge of the Bureau of Statistics in the Province of Ontario, and his words are very significant as to the growth of fall wheat, spring wheat, barley and oats in the Province of Ontario, showing that it is ahead of any ten States of the American Union. Let us take them in their order. The following is the average production of cereals in Ontario and the principal grain growing States of the Union in bushels for five years :—

Let us see what he says in his report, and I commend this to the attention of the croakers against Ontario :

"Take the Province of Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada, as a sample. There, substantial wealth or a reasonable competency is within the reach of every industrious man whose efforts are intelligently directed. The penniless pioneer of a few years ago is the substantial, independent farmer of to-day. The uplifting of the people in social and material comfort is a process as visibly going on from year to year as the revolution of the seasons. Its progress is recorded in the annual advance in the value of their accumulated property, in the increase of their trade both in imports and exports, in the establishment and development both of religious, educational and benevolent institutions, in the spread of social refinement, in the cultivation of the sciences, in the appliance of every art that ministers to the happiness of human life. Nor are these conditions the result of long and painful evolution taking generations for their development."

That is the opinion of Mr. Blue. He also speaks in his report of 27th February as follows :—

"The farm lands in Ontario having increased in value from $632,242,560 in 1882 to $648,009,828 in 1886, farm buildings from $132,712,575 to $183,748,212, farm implement from $37,029,851 to $50,530,536, and live stock from $80,540,720 to $107,208,935, or a total of $989,497,911 as against $882,625,610—a gain of $106,872,301 in four years instead of 'a loss of 30 per cent.'"

We also find in that valuable report that the different counties in the Province have increased in a great ratio for the last year.

"In the group comprising Essex, Kent, Elgin, Norfolk, Haldimand and Welland, the value of land had risen in 1886 by about $2,000,000 over 1885. In the group comprising Lambton, Huron and Bruce the increased value was over $3,000,000. In Grey and Simcoe the increased value was $600,000. In the group comprising Middlesex, Oxford, Brant, Perth, Wellington, Waterloo and Dufferin the increase in value in the short period of one year was $2,750,000. In the group composed of Lincoln, Wentworth, Halton, Peel, York, Ontario, Durham, Northumberland and Prince Edward the increased value in a year was $3,600,000. In the group comprising Lennox and Addington, Frontenac, Leeds and Grenville, Dundas, Stormont, Glengarry, Prescott, Russell, Carleton, Renfrew and Lanark, the increase in value was for the year $7,500,000. In the group comprising Victoria, Peterboro', Haliburton and Hastings the farm lands increased in value in twelve months by $2,100,000; and in the group composed of Muskoka, Parry Sound and Algoma the increase was $220,000. The total increase in value of farm lands in the whole Province in 1886 over the preceding year was nearly $22,000,000."

So you will see from that report from Ontario, that the Province is not going backward, but, on the contrary, that everything is in a good condition. The hon. gentleman also, in order to show that he is still in the same despairing mood, refers to the great debt under which we are laboring. I might ask him to go back as far as 1875, when he declared that the debt which existed had been incurred for works of general utility. He went home to England, and there publicly declared over his own signature that all this debt was created in erecting works of public utility, and he went on to show what they were; therefore I say that it does not lie in his mouth to go beyond 1885 for the purpose of decrying this country, and showing what the existing financial affairs are. Now, I will quote from the organ of the party. As late as November, 1881, the Globe newspaper, in referring to an article of Goldwin Smith, which ran in the same direction as the speech of hon. gentlemen opposite, denounced this statement as improper and incorrect, and said the debt was not created in the manner which Mr. Smith described. It says :

"Who does not see that Mr. Smith wants the same thing for Canada, and is ready to decry this country if so he may injure its credit, and thus prevent development of its incalculable resources and induce the people to look to Washington or despair; it is true that the debt of the Dominion is large, but nineteen-twentieths of it have been incurred for productive purposes, and the interest has always been promptly paid. With no debt and without works, in which the money have been expended, the country would be infinitely poorer than it would be were the debt doubled without adding to the works."

Now, Sir, there is an article showing that the debt was created for works of public utility; but in the face of that public declaration these hon. gentlemen talk quite differently now. The hon. gentleman again said :

"In these twenty years they have trebled our debt, in these twenty years they have trebled our taxes, and when the Budget comes to be brought down I think the House will find that the liabilities of the people of this county are very far indeed from being fully discharged or measured, even, by our present enormous debt."

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see for one moment about this debt. In the year 1875, when the hon. gentleman gave the people of England to understand that the debt was created for works of public utility, we had a debt of $116,008,378. In 1886 the debt was $223,159,107, or an increase during that time of $107,150,729. Now, during that period, while the debt increased that amount, we paid for public works and the debts of the Provinces, $118,965,802, so that we actually expended, by increasing our debt, $11,815,073. That does not look very bad after all. Then we have the evidence of a gentleman whom they will not doubt. In a speech made by Mr. Blake, the member for West Durham, in Russell, he says :

"The expenditure had increased since 1878 by about eleven and a-half millions. Part of that increase was justifiable, although the Conservatives in opposition were not wise enough to know, or not honest enough to state, that an increase was necessary in a young and growing country like Canada."

In answer to all that we have the public declaration of the hon. member for South Oxford that the whole of this debt has been incurred for legitimate purposes. Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen followed in that bawling style of his, which characterises the speeches from the other side of the House, and he spoke about the exodus from this country. In view of what has taken place in the records of this Parliament, I think he ought to have hesitated before speaking of the exodus in the manner he has done. Of course, the hon. gentleman has always been anxious, and the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) likewise, to make the people believe that the country was going to the dogs, and that people were leaving it as rapidly as they could. They take the evidence furnished by the collector at Port Huron. The hon. member for South Oxford, in speaking about this exodus said :

"But I will point to this merely, that if you are to accept the customary standard laid down in the United States, if you can venture to hold that every able-bodied man who comes to North America is worth, when he lands on the dock, $1,000 to the State, then, Sir, whatever may be the cause, the result of all this is, that in losing these 2,000,000 of people we have lost 500,000 able-bodied men, or thereabouts, and we have lost an equivalent, according to that calculation, to $500,000,000."

It was well said by an hon. gentleman a few nights ago that a country that could loose $500,000,000 must be a rich country indeed. He goes on :

"What shall I say of the folly of supposing that it is anything but a great misfortune, a great calamity, a great injury to the people of the country that so huge a portion not only of those who come to settle in Canada, but of those who belong to us, of those who are our own flesh and blood, our own kinsman, have been obliged for lack of opportunity to leave Canada and seek a home elsewhere? I say that this is proof positive that we are in a state of retrogression."

Then he goes on and points out about the two millions. He repeats no less than four times in his speech that two million people have left the country. He says :

"These men have not hesitated to carry out a policy which has been responsible, in my judgment, for driving two millions of Her Majesty's North American subjects into exile, and which had risked the loss of all British North America to the Empire. It is time that we should clear our minds of cant on this subject. It is idle for any human being to rise up and tell this House that, when we have lost a number equal to half the whole population that now remains, things are satisfactory with us. There is not another country, except perhaps Ireland, that has sustained so heavy a bleeding as we have done during the last few years."

Now, Sir, this House well knows that some time ago, when the charge was made that a great exodus of young men was going on from this country, an investigation was made by Mr. Lowe, and his report was laid before the House. It was charged upon that occasion that no less than 71,424 persons, settlers, had entered at Port Huron and gone to the United States. Upon examination Mr. Lowe found that instead of that number there were only 2,422 who had left our country for the purpose of settling in the United States, and that the total number of passengers passing out of Canada, of all kinds, was 64,168, including 13,804 who went to Manitoba via the United States. I find, Sir, in the report of the Committee on Immigration and Colonisation, of 1884, the following :—

"The immigrant settlers during the year included 34,987 who entered from the United States, making entries of settlers' effects at the Custom houses, the names of the settlers, the numbers of persons in the family, and the nationality being registered in all these entries; these figures being thus obtained by an exact registration, are absolute and show a very considerable movement from the United States to Canada, owing, doubtless, to two causes, one being ready employment in manufactures and on railway works, and the other the attraction of our lands in the North-West."

I commend that to the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite. We had no less than 34,987 people who came back from the United States during that year, while it was actually found that the total going out was only 2,422. Now, let me read something else on that point. I know hon. gentlemen opposite will believe the Globe, and here is what it said on the 14th April, 1882 :

"The Dominion Government should now take means to represent forcibly to the Government of the United States the extreme and seemingly wilful inaccuracies of the figures published at Washington as truthful. If the American Government refuses or neglects to furnish evidence upon which statistics rest, no more need be done than to publish the fact in Europe where American figures already enjoy none too sweet a reputation."

That is what the Globe said, and the Globe thought the report made was entirely correct. We had evidence taken on that occasion, because we found among the list of immigrants actors, clergymen, dentists, druggists, lawyers, Mr. RYKERT.

bakers, barbers, blacksmiths, laborers, milliners, tailors, servants, speculators, and people without any occupation, the total number being 45,393. A declaration was made before the United States collector. This declaration contains the statement that :—

"Charles Irwin and myself got up those returns entirely by guess work, and copying off the old returns, and before my time he helped Crawford and others of my predecessors to get them up. The idea was to make the immigration look as big as we could. I know myself of large crowds of men going to the lumber woods in the fall being taken as immigrants, although we knew perfectly well they would all go back to Canada in the spring."

And further this declaration says :

"In getting up the returns, the way we got at the occupation of the immigration was this : We took so many thousand persons, called so many carpenters, so many blacksmiths, so many painters, &c., so many doctors, so many lawyers, so many preachers, &c., and the balance we called farmers; in fact, the whole thing from beginning to end was nothing but guesswork."

He was also examined before a Committee of this House, as follows :—

"By the Chairman :

"Q. Did you assist in obtaining the immigration returns? A. I did not; I made out the returns, but there was no obtaining of them at all. I made out the returns, but did not obtain them in any way, shape or form, except by simply—you may call it guesswork, or estimating them."

"By Mr. Trow :

"Q. Were those returns made under oath? A. No, Sir; not by me."

"By the Chairman :

"Q. How long were you employed in performing those duties? A. I was employed for some time previous to my connection with the Customs. When I was baggage master for the Grand Trunk, the Deputy Collector in charge at Port Gratiot asked me to make up those returns for him, as he knew nothing about them, so I did that work for about two years previous to my connection with the Customs, when I was baggage master there."

"Q. Do I understand you to say that in making up these immigration returns, you did not take any means of verifying the correctness of the returns made to the Government, and that the statements or returns sent to the Washington Government, and published by them as authentic, were, in point of fact, not authentic? A. Yes; you can clearly understand me to say that there was no attempt made to get at the actual registration of these immigrants whatever."

So when hon. gentlemen opposite cite the returns obtained at Port Huron and other American ports as authentic they must be aware that they are entirely incorrect. And no one knows this better than the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Trow). So satisfied were the American authorities on this point, that the returns were fraudulent, that a letter was sent by Mr. Secretary Manning on 20th February, 1886, to the collectors in the different ports in which he says :

"WASHINGTON, D.C., 20th February, 1886."

"To Collectors and other officers of the Customs :

"Since it appears to be impracticable to procure under existing laws, accurate statistics of immigrants arriving in the United States from British North American possessions and Mexico, you are hereby directed to discontinue the collection of statistics of such immigration until otherwise directed."

"DANIEL MANNING,

"Secretary."

So satisfied were the Americans as to the inaccuracy of their reports that Mr. Secretary Manning put an end to their collection, and they have not since been made, yet hon. gentlemen opposite rise and state that the number of immigrants is something enormous, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has the cool affrontery to say that over 2,000,000 of people have left this country and gone to the United States since the present Government assumed power. Is that an honest and an upright statement, a fair representation for the hon. gentleman to make? He knows right well what the records proved, and yet he has the coolness to say that the exodus is still going on. Let me make a comparison in order to see how we stand, and that perhaps may be satisfactory to some hon. gentleman while unsatisfactory to others. I hope it will satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite that we are increasing at a greater ratio than our neighbors across the line. I have taken for purposes of comparison the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario on the one side, and on the other the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York and Ohio. The following is the result :—

Have we reason to complain of this result? I hold we have not. This statement distinctly shows that, instead of decreasing in population, Canada is increasing at a greater ration than those States across the line. Take the great cities of New York, Buffalo and Cleveland, and we find them increasing rapidly, but no more rapidly proportionately than is our own country. Yet in the face of these facts hon. gentlemen opposite despair and hold up their hands, and say we are going to the dogs. That, however, is simply a repetition of what they declared in 1878. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at that time bewailed the fate of Canada, he declared he was perfectly helpless and could not do any more for the country; yet hon. gentlemen opposite have seen the country prosperous during the last six, seven or ten years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. RYKERT. "No," says the hon. gentleman. There is the best evidence of it. I have shown the prosperity of the country in the figures I have submitted, and I have shown that the increase of population in the United States is less than in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite may take the Yankee almanac and prove an exodus to their hearts' content, but their figures are not correct. Secretary Manning says that the immigration statistics are inaccurate, and cannot be relied on. We have the sworn statement that instead of the immigration of Canadians at Port Huron being 45,393 in 1873 it was only 7,222. Yet the hon. gentlemen opposite says we are going to the dogs, and, in fact, we find all of those hon. gentlemen making similar declarations. We have another and a very good authority. There is an agricultural college in Ontario, and in connection with it there is a distinguished authority by the name of Brown who certainly does not belong to the Conservative persuasion, but who is a gentleman holding high rank in the Reform-Liberal party, and that gentleman, in a letter to the Globe, on 15th December 1887, gave his opinion in regard to the condition of Canadian farmers, as follows:

"I have no hesitation, therefore, in again repeating that you are not only doing well and making money—whether placed in the bank, in improvement or on mortgage—but you are actually wealthy. When any farmer can pay 6 per cent. on what he gave for land and working appliances, give his family $100 to help keep the house, and then have one-fourth of the whole left to lay past or speculate with in future crops, he is second to no profession I know."

Now, Sir, there is a gentleman whose opinion on all those questions is well known. It does seems to me remarkably singular, in the face of the publicly declared utterance of men who ought to know and in face of the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industry and other documents that those gentlemen should in face of all that keep crying against and bemoaning the fate of Canada. The whole record points to the conclusion and shows that Canada is second in prosperity to no country in the world, and it proves too that no country has made such rapid progress. Let us take and compare with the State of New York. That is a great State and one of the richest and most prosperous of the States of the Union, and yet we find that official documents declare that the ratio of prosperity in the Province of Ontario is greater than in the State of New York. Yet, Sir, those gentlemen are now inviting us to go away from our home, they want us to go and leave this terrible and god-forsaken country, they say we are handicapped with debt and that the people are leaving the country by scores and thousands—two millions, I think they state left the country in the course of eight or nine years. Those gentlemen opposite complain about the institutions of this country and the reckless expenditure of the Government and everything of that kind. Where do they ask us to go to—to that blessed land on the other side of the line pictured by them in the most beautiful and glowing terms. But what did the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) think of the Yankee land in 1878? What did he think of this land we ought to rush to, this land into whose arms we ought to fly, this land under which we ought to submit ourselves to be taxed just as the American please, and to which we are to humble ourselves just as they wish to humble us. Speaking in the lower Provinces in 1878 he drew a far different picture of the United States and held up to us the progress of Canada. He said:

"We, Sir, have studied the example of the people of the United States and we see in the condition of that country almost everything which ought to warn you, not to allow yourselves under any plea or pretense to be deluded into imitating the system which has wrought so much mischief there. We see in the United States according to the testimony of their wisest writers, of their own most experienced statesmen that the result of their foolish system, is that capital to the extent of several thousand millions has been worse than wasted, that labor has been diverted from its proper channels, that the foreign commerce has been almost annihilated, that almost every evil has been brought upon the country—evils far exceeding, so far as regards the effect in their material prosperity, those which resulted from civil wars, and we have no desire to assist in bringing those evils upon the people whose welfare, for the moment, we are responsible. Have made up our minds, be it for weal or for woe, they will adhere to these principles that they believe are the only ones capable of extricating you from your difficulties, and that most assuredly they will not allow themselves to be cajoled into adopting a system from which as proved by the example of the United States we can expect nothing but ruin and decay."

Yet, Sir, after this the same gentleman now invites this House and this country to join this very same people. Sir, we have other evidence of the kind of country these hon. gentlemen wish us to go to. The New York Times, of February, 1888, speaks about the enormous debt upon different States. It says the States are heavily mortgaged and continues:

"The amount represented by the face of the farm mortgages in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas and Missouri, is $3,422,000,000. The actual value of the farms in these 10 States is to-day about $13,931,000,000. All talk relative to this vast sum of money being paid is utter folly. No agricultural people can pay such sums. Profits derived now from American agriculture are so small as to be unworthy of the slightest consideration.

The paper goes on to show that the farmer will not average $294 for each farmer, and of this small sum they will have to pay for labor, seed, rents, supplies, and they and their families live besides. It is not possible for these farmers to lift these mortgages. Yet those gentlemen say "go to that country," that country which is flowing with milk and honey, leave your own benighted Canada and see where you land. But let us think of what a bountiful time our farmer would have with $294, and what luxury he could enjoy. Why, after paying the rent and taxes he would have very little left to speak of. Let us see what this is I have here. It is an official paper from Minnesota. Here, Sir, is an eight-page advertisement of the tax sales of land in Polk county. There are 4,890 residents going to be sold out for taxes, and 2,875 non-residents advertised to be sold out for the same cause. There is where some of the hon. gentlemen want us to go, Polk County, Minnesota, there is the beautiful and blessed Yankee land for us to go to and be happy,—the beautiful land in which we find there are 7,765 lots to be sold for non-payment of taxes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was going to ask the hon. member whether he was not one of the parties who held up that country and its prosperity to us as a reason for adopting the National Policy?

Mr. RYKERT. Never.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Your leader did.

Mr. RYKERT. I never, Sir, never said one word on behalf of that country, and, I hope, I never shall, Sir. Well, Sir, let us go on a little further. We find what the Scientific American says of Dakota, that blessed land of the blizzard, to which we are asked to go,—the land which a short time ago was described as the land of the wild cat and hyena. The Scientific American, speaking of Dakota, says:—

"Good beef steaks were sold for 2c. per lb. live weight, and farmers kick at the low price; hogs are worth 4c. per lb.—"

"which is thought an excellent price. Corn 21c. per bushel, or say $5.75 per ton, allowing 70 lbs. to the bushel—very cheap. Some farmers talk of burning it for fuel, as it is considered as cheap as Pennsylvania hard coal at $11.80. Corn in the ear is said to be first class fuel by those who have used it."

And that again, Sir, is the blessed country, the beautiful paradise to which we are all invited to go. I, Sir, as a Canadian cannot feel justified in asking and advising my countrymen to go there; I cannot, Sir, as a Canadian feel myself justified in running down my country as hon. gentlemen opposite do. If our country is burdened with debt there is a way to overcome that, for if hon. gentlemen can satisfy the country that the ruin which they speak of has been brought about by gentlemen on the Treasury benches they and the country have a remedy. But they have proclaimed all this before the people on three different occasions and the people said that they had no confidence in what they stated. The people found them wanting and they rejected their professions. In the same way the gentlemen opposite are now crying down and belittling their country and asking us to go to that beautiful Yankee land of paradise such as Polk County. There never was a more inopportune time to discuss this question than at the present, because we find that the people on the other side of the line are discussing the question of altering their tariff. We see day after day reports of bills being introduced into Congress, in which the question is being discussed about altering or reducing the tariff in the United States. If, Sir, those ideas are carried out, if they meet with any response at the hands of the American people the tariff will be largely reduced and if the tariff were reduced what is to become of the revenue those gentlemen say we are going to have when we get unrestricted reciprocity? When our business has been built up by the National Policy, when our industries have been established and when we have a home market for our farmers it is unwise for us to discuss this question. It is crying down our country and impairing our credit in England and elsewhere. We ought to be the last people in the world to do this, but the whole stock in trade and the whole capital of hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be to cry down their country. There is too much anxiety on the part of those gentlemen for unrestricted reciprocity under which they can join the people of the United States. I can quote no higher authority than the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on this subject. Some time ago he thought it humiliating in a large degree for Canada to have reciprocity at the hands of the Americans. Speaking on 6th August, 1878, at Halifax, the hon. gentleman said:

"It was alleged that England herself was turning towards protection. In that case, she could undoubtedly discriminate against us, and what then would become of our surplus products, for which we now find a market in the mother country. It was unpatriotic to make Canada's existence dependent upon the United States granting reciprocity, and he repudiated the notion that reciprocity was as necessary to us as some have tried to make us believe: We are already in a fair position to compete with the United States on the markets of the world."

That is the opinion the hon. gentleman expressed on that occasion. He thought that it was humiliating for us to go to the United States and demand reciprocity. Then, the hon. member for Bothwell, in a speech made at Mount Elgin, in 1878, quoted with approval the following language of Sir Alexander Galt:—

"It is, therefore, thought desirable, and indeed our manifest duty to show them, not in a spirit of hostility, but certainly in that of independence, that while we value their friendship, and value their trade, we will not confirm to unreasonable terms, and would not have either our commercial policy or our political allegiance dictated to us by a foreign country."

At Charlottetown in the same year the hon. member for South Oxford delivered himself in strong language, and surely what he said then has equal force to-day. The circumstances of Canada have not much changed, except that the country has gone on and prospered more than any other country in the world, and how can he possibly say to-day that we ought to knuckle down at the foot of Brother Jonathan any more than then? The hon. gentleman said on that occasion:

"They say we must have reciprocity and we cannot live without it. For the Dominion of Canada I take exception to that statement. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We have men and ships, and 'will carry the war into Africa.' We will find new markets for ourselves, and cut them out. There is nothing better calculated to prevent the bringing about of reciprocity than to tell the Americans we cannot live without them. It would induce them to believe that they had the power to drive us to their own terms."

Can any person dissent from the argument of the hon. gentleman? No, we are entirely in accord with that, and what was applicable then is all the more applicable now in our present state of prosperity. Then, I will quote again from the organ of the hon. member for West Ontario; at least I assume that it is his organ. Between the Mail and the Globe I am not sure which is his organ. I believe in a long race the Mail is the better paper; it is better written, and gives better literature. But the Globe, referring I have no doubt to the hon. member for South Oxford, the hon. member for Bothwell and several others who at that time were barking at his heels, on 28th December, 1887, said:

"Now it happens that these people see in the natural wish of Canadians to extend their trade with their neighbors, occasion for preaching that the extension must be had instantly and at any price lest Canadians shall surely die. Though it is not easy to exaggerate the advantages of unrestricted reciprocity, they do manage to exaggerate them by taking that attitude. Not only so, but they compromise the prospects of success for the movement they profess to have at heart. To proclaim that we cannot exist without commercial union, to argue that we should sacrifice even our political status to get the boon, is the very method by which our republican neighbors will be induced to withhold it, if they have a desire to annex Canada. Does any reasonable man doubt that the pessimists understand that? They are too able not to be well aware that they actually obstruct unrestricted reciprocity by declaring, in effect, that the Canadian Provinces should even separateto obtain it. And why should they thus obstruct? The answer is surely plain. Have they not avowed their wish to smash the Confederation into its original fragments."

Now, Sir, in corroboration of what the hon. member for South Oxford said in 1878, we find the Globe following it up with the following strong language:—

"Is it a wise policy on the part of Sir John and his organs to show to the Americans such great anxiety to secure free trade with them? Is not that the way to prevent a reciprocity treaty? Is not the American answer under such circumstances certain to be that of the New York Sun: 'Reciprocity with Canada? Why, yes, certainly; we are ready for it, only it would be convenient for the several Provinces of the Dominion to be admitted among the United States as a conditional precedent.' The true attitude in reference to the United States is that which the Reform party has always taken: 'We can live without your trade; we are flourishing under our present tariff arrangements; we are not willing to annex ourselves, and are not anxious for any change but we are willing to make a fair reciprocity treaty which will benefit both countries.' Which is the more statesmanlike, this position or that adopted by Sir John and his organs?"

Thus you will see that the sentiment then pervading the Reform party and those who were then leading the party, was that it would be unwise and impolitic on their part to place on the Statute-book any declaration admitting that we were prepared to have reciprocity; and it does seem to me, in view of the opinions I have given you, expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is utterly unwise and impolitic for us at the present time to seek to get reciprocity on any terms except on the fair and reasonable terms proposed by Sir Charles Tupper. We have already had an opportunity of ascertaining how the American people feel on the question. If the hon. member for South Oxford is prepared to define what his resolution means, what kind of a treaty he wants, then we shall be able to judge exactly what his proposition is. We are asked to pass a vague and meaningless resolution; but we want to know what kind of a treaty hon. gentlemen opposite propose. Do they ask for a treaty more extensive than that of 1874? If they do, I say they have no chance of getting it. The question has been discussed over and over again in Congress and almost every place in the United States, and the unanimous testimony of the American people was that even the Reciprocity Treaty of 1874 went too far. If there is any meaning at all in the resolution of the hon. gentleman, you would have manufactures of every kind passing across the line without paying customs duty.

It being six o'clock, the House adjourned.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. When you left the Chair, Sir, I was about to discuss the terms of the Treaty of 1874, and to show that it was not acceptable to the people of the United States, although it was far more extensive in its provisions than the old Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, which existed down to 1866. I may here remark that his new found scheme of Mr. Wiman and Mr. Butterworth is nothing but the resurrection of an old scheme which was propounded some years ago in the House of Representatives. I find that, in a debate which took place in that body, this whole question of commercial union was discussed, and although a very strong and a very plaintive appeal was made to that representative body on behalf of the scheme, yet they paid no attention whatever to it, but thought it unwise and impolitic. I find that the whole matter has been treated in a speech made by the hon. Elijah Ward in the House of Representatives, on 18th, May 1876. In that speech, he pointed out all the propositions which Mr. Wiman has laid before this country, and comparing the speech made by Mr. Ward on that occasion to several made by Mr. Wiman since, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Wiman has simply resurrected the scheme which was propounded years ago in the House of Representatives. Mr. Ward, in the course of his remarks, made these observations:

"As many manufactures in both countries are made of material imported from various parts of the world, it would manifestly be impossible to establish a completely free system of commercial intercourse with Canada, except under duties not only corresponding but also equitably divided on the productions of the countries. This is the chief obstacle to any fair mutual advantages and complete arrangement of reciprocity between us."

And he goes on to discuss the scheme from the same standpoint as Mr. Wiman does. I merely mention this to show that the scheme is not a new one, and to show that it is not one which is at all likely to be acceptable to the United States; and I maintain there is no use in our proposing an arrangement to which the people of the United States have shown they are decidedly adverse. I take the ground as a Canadian, that we ought not to humble ourselves at the feet of the United States. We should rather see what our country can do by itself in the march of progress; we should rather see if we cannot compete with the United States, and I would like to see our country pursue the course we have hitherto pursued of working and advancing in a spirit of generous rivalry with our neighbors, and resisting every attempt to merge ourselves in the institutions of the United States, either politically or otherwise, as such a policy must inevitably end in annexation. The Treaty of 1874, which was framed by the Hon. George Brown, was one of a more comprehensive character than that of 1854. It provided for the introduction in Canada of the manufactures of the United States and vice versa, and was in fact much more extensive in its provisions than we would be prepared to go at present. It went much further than I, as a representative of the people, would consent to go, as long as I hold a seat in this Legislature. But even that treaty met with the universal condemnation of the people of the United States comprehensive and extensive as it was, embracing as it did manufactures of every description, as any hon. gentleman will see by looking at the treaty itself, it did not meet with favor on the other side; and if I refer to it now, one of my reasons for doing so is to give the opinion pronounced on it by a very prominent Reformer, then member for Toronto, Mr. John McDonald, now Senator McDonald, who was considered as level headed a man as we have in the whole Dominion. Mr. McDonald denounced that treaty in the most unmeasured terms, and consequently came under the censure of the organ of his party, as must inevitably any person who has the hardihood to differ from its opinions. That, however, is a compliment which most men like to have paid them, and I have no doubt the censure of the Globe had no effect on Mr. John McDonald. Speaking of reciprocity, he said:

"Upon no clause of the Reciprocity Treaty but those relating to our own trade, do we desire to express an opinion. It needs but little reasoning to prove what the results will be when the American goods referred to are admitted into our country duty free. To the Canadian manufacturer—ruin. To the Canadian dealer—loss. To the projected manufacturing interests—stoppage. To the Canadian consumer—direct taxation. To the entire trade of this country—disturbance, uneasiness and uncertainty."

That is the opinion of Senator McDonald, then member for the city of Toronto, and I have no doubt his opinion would have great weight. But, in the same connection, allow me, Sir, to show you the opinions of gentlemen of the United States, who thoroughly understand the question. We have the opinion of Mr. Blain, who was at that time candidate for re-election to the State of Maine, and this treaty was then being discussed on every platform in the United States. Mr. Blain said:

"The treaty of that name which was terminated in 1866 was cruelly oppressive to the people of Maine and inflicted upon the people of that State, the 11 years of its existence, a loss of $50,000,000. It presented the singular anomaly of giving to the Canadians the control of our markets of certain leading articles on terms far more favorable than our own people had ever enjoyed. Let us simply place Canada on the same basis with other foreign countries, taxing her for duties or admitting them free, according to our own judgment of the interest of our revenue and the needs of the people, always bearing in mind that in governmental as well as friendly matters "charity begins at home."

So you will see that he had no respect whatever for that treaty proposed by the Hon. George Brown. He looked upon it as something which the United States people could not accept, because it was not at all in their interest. To show the opinions of the American people on this question, we have had a certain amount of literature placed before us by the American papers during the last two months, and I propose to lay before the House some evidence of the terms on which the Americans would be willing to admit us into commercial union, and what a beautiful position we would occupy if we should put ourselves at their mercy. The Chicago Times, speaking of an unconditional surrender on our part said:

"Unless, therefore, the Dominion is prepared to make a complete and unconditional surrender of all control over its own tariff and accept whatever tariff our Congress may choose to enact from time to time, the scheme of commercial union, in the sense in which the phrase is used, is entirely out of the question."

The Chicago Times says further:

"It must not be forgotten, that this proposition (commercial union) implies a complete surrender by the Dominion Parliament to the American Congress of all control over the principle of the Dominion's revenue—the tariff. Whatever it may please the American Congress to do regarding the tariff, that the Dominion Government must forthwith accept. Our Congress would have even more power over the Dominion under this arrangement than it would in the event of political union, because the people of the Dominion would have neither vote nor voice in Washington under the proposed commercial union, while they would have both under political union. Not only would our Congress prescribe and change at pleasure all the tariff taxes exacted from the people of Canada, but our executive officers and our courts would make all the rulings and decisions affecting rates for the Dominion as well as for the United States."

That is the position we would occupy in the opinion of one of the best writers in the United States, and he further expresses his opinion by saying:

"The fact seems to be that very many Canadians who are talking about this project imagine that they are talking about something like the old Treaty of Reciprocity, and it is probable that if the real wish of the Canadians could be ascertained, it would be found to be for reciprocity and not for a surrender by their Government of all control over their own tariff—a thing almost necessarily involved in the customs union scheme."

Then we have the Philadelphia Record, which says:

"No scheme which would give to Canada an equal voice in the determination of federal taxation could be considered. She would have to accept the position of a State in the Union, with only such power in the determination of the tax rate as her comparative population would entitle her to. How this could be effected without representation in Congress is a matter hard to determine."

So, as far as we are concerned, they do not propose that we should have anything to say in regard to taxation or revenue, but we must be contented to take whatever they choose to give us, and for the balance we must resort to direct taxation.

Mr. TROW. You are speaking of commercial union now, not of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Siamese twins.

Mr. RYKERT. I think I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman in a short time that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade are all the same thing, but he had better consult the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in regard to that matter, because at Jarvis he made a speech in which he said that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity were both means to arrive at the same end. This paper goes on and says:

"If Canada wants free trade with this great country, she can get it once and for all by casting in her lot with us. Nobody who has any sense should strike a blow to annex her territory to ours, but when the Canadian people, kindred to us in blood and language, and living in a land which nature has made a part of ours, wish to become incorporated with this great Republic, they will be cordially welcomed; and we may confidently affirm that they will never secure permanent free trade with us until this movement occurs."

Now, what does the hon. gentleman say to that? He is a free trader, and according to the doctrine laid down there, even a free trader cannot expect to have access to the markets of the United States unless he joins hand in hand with the people. A few days ago, we had a speech made by a young offshoot of Mr. Blaine, young Mr. Blaine, in which he indulges in the flowing and beautiful language which we sometimes hear on the other side of the House and which we often hear on the other side of the line. He says:

"American fishermen will never rest content, and this vexed and vexatious problem will never find abiding solution save under some such agreement as that of the Treaty of 1783 or 1854, honorably enforced and maintained in spirit and in letter. There are many ways doubtless by which such an end may be gained, but if this be the best treaty which Great Britain and Canada will grant negotiation is not to be numbered among them. Two measures at once suggest themselves, punishment and persuasion. The means for the first are furnished in the resolution of Congress authorising the President to inflict retaliatory measures; for the second, in the lately much-discussed commercial union. Deprive Canada of all business relations with the country or grant to her, not a treaty framed on the lines of the ridiculous, one-sided reciprocity of Lord Elgin, but on the basis of unrestricted interchange of products, with the enactment and enforcement of our tariff laws."

So none of these gentlemen will accept us unless upon their own terms, that is, that we should accept their tariff laws and allow them to change them as they please, no matter how it may affect us or how it may affect our revenue. They do not appear to want any such makeshift policy as hon. gentlemen advocate. The Rochester Democrat says: "This country does not want any such makeshift policy," but it says it "is willing to unite the interests of the two countries in a bond which will be effective as against the competition of the mother country." Then we find also that the American Manufacturer says:

"We are not anxious to annex 'hopeless and helpless' people, but we assume will be obliged to take a few of this kind along with the rest. Under the inspiration of American citizenship they may become hopeful and helpful. Possibly after all Canada becomes thoroughly ripe for annexation, the Goddess of Liberty will hold out her apron and catch her as she involuntarily falls from the parent limb."

That is a fine position for the hon. gentleman to place us in. Here is a paper, the Minneapolis Tribune, which has always shown a great deal of sympathy for the people of Canada, and no doubt has strong feelings in our favor. That paper says:

"The followers of the present Conservative Government oppose commercial union as destructive of their policy of national development. A Government which has had the courage and spirit to build the Canadian Pacific Railway in furtherance of its idea of a great northern confederation, knit together by common interests and strong national feeling, is not going to surrender its policy tamely. That policy contemplates the building up of Canadian industries by a protective tariff against the United States, England and the other manufacturing countries. The Canadian who does not shrink from the idea of political union with the United States as the ultimate destiny of his country, may well favor commercial union as advantageous. The Canadian whose ambition for his country is an independent position as a member of the family of nations, may well pause before committing himself to the plan of free trade across the line."

So you see, from the quotations which I have made from the American newspapers, that we have no sympathy with the policy initiated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Whether you call it commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade, or direct free trade, they are one and the same thing, and I think I can show that from the hon. gentleman's own utterances. I will quote again from my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who has been showing himself very conspicuous in advocating free trade and in educating the young Liberal idea in that direction. At Waterford, he said:

"The two plans are different modes proposed of arriving at substantially the same result."

At Jarvis, on 4th November, he said :

"It is simply a customs union between two or more independent states, where a common tariff and excise laws are adopted and the revenue collected, and after deducting expenses of collection so divided among the participants in the basis of population or any other basis that might be agreed upon, while all trade restrictions between them were removed."

So you will see that commercial union, as far as the hon. member for North Norfolk is concerned, means the abandonment of the customs line between the two countries, the pooling of receipts, and the dividing of the pool according to population or according to some other means which may be suggested; and the result of that must be a deficiency in our revenue which must be made up by direct taxation. No hon. gentleman on that side who has spoken, either in this House or in the country, has intimated that we could receive more than $5,000,000 from the pooling arrangement, which would show a deficiency according to our present expenditure of over $10,000,000, which would have to be made up by direct taxation, and the consequence would be that, no matter what we had this year, we could not know what we would receive the next year. We must be dependent upon the amount received from the United States for the amount required for our expenditures, and we must find out whether we would receive enough to carry on future improvements before we could settle our own taxation. The result would be that all future improvements must be abolished, that no more railways must be built, that no railway subsidies must be granted, and that we must resort to direct taxation. We all know well, and I will be able to show before I sit down, how direct taxation will work. Now, as regards commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and I think they are one and the same thing, according to the definitions made by the hon. gentleman. A few days ago Mr. Cluxton, of Peterborough, made a speech in which he said :

"That commercial union meant unrestricted reciprocity, unrestricted commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States, or in other words the obliteration of the customs line between the two countries, in fact the abolition of all tariff and customs duties."

Now, we find what it really means. We find that this celebrated Mr. Hitt, who is now making himself conspicuous in the Congress of the United States upon this question, at a banquet in the city of Boston, pointed out what are really meant by reciprocity and commercial union :

"We in the West would like you, manufacturers of New England, to have access to that great market of Canada. With a reciprocity treaty, or, better still, commercial union, you will have the preference over English, French and German goods; and in two years' time after it is adopted goods from Yankee manufacturers will be in every retail store from Montreal to Victoria."

That is a beautiful prospect for the manufacturers of Canada. Hon. gentlemen will find that, if their policy is carried out, the result will be that every retail store between Vancouver and Halifax will be filled by American manufactures. More than that, he goes on to let the cat out of the bag, and I suppose our friends from the Maritime Provinces will like to hear this. He says :

"In a commercial union, with a common tariff and the border free, probably a larger part of the imports of Canada than at present would enter by way of New York and New England ports—and the receipts of Canadian ports would, of course, correspondingly fall off."

We will be entirely at their mercy; they will so arrange matters that our cities upon the shores of the Atlantic will be completely deprived of that volume of trade which has done so much to build them up during the last few years. Then there is Mr. Shaw, who seems to be an authority upon this commercial union question, who takes the same view. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) seems to have the same view of the matter. Then we find that the Farmer's Advocate says that they don't know what they are talking about, they don't know what it really means. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a definition of unrestricted reciprocity ought to have been given by the hon. gentlemen in moving this resolution. They ought to tell us what they mean by this proposition; they have failed so to do, and they leave us in a state of obscurity. Now, I do not feel disposed, and this House will not feel disposed, to accept any proposition which is surrounded with so many difficulties, and so many uncertainties as this proposition made by the hon. gentleman. We find that the hon. member who moved this resolution spoke some time ago in the town of Ingersoll, prior to the meeting of the House, and he there discussed the question of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. He says they are one and the same subject, one and the same thing. He says it is so surrounded with difficulties that it is utterly impossible to tell exactly what will be the result, but of one thing he is certain—that unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, will lead to discrimination against England. He is certain also that it will depreciate and reduce our revenue; he is certain that our political system must sooner or later be abolished and that in consequence we shall be absorbed into the American Union. Now, Sir, these are matters, it seems to me, of very serious import. In the speech made a few nights ago, the hon. gentleman points out all these difficulties; he points out the difficulty with regard to our revenue, and the difficulty with regard to discrimination against England; but in his speech at Ingersoll he said of the two alternatives, we should choose that of annexation in preference to refusing to accept the benefits of commercial union. The hon. gentleman, as reported in the Globe newspaper, seems to have made up his mind on that point. He seems to have made up his mind that direct taxation must come, and the sooner it comes the better :

"I speak strongly and I feel strongly on this matter; the more so because it is quite manifest that the very men whose corrupt and extravagant mismanagement have mainly contributed to bring about this shameful state of things are now impudently declaring that the very consequences of their misconduct form an insuperable barrier to obtaining this great boon for the people of Canada!

"The argument is worthy of the men.

"Nevertheless it is quite true, and it would be folly to deny it, that we do enter into any negotiation with the United States at a serious disadvantage by reason of our own folly."

Again he says :

"Now you will see that I have put the case against us as strongly as even the fiercest opponents of the scheme can desire, and therefore you may feel assured that the difficulty is not insuperable. I am not speaking at random when I say that even so I decline to admit that this forms any insuperable difficulty.

"In the first place I have given you the worst aspect of the case. In the next I am very clear that the great mass of the people will profit largely, and be, therefore, better able to bear additional taxes.

"In the third place, it is likely that our remaining taxes will produce more, and finally, what is of most importance, it is a mere shifting of taxation, and you will not have to pay one cent more on the whole.

"We have to raise $30,000,000 anyway. It is simply a question of the mode in which you will raise it.

"It will not cost the people of Canada one cent more, but rather the reverse, if they elect to raise a portion of this money by direct instead of indirect taxation."

So you see that the hon. gentleman has surrounded this question with a great many difficulties, and therefore I say it is one that this country ought not to accept. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as I said before, stated that he voiced the sentiments of the country, he voiced the sentiments of the Liberal party in the House and outside, and of a very large majority of the hon. members who are not in political accord with the Reform party. But I would like to point out that while these gentlemen are in favor of this policy, the leader is entirely opposed to it. Mr. Blake, in his Hamilton speech, is entirely opposed to it. He said it was utterly impossible that we could adopt a free trade policy at the present time—entirely out of the question; and these gentlemen who are trying to make us adopt this resolution—the hon. member for Bothwell shakes his head. What does he mean by free trade? I shall show from his own organ that he means free trade, before I get through. Mr. Blake, then, declared positively that the Government should not change our fiscal system, that it would be detrimental to the best interest of this country. Now, Sir, it is rather strange, when we look at the history of the past few months, to see the wonderful changes that have come over different members of that party. It seems to me they have no right to ask this House, or to ask the country, to adopt a policy upon which they are divided, upon which they cannot form one concerted opinion. On the contrary, I say, they are as diverse as the poles. The Globe newspaper, which is now the organ of that party—it seems to have triumphed now in this little race; this resolution is according to the principles of the Globe, but in opposition to the London Advertiser, the organ of the hon. member for Bothwell, and other papers which profess to represent that party in Ontario. The hon. member himself was in favor of commercial union pure and simple against unrestricted reciprocity. A little while ago, I think he shook his head when I said that, but I think I shall be able to refresh his memory in a few minutes. But this we do know, that the Liberal organ discussed commercial union and then unrestricted reciprocity, and when the East Northumberland election came on the whole question discussed then was commercial union, and a strong protest was made immediately after that election to the Reform party because they had not carried commercial union. Now, I find in the organ of the hon. member for Bothwell, this language. The article is headed "Commercial Union, versus Unrestricted Reciprocity":—

"The Toronto Globe is devoting itself to the advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity in opposition to a plan of commercial union. We wonder whether our contemporary has been encouraged in this line by the success of Mr. Cochrane against Dr. Mallory. Commercial union lies within the range of practical politics. In our opinion unrestricted reciprocity does not. Reciprocity in natural products is practicable because the natural products of no other country are likely to find their way across the American border from Canada."

I think the hon. gentleman was in accord with my individual opinion, and he seems to favor the proposition laid down in the Statute of 1879 in favor of reciprocity in natural products. He says:

"The wheat, the barley, the oats, and whatever else we may produce that we might send in to the market of the United States under a reciprocity treaty are not likely to be interfered with at the border, but this would not apply to manufactured goods. Unrestricted reciprocity would necessitate the continuance of all the custom house officers upon the frontier that are now found there, and the right to make a different tariff would be of no value to us, the more especially as free trade with a neighboring Republic would imply a higher rate of customs duties as against others, and as we are in greater need for purposes of revenue, than the United States of high taxes, we have nothing to gain and much to lose by isolated action upon the tariff. They can afford to do with a lower rate of taxation than we, and everything at the present time points to the possibility of the American side of the border falling below the rate of taxation here."

I have now established beyond all controversy that the hon. gentleman who shook his head this afternoon is in favor of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) evidently somewhat disconcerted at the position of the Reform party at the late elections, and finding they were demoralised and without a policy, desired to secure a policy. The hon. gentleman said, at the Farmers' Union at Waterford, that it would be a good idea to adopt commercial union as the Liberal platform. The hon. gentleman then thought that commercial union would be a grand plank in the platform of the party, and he evidently seized it with some degree of pleasure. He thus started the question upon its journey, and now we find it introduced in this House as the platform of the Reform party. I should like to know what difference there is between the two terms—commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. I say there is no difference; and, in fact, the hon. member for North Norfolk says they are one and the same thing. He said:

"This Farmers' Union will naturally and legitimately look into the question of our trade relations, our natural markets, &c., and it will at once be confronted with the question of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. This is not yet a political issue. It is receiving the favorable consideration of men of all parties. Perhaps it may yet answer the despairing demand for a policy made by that portion of the great Liberal party of Canada who were not satisfied with a mere policy of negation, but at the present moment the issue is not a part of the political creed of either of the great parties. Perhaps it may lead to a recast of Canadian political parties, but it now appeals upon its own merits alone for favorable consideration."

Again I am constrained to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the Liberal leader has not yet opened his mouth here on this question. What has that hon. gentleman to say in regard to the opinion of his party friends in Lower Canada? He appears to be afraid of the issue, for he has allowed his deputy leader to assume all responsibility and thrust upon this House and the country a policy which cannot be acceptable, because he himself says it is not a feasible policy. What did the hon. member for Quebec East, the leader of the Opposition in this House, say? He said at Somerset:

"I am not ready to declare that commercial union is an acceptable idea; I am not ready on my part to declare that commercial union is a principle which ought to be adopted. There are a great many considerations and there is a great deal of preliminary study to be gone through before a stand can be taken one side or the other. Commercial union may be possible, perhaps, but it may be surrounded with insurmountable difficulties, but the time has come when the policy of reprisals must be left out, and Canadians must show the American people that they like fair play."

The hon. member for Bothwell again took up this question and discussed it in answer to the Montreal Gazette, and I will show what the views of that hon. gentleman were upon it. He said on the 19th December, 1887:—

"The Montreal Gazette says that commercial union is objectionable because it would take from Parliament that control over the revenue which has ever been held as the main source of strength in the Commons in their struggle for supremacy in the state. A more absurd proposition could not well be put into a single sentence. Commercial union no more takes from Parliament control of the revenue than does any ordinary treaty of reciprocity. The Gazette says that commercial union would take from the Parliament of Canada the right to make a tariff. It would do nothing of the kind. It would take from Parliament the right to impose taxes upon articles produced in the United States."

We find the leader of the Opposition is called upon to take part in the election contest in Haldimand. The first time he appeared in Ontario as leader of the Liberal Party he was called upon to express an opinion upon this question of commercial union, at the time he was endeavoring to run out Mr. Montague. He said:

"Tory politicians call me a rebel, but, rebel as I am, the great difficulty to my mind—a difficulty which I have not solved—is the one that I am not quite sure commercial union would be consistent with the duty we owe to the mother country."

That is what I like to hear, but pass this resolution and see how far you can keep in line with the mother country. The very moment this proposition is adopted, that very moment you draw down the barriers between this country and the United States, and you erect a barrier against Great Britain.

"I feel that the time has not yet come for me to discuss this question and to give the solution which I shall some day be called upon to give."

I said a few moments ago that the policy was a shifting one, the party being for commercial union, then for unrestricted reciprocity, and then back to commercial union. The organ of the hon. member for West Ontario, the Toronto Globe, was terribly annoyed at the result of the election in East Northumberland, and it expresses its opinion upon this question in the following terms on 23rd December, 1887:—

"We suppose every Tory organ from Cape Breton to Vancouver will this morning overflow with joy on account of the glorious defeat of a commercial union candidate yesterday. * * * What the election proves—and to this we would like to direct the attention of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain—is that in the past election in which commercial union was made an issue, the anti-commercial union candidate, backed by the entire strength of a victorious Government came within a hair-breadth of being defeated."

Again the Globe pins its faith to commercial union and looks hopefully to the future. On 24th December, 1887, it said:

"Though the Opposition must regret that the unrestrictedists have won a seat in East Northumberland, the Commercial unionists have reason to congratulate themselves on the very good run made by their candidate. Mr. Cochrane beat the commercial union candidate by nearly twenty votes, that is, we say, very strong evidence that unrestricted reciprocity will sweep the country whenever taken up by a regular party organisation and presented to the people as the sole issue in a general contest. We can remember no scheme of so short a presentation before the electors of any country gained so large a proportion of votes as commercial union has polled in East Northumberland. All political experience suggests early success by the party which flings aside all other questions and stands on this only."

So even at that time the Globe kept prominently before the people commercial union. We have also the opinion and no less an authority of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that the scheme is entirely impracticable, and under any circumstances it is utterly impossible for the Reform party as a whole. That hon. member, who is given somewhat to literature, describes the difficulty in this way, in one of his celebrated letters he sent to Mr. Wiman:

"We are often told that unrestricted reciprocity would 'sweep away all the custom houses upon the frontier.' If that were to be done it seems clear, for several reasons, that we would have to agree upon a uniform customs tariff with the United States against the rest of the world. In other words, the entire tariff legislation of both countries would be brought to a standstill during the duration of the treaty, and it is scarcely conceivable that either Canada or the United States could arrive at a satisfactory uniform tariff to last for that period."

And yet in the face of that declaration the hon. gentleman is going to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. He points out the utter unsatisfactory condition of the whole scheme and that we could not possibly carry on the affairs of this country with a tariff which is likely to be shifted about from one end to the other.

"Mr. Chamberlain, at his interview with the press in Washington on the 18th inst., is reported to have stated that 'the most important reason why the project of commercial union could not be successfully inaugurated was the fact that the Tariff Acts of the two countries do not agree, and that it would be difficult to devise a plan which could meet this objection.'"

"It is useless to deny that there are both practical and sentimental difficulties in the way of establishing a uniform tariff for the two countries against the rest of the world, and of maintaining this uniformity during the life of a reciprocity treaty. I suppose these difficulties are not insuperable."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) again wants reciprocity pure and simple. I find that on the 12th December, 1887, in his organ he says:

"We shall be pleased to obtain reciprocity in natural products with the United States; we shall be pleased, failing this, to get unrestricted reciprocity; we believe that it must be greatly to the advantage of this country, and that it would affect the revenues much less than unrestricted reciprocity with the mother country."

You see, hon. gentlemen, that he wants reciprocity pure and simple, and failing that, he wants unrestricted reciprocity. He goes on to point out in an article of the 19th November the difficulties of having a common tariff, and the difficulties in the way of importations from both countries. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, the member for Bothwell, (Mr. Mills) who, as I said before, was strongly in favor of commercial union as against unrestricted reciprocity, got quite annoyed at the unrestricted reciprocity advocates, and gave them a bit of his mind and opinion in his organ some time afterwards. On the 19th November, 1887, he says this is a very "serious mistake, and continues:

"We observe that some of our contemporaries are declared in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, as they call it, rather than commercial union. They say that in case of unrestricted reciprocity we would be left free to make our own tariff, while the United States might make theirs and so we would have absolute free trade with the United States with reference to the products and manufactures of the two countries without being bound with them in a common tariff. In our opinion those who take this position are making a most serious mistake, as it is certainly not a proposition which will be entertained by our neighbors, and which would have all the burdens and inconveniences attending it which belong to the present system."

The hon. gentleman thinks if they cannot accept commercial union it was better abandon all idea of unrestricted trade with the United States. He goes on to say:

"If our people are not prepared to accept commercial union they had better abandon all idea of unrestricted trade with the neighboring republic, we must have a common tariff, we must, if we have unrestricted trade, get rid of the customs houses along the entire frontier, and that we could not do except by agreement with our neighbor upon a common tariff."

He points out the objections:

"How are the people of the United States to know that the cottons which we propose to send in are Canadian bleached cotton? How are they to know whether the tweeds and flannels are manufactured in this country or in Scotland?"

So from this evidence we see that the hon. gentleman was first in favor of commercial union as against unrestricted reciprocity. Then we find that although the organs of the party were in favor of unrestricted reciprocity he suddenly changed front in the month of January, 1888, and he turns around in favor of commercial free trade. Then, Sir, we find that all the organs of the party headed by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the member for Wellington (Mr. Innes), and the member for South Brant (Mr. Somerville) at once raised a cry against the new policy of the Reform party and against the Globe newspaper. Let hon. gentlemen bear in mind this which I take from the Globe of 20th January:

"But unrestricted reciprocity would not greatly reduce anything except agricultural implements. Woollens, for instance, are dearer now in Dakota than in Manitoba. On the whole, the Manitoba farmers' supplies, harring machines and tools, are as cheap as in Dakota. Under free trade with the world the Manitoba farmer would obtain untaxed implements and untaxed British goods as well. He would gain nearly all that unrestricted reciprocity can give him. In addition his entire list of necessities would be reduced fully 30 per cent. Freedom of railway building, important as it is, will never be worth as much as free trade to the North-West farmer, grazer or merchant."

You see that the Globe was in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. Unrestricted reciprocity would do as much for him as annexation, his position would be nothing like as good under annexation as under free trade for the whole world. Now, Mr. Speaker, again I find that this unrestricted reciprocity on which you are now called to pass judgment in this House, is also condemned in the very strongest terms and the results that would follow from it are pointed out by the Globe newspaper again:

"It is not useless, as the pessimists declare, to keep before the country that unrestricted reciprocity, though the most desirable of changes, is not the only alternative, nor even the most profitable policy for Canada. If we wished to produce public despair we might preach that commercial union is the one salvation from the present bad position, and that that salvation should be sought at all costs. But we are content to leave that false and abominable teaching to our good neighbors the pessimists, the gentlemen not Canadian in any respect who have set out to smash the Confederation."

This was referring to the member for Bothwell's organ, which had been attacking the Globe.

"It is their business to profess despair and create it."

Which they are doing in the House all the time.

"The lengths that they will go may be understood from two particulars. Professor Goldwin Smith's favorite journal recently suggested that the Canadian fisheries should be surrendered for nothing but to placate our neighbors so that they might perhaps incline their hearts to give us reciprocity! And the distinguished writer himself said: 'One touch of the Retaliation Act would bring the policy of separation and restriction down with a run.'"

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that so far I have established beyond all question, that unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union, continental free trade and free trade are one and the same thing so far as those gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are concerned; and that we had at one time or the other the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity or in favor of free trade. What, sir, will be the result of this measure so far as Canada is concerned? We have been told by hon. gentlemen who have spoken that the result of this proposition if adopted or crystallized into legislation must end in direct taxation, and that the revenues of our country will not be able to meet the extraordinary and growing expenses required for carrying on government; so that we must have direct taxation. This, Sir, has been fully pointed out. I have a letter here written by Mr. James Young, the former member for one of the Waterloos, who lives in Galt and whose opinion on this question is well worthy of consideration. That gentleman has given the matter a great deal of study and some of the most interesting literature contributed to this question during the recess has been contributed by Mr. Young. Mr. Young in one of his pamphlets shows that the result must be direct taxation, and I venture to say that quoting such a high authority as that hon. members, on the opposite side of the House will not be inclined to question it. Mr. Young says:

"One of the first results of commercial union would be the loss of nearly $7,000,000 of revenue annually collected by us from American imports. The total customs revenue of the Dominion for 1886 was $19,373,551, and notwithstanding our high taxation, there was a deficit of $3,834,000. How could we pay our public creditors and prevent financial embarrassment if we gave up our control over the tariff, and at the same time threw away $3,769,000, or over one-third of our total customs receipts, which was the amount collected from the United States goods last year?"

"It will not do to 'pooh pooh' this question instead of answering it. It is a matter of the most vital consequence. The solvency or bankruptcy of the Dominion may depend upon it. The seven millions of revenue would have to be raised and how could we do it? We could not raise it by higher duties on imports, for we would be under the continental tariff which we wouldn't control, and if we even trebled our inland revenue taxes it is extremely doubtful if the amount would be forthcoming, for the rates would be, in many cases, prohibitory, inducing smuggling and other evasions of the revenue. But even if we could easily raise the $7,000,000, what class of Canadian tax-payers, least of all our farmers, who have the brunt of the burden to bear now, would ever dream of taxing themselves for commercial union to such an extent."

That, Sir, is the opinion of a gentleman well informed on all those questions. I think that evidence proves beyond doubt that the result of this policy must be direct taxation. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his speech a few nights ago refers also to the same question and speaks as regards direct taxation. He admits there would be some difficulty in meeting the revenues and he shows the only way it could be done would be by direct taxation. He does not look upon that as a very objectionable feature, but Sir, we know that if the leader of the Liberal party were here he would oppose this very scheme. The hon. member for West Durham, in appealing to the electors last February, at Hamilton, said:

"Fiscal system of Canada for many years. What is that system? It is the system of raising revenue by indirect taxation. Direct taxation for the Dominion is, in my judgment, a practical impossibility. Indirect taxation must be the source of our revenue."

The hon. member for South Oxford is also at issue with the hon. member for Bothwell. In moving his resolution the other night, he said:

"Sir, I desire to say that, in my judgment, we ought not, I do not think that Government would dare, I do not think any other Government would wish, to add by direct taxation one farthing or one penny to the taxes that now press most heavily on the agricultural classes, on the fishermen, on the miners, on the lumbermen, on all the great producing classes in this community. I shall be prepared to prove in some detail, at the proper place and time, that among the many faults with which our system abounds, perhaps the greatest is this: that under it the hard-working, industrious, thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that with a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it, although I doubt greatly whether you need, with proper economy, have recourse to it, that crying injustice must be redressed, and the respectable, well-to-do, monied classes must be made to pay their fair proportion—no more should be asked—to the burdens of the country. This proportion they most assuredly do not contribute to-day, and never will under a system of purely indirect taxation."

Does the hon. member for Bothwell agree with that proposition? He will not answer; I will give the answer for him.

Mr. RYKERT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I expressed no opinion upon it. I said that it was a suggestion for an income tax.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman's memory is a little defective. I noticed that he applauded the hon. member for South Oxford when he made that speech, and being such a high authority on political economy the hon. gentleman I know entirely approved of it—that customs duties should be done away and the taxes should be levied by direct taxation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He never said so.

Mr. RYKERT. I read it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. RYKERT. Well, I will read it again:

"I shall be prepared to prove in some detail, at the proper time and place, that among the many faults with which our system abounds—"

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The protective system.

Mr. RYKERT. No, he does not say that at all.

"—perhaps the greatest is this: that under it the hardworking, industrious, thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it, &c."

What did the hon. member for Bothwell say a short time ago? He said it would be absurd to have direct taxation. It is really hard to catch him; now you have him, and now you have not. On 23rd December, 1887, the London Advertiser, his organ, says:—

"Mr. Mills in his celebrated work on political economy pointed out the reasons why a fairly imposed customs tax is preferable to direct taxation and the reason he assigns are of general application. Direct tax must be paid at some stated time, whether it is convenient for the tax-payer or not, and it never can be imposed upon the community, in such a way as to impose upon each individual burden in proportion to his ability to pay. A customs tax, if the principles of free trade are kept in view, and if levied for the sole purpose of revenue, is really an income tax in the expenditure of each family, in the purchase of imports, bears a much closer proportion to the income of each person, than if an attempt were specially made to tax income."

Now, if the hon. gentleman is logical and consistent, he will oppose this resolution, because its effect must be as stated by himself and others—direct taxation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes, the hon. gentleman said so himself, and the hon. member for South Oxford said so in his speech.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, he does not, nor does he in the extract you read.

Mr. RYKERT. He said:

"We will suppose for argument's sake."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentlemen do not disconcert me in the least. I can stay here until to-morrow morning if necessary—

"We will suppose, for argument's sake, that we have to face this bugbear of direct taxation—direct taxation, be it remembered, not for all our revenue, but a trifling portion of it alone. Now, Sir, I have to call the attention of the House in that connection to certain important facts. First of all, no man who has paid any attention to this subject will, I think, dare to deny the fact, which, I think, is recognised by every political economist, that direct taxation properly levied takes a great deal less out of the pocket of the people than direct taxation; most of all, indirect taxation, levied as our system of indirect taxation is levied now."

That is what the hon. gentleman says. He says that we require a revenue of $35,000,000, that in pooling the most we can have is $25,000,000, and that the rest will have to be raised by direct taxation. He said that distinctly at Ingersoll. I believe the hon. member for Bothwell is opposed to direct taxation, and he says the whole Reform party is opposed to it; and yet the organ of the party is in favor of direct taxation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. RYKERT. Well, we will see before I get through. The Globe on 22nd September, 1887, said :

"The only objection to the adoption is that some part of the Dominion revenue might have to be raised by direct taxation. To our mind that is another recommendation. To pay a considerable share of taxes directly would induce the people to be very careful as to whom they committed the administration. Still it appears to be true that direct taxation is much of a bugaboo to politicians, especially to French Canadians."

So you see the Globe is in favor of direct taxation, and says it is only bugaboo raised by the French Canadians. Then we find that the Globe says commercial union would result in direct taxation. On 22nd January, it said :

"If the advantages are what he states, is the objection that free trade involves direct taxation a powerful one? Certainly not from unmitigated Commercial Unionists. That reduction of the United States tariff is certainly imminent, will reduce the American revenue so much that, if Canadians paid to it according to consumption, and shared in it according to population they would have to resort to direct taxation in order to provide the Federal Government with the necessary revenue."

The Globe says further :

"If it be objected that continental free trade cannot be had in any terms having Canadians free to making more fiscal progress our answer is that the Globe has never favored commercial union in any terms."

There the Globe denies having been in favor of commercial union; yet I pointed out that it was in favor of commercial union at the time of the East Northumberland election, when, urged on by the hon. member for West Ontario, it called on the party to gather its forces together and show the country that the Reform party was not quite dead. Now, we have again, on 28th December, 1887, the Globe's opinion, as follows :—

"It is said that Canadians cannot be educated up to direct taxation. Bah! The very pessimists who affect to believe so much in public stupidity admit that a considerable revenue would have to be raised by direct taxation under commercial union. If the Americans reduce their tariff, as President Cleveland proposes, the revenue to accrue to Canada from the projected customs union would be quite inadequate to her needs, and her Government would have to raise by direct taxation an amount no easier to collect in that way than the total sum needed for governmental purposes. That is nothing against commercial union. Sir Richard Cartwright faced the prospect boldly and honestly. He pointed out that direct taxation must come of continental free trade. So much the better, say we. Direct taxation is a good thing of itself. The people can be convinced of this without any more trouble than is necessary to carry any great wholesome reform. What pusillanimity is that which shrinks from the advocacy because the good cause would be defeated 'if submitted at the polls to-morrow.' And what dishonesty that the very persons who allege 'direct taxation' to bar 'abolition of custom houses' should make nothing of 'direct taxation' as a bar to the scheme which they propose to favor!"

So you will see that they are in favor of direct taxation. The Globe is in favor of continental free trade as opposed to unrestricted reciprocity and also as opposed to commercial union, and then, as I have shown, the Globe is entirely in favor of direct taxation. What I find fault with also, and what the hon. gentleman has pointed out himself in moving the resolution, is that it must result in discrimination against the mother country. That, I think is a very important matter. So important was this question of discrimination considered in 1879, when the National Policy was under discussion in this Parliament, that the then hon. member for West Middlesex, the Hon. Mr. Ross, now Minister of Education in Ontario, made a very strong appeal against it, based on the fact that it would discriminate against England. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) also took the same ground, and gave instances to show, by selections from different portions of the tariff that it meant discrimination against the mother country. Now, these hon. gentlemen, however, are willing to abandon all that, they are willing to withdraw their former statements and are prepared to accept a resolution which certainly means discrimination against England. Although they hold that the Government were wrong in the policy they adopted in 1879, they are yet prepared to adopt a policy which, as regards discrimination, must have the same effect as they contended the Government policy of 1879 had. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was then very much annoyed at the idea of discriminating against England, and he animadverted a good deal on what he called the "lip loyalty" of this side of the House. At page 451 of the Hansard, he is reported to have said :

"But a few weeks have passed, and both sides of the House were uniting and expressing the gratitude to Her Majesty for having confided her child to our care. If that illustrious lady were to return to England, I am afraid she will be obliged to tell her Royal Mother that the practical outcome of all this lip loyalty was a policy directly antagonistic to the interests of Great Britain, a policy which whatever may be the intentions of the Finance Minister and his colleagues, seems on its practical results especially designed to injure British interest and hamper British trade."

But the hon. member for South Oxford, in speaking at Ingersoll, did not think discrimination against England any objection whatever to his new policy. He there said :

"Anyway, let us have no cant on this subject. We are not called on to be more British than the British themselves."

"Our total trade is not of much consequence to Great Britain, and the loss of a small fraction of it, if they do lose it, will do them very little harm."

Now, it has been said over and over again that the treaty of 1874 forced the Hon. George Brown to discriminate against England. In delivering his speech in Parliament upon that treaty, he pointed out that it would not discriminate against England in the following language :—

"I come now to the objections which have been urged against the treaty from such quarter as entitle them to a formal answer. The first of these is the allegation that the treaty discriminated against Great Britain in favor of the United States. Nothing could be more unfounded than this. It was perfectly understood from the opening of the negotiations that no article could be free from duty in regard to the United States that was not also free with regard to Great Britain, and nothing else was ever contemplated for a moment."

You see now that while these gentlemen in 1879 were opposed to discrimination against England, they are prepared to vote to-day for a resolution involving such discrimination, and the hon. gentleman who moved it does not care about that. The trade of England, he says, is very small, and England can look after herself. Another objection which, in my judgment, is a very strong one against this proposed arrangement, and which the hon. the mover of the resolution admitted to exist, is that it will inflict serious injury on our home manufactures. Even the hon. member for South Brant, on Friday evening, was obliged to admit that it would affect some manufactures, and he thought it might affect his own; but he was so patriotic as not to care about that, so long as the best interests of the country were served. This afternoon that hon. gentleman found considerable fault with me because I had telegraphed to several manufacturers with reference to what he said on Friday evening. If the hon. gentleman had no object in showing to the country that these gentlemen were in favor of the resolution, why did he mention their names? He found fault with me when I telegraphed to know whether what the hon. gentleman had said in their regard was true or not. I read a letter from Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, a gentleman whom I have never met, but who, having listened to the hon. member for South Brant in this House, for he had occupied a seat in the gallery during a part of the hon. gentleman's speech, voluntarily wrote me this letter in which he says that the statement of the hon. member for South Brant with reference to him was not correct.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did he say that in his letter.

Mr. RYKERT. You heard the letter read.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did he say that I made a statement that was not correct.

Mr. RYKERT. He said he understood you had said so, and it was not correct. I simply read the letter, and I am not going to be baffled and thrown off my balance by the hon. gentleman's interruptions, which are most unseemly. Since my observations, this afternoon, I caused a telegram to be sent to Mr. Rosamond, to which the hon. gentleman will probably not take any exception. Why did the hon. gentleman quote Mr. Rosamond and Mr. Gurney and all those manufacturers, if not to show that they were in favor of the resolution; if not to show that they were opposed to ordinary reciprocity, but were in favor of this resolution. This telegram was sent to Mr. Rosamond:

"When you stated, in 1878, before the Depression Committee that reciprocity would be of benefit to everybody, did you mean unrestricted reciprocity or a renewal of the old reciprocity treaty?"

The answer is:

"The old reciprocity treaty, certainly."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman quoted from the evidence given before that Depression Committee, to show that Mr. Rosamond was in favor of the resolution. Mr. Rosamond has replied that he was in favor of the old Reciprocity Treaty, but is not in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. The ground we take is that we are in favor of the old Reciprocity Treaty; we are in favor of —

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to call his attention to what the hon. member did say.

Mr. RYKERT. Let the hon. gentleman take his seat. He will be able to speak by-and-bye. We have had constant interruptions, and they have led to unpleasant remarks being made across the House which do not tend to improve the proper conduct of business in this House. Whenever the hon. gentleman is cornered, he gets nettled, but I propose to take my own line in this matter. I have heard what the hon. gentleman has stated, and I have asked the manufacturers if they were in favor of the resolution before the House, and they state distinctly that they are not. Now we come to other evidence which I propose to place before the House. At a manufacturers' meeting at Toronto on 10th February last, at which both Mr. Massey and Mr. Goldie were present, whose names have been mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite, the following resolution was passed unanimously:—

"Whereas strong and constant efforts are being made to bring about commercial union between Canada and the United States; and

"Whereas the inevitable result of such a move would be the sundering of the political ties which bind us to the mother country, and annex us to the United States;

"Be it therefore resolved: That the Canadian Manufacturing Association is entirely opposed to commercial union with the United States and to any other political proposition that might imperil our existing relations with Great Britain, or prejudice the political status of the Dominion or the welfare of the Canadian manufacturing industries."

I assume that that resolution, passed by a representative body, will have more weight than a dozen speeches, and distorted speeches at that, of the hon. gentleman. I pointed out, this afternoon, that a leading member in his own city (Mr. Osborne) had written to the Empire as to his views on the subject, and Boards all over the Dominion have expressed their opinions in the same way. We have also the evidence of many manufacturers to the same effect. Mr. John Hallam, of Toronto, who is, I believe, a celebrated Reformer of that city, says:

"I am in favor of commercial union in the fullest acceptance of the term, providing that England and Canada could have free trade on a reasonable revenue tariff with the United States. I am not in favor of commercial union between Canada and the United States as against England and the British colonies throughout the world.

"I believe that we can buy everything we need in England and the British colonies at lower prices and of better quality than we can in the United States, with the exception of a very few special articles.

"Commercial union between Canada and the United States to the exclusion of Great Britain would not, in my opinion, be of general benefit to the whole of Canada. I think the Maritime Provinces are so situated geographically as that they would be benefited by commercial union. The same, in my opinion, will apply to Manitoba.

Mr. RYKERT.

"For these and other reasons I am opposed to the scheme of commercial union as advocated by Goldwin Smith and Erastus Wiman. I want more light on the subject.

"However much Canada might favor commercial union or a more liberal trade policy with the United States, I am of opinion that the United States will not grant it, and I think it extremely foolish for us to agitate such a question until we are reasonably sure that such a policy would be entertained by the Government of that country."

So you see that these gentlemen are opposed to commercial union and in favor of ordinary reciprocity. Then we have also Mr. John Dobson, who gives the same opinion. He says:

"I am decidedly opposed to commercial union. Canada is yet a young manufacturing country, hence the principle to preserve a close balance between consumers and producers at home has not been applicable hitherto.

"A nation should encourage trade with one not producing the same products as itself. Canada and the United States have similar products.

"Great Britain has different; therefore Canada should encourage trade with the latter.

"Canadian manufacturers would be for a time undersold by the longer established firms in the United States and would be finally forced to shut down. Then prices would be increased to the loss of Canadian farmers.

"It would undoubtedly mean annexation, and both countries are safer and better apart. Britain has been the true friend of Canada in sunshine and in shadow. It would be base ingratitude to grant favors to a stranger that would be denied a friend.

"I am, therefore, opposed to commercial union, which is only annexation in disguise."

As I pointed out, if you have this commercial union, every retail store would be filled with goods from the United States. I have also a very high authority on this subject—at least I know he thinks himself a high authority—I refer to the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar)—and he points out this difficulty in a letter to Mr. Wiman, that it is going to affect the manufactures and disarrange the trade of this country for a long time to come. He says:

"I wish now to refer to an objection, which is raised in Canada, against a proposal to place manufactured goods, as well as natural products, upon the free lists of the two countries. It is contended, with much force, that the early, sudden and complete removal of these duties would have a serious effect upon the trade of the country. It is true that stocks in the hands of importers, upon which duties had been paid, would be ruinously depreciated by suddenly throwing open the door to the admission of the same goods, free. The stocks and raw material of manufacturers, upon which duties have been paid, would also depreciate, and much of their plant might be useless until adapted to the new requirements of their business. The striking off so many customs duties at a blow would also reduce the Canadian revenue to an extent that could not be borne by our finances at the moment, for time would be required to re-arrange the public income and expenditure. For all these reasons it must be conceded that extensive remissions of duties upon manufactured goods should not be made suddenly, but only after ample notice; and, even when the reduction begins, it must be gradual. In this way alone would importers have an opportunity to work off their old stocks, and to regulate their new importations to suit the new openings for trade."

So high an authority as the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is not in favor of this resolution being adopted by the country at the present time.

Mr. EDGAR. I am, certainly, that letter is in favor of it.

Mr. RYKERT. The first letter says that it is impracticable.

Mr. EDGAR. Will not my hon. friend finish reading the letter which he read a part of?

Mr. RYKERT. I have read all his letters, though I have not read them all here.

Mr. EDGAR. But you have not finished reading that letter.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not propose to place that kind of light literature on the pages of Hansard at this time. I do not think that would be conducive to the welfare of the country.

Mr. EDGAR. That is exceedingly fair.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman shows that it is impossible to carry out this scheme, that it will seriously affect our manufacturers and will disarrange our trade. That is why I point it out. It is going also, in my judgment, to be very injurious to the farmers, and I will support my judgment by reading an article from the Globe on that point, and particularly in reference to the North-West farmers. I know, hon. gentlemen opposite, like to hear that authority quoted, but I must confess that I have not much confidence in my witness on general questions, though occasionally it tells the truth. It says:

"Now the selling price of North-West wheat would not be appreciably increased by unrestricted reciprocity. It will fetch almost as much sent over the Canadian Pacific Railway to England as sent to Minneapolis. To increase the profits of its growers they require cheap supplies. But unrestricted reciprocity would not greatly reduce anything except agricultural implements. Woollens, for instance, are dearer now in Dakota than in Manitoba. On the whole, the Manitoba farmers' supplies, barring machines and tools, are as cheap as in Dakota. Under free trade with the world the Manitoba farmer would obtain untaxed American implements and untaxed British goods as well. He would gain nearly all that unrestricted reciprocity can give him."

So, as far as the farmer is concerned, unrestricted reciprocity would not be of much benefit to him, and Mr. Wiman pointed out a few days ago, when speaking in Winnipeg, that it might even hurt the Manitoba farmers. No doubt, therefore, the farmers would be hurt by it to a considerable extent. The question was raised a few nights ago by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) as to who pays the duty, and he then stated that his opinion was that the exporter of barley from this country paid the duty. His language was:

"Take the case of barley. As has been stated to-night already, we exported last year 9,437,717 bushels, the value of which was $5,245,000; but I ask hon. gentlemen, did the farmers get that 5,250,000? They did not, because they had to pay in duty, $943,000."

Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman were present, I would like to refer him to a high authority on that question. I will give him the answer from one of his own leaders, a gentleman whose opinion, no doubt, he will take, that is the hon. member for Bothwell. He seems to have solved that question as to who pays the duty. He has expressed a decided opinion that so far as barley is concerned, the exporter does not pay the duty but the consumer does. I was surprised at the hon. gentleman making those remarks in presence of the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member for Bothwell some time ago, in addressing the electors in the campaign, made a speech which is reported in a campaign document, called "Reform Government in the Dominion." The hon. member for Bothwell was then Minister of the Interior, and he, in a speech he then made, answered the question of the hon. member for North Victoria,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You don't agree with that.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not agree with much the hon. gentleman says, but I do not suppose the hon. gentleman will wilfully mistake what the facts are. I give the answer for the benefit of the hon. member for North Victoria. This is what the hon. member for Bothwell said relating to barley:

"He says in regard to the taxes put on Canadian barley, that the Canadian farmer undergoes that much loss, and so pays a large amount of money into the treasury of the United States. If that be true, why all this row about the imposition of one cent on the pound of tea? Why, according to the doctor, that comes out of the Chinaman. My view is the consumer pays it. But if the doctor is right, the Chinaman pays it. If the doctor is right, the tax on broadcloth is paid by the English manufacturer, and that on cottons by the manufacturer of New England. Why then this complaint of the burdens of taxation. We are, according to Dr. Orton's views, simply taxing the foreigners to trade with us. Our opponents are wrong upon one point or the other. Well, if we pay the tax that is imposed upon the produce of other countries, we certainly do not pay the tax upon the product of Canada going into the United States."

He goes on further to say, page 96:

"It is said the Americans have been injuring us by sending into Canada wheat, flour and Indian corn, and I wish to call attention to this question. Before doing so, perhaps I had better give you some evidence of the fact that duties imposed by the American Government on the various products of the agriculturists of Canada have in no wise affected the prices of various articles which have been sent into the American market from Canada."

And he goes on to give the prices of the various farm products for the twenty-two years from 1854 to 1876; and then he adds:

"I might go over the prices of barley, rye and other cereals with much the same result, thus establishing the uncontrovertible fact that the duties imposed by the American Congress upon the produce of Canada do not fall upon the people of Canada, but are paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States."

Now, Sir, that is the answer I give to the hon. member. The hon. member seemed to find considerable fault when I asked him a question the other night. Now I give him the answer from one of his own leaders. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored, in these observations, to show that the scheme is an impracticable one. I have shown from their own mouths that the scheme is surrounded by great difficulties that it would be utterly impossible to get rid of, if we adopted the resolution of the hon. gentleman. In my opinion it is impracticable to discuss this proposed treaty at the present time, because a discussion is going on the other side of the line in reference to a proposed change of tariff. Under any circumstances I feel it would be unwise; and I do not think the Americans will concede that treaty at the present time. I am not in favor of humiliating Canada at the foot of the United States. I am in favor, as I said a few minutes ago, of remaining as we are. We have made material progress and great advancement during the past 15 or 20 years. Unmistakable evidence surrounds us that Canada has prospered in a greater degree than almost any other country in the world. I have shown by statistics that Ontario and Quebec have increased in a greater ratio than the neighboring States of New York and Ohio, notwithstanding that they had the large cities of New York, Buffalo, Cleveland and Cincinnati to contribute to their prosperity. I have shown that the progress of the Maritime Provinces has been greater than that of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York and Ohio. I have shown further that the ratio of increase, even in Prince Edward Island, of which hon. gentlemen complain so bitterly, is greater than that of New York State—15.47 as against 15.40. I say that having confidence in the future of my country, I am not prepared to advocate any scheme which will have the effect of humiliating us, as is proposed by this resolution. Reciprocity may be very well in natural products, but the time has not come when we should ask the Americans to give us reciprocity upon any other terms than those we have already offered. They have shown they were not favorable to the Treaty of 1874, which was a liberal and a wide treaty, and was as far as our party is prepared to go, and yet that proposition was treated with disdain. So long as I have been in Parliament I have not been in favor of any treaty that would place us in a humiliating position. So long as we continue our present rate of progress, I am not disposed to alter our system. I believe that Canada is destined, in the future as she has done in the past, to make rapid and gigantic strides. We have within ourselves all the elements of greatness, we have everything to make a great country; we ought to take advantage of our position, and if we do so I believe that we will make Canada one of the best countries in the world.

Mr. TAYLOR. Representing, as I do, one of the best and one of the wealthiest agricultural constituencies in the Province of Ontario, I feel it my duty, both to myself and my constituents, not to allow this motion to be put without giving a few reasons why I think it would be injurious to the best interests of this country to adopt the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). My first objection to the resolution is that it has been moved purely in the interest of the Reform party in this country. It is a well known fact that that party has had no policy for sometime past. As a proof of that I will read from one of the organs of that party, and I am sure that it will be accepted as an authority, for it is the only religious daily published in Canada. Here is what the Montreal Witness says of that party:

"The Liberal party has no policy on any subject, for the simple reason that it accepts as members all who oppose the Conservative Government of the day, whether they oppose it from principle or merely from personal prejudice. Thus there are protectionists and free traders, monopolists and anti-monopolists, railway promoters and anti-railway promoters, prohibitionists and anti-prohibitionists, men of all stripes in its ranks, and it, therefore, cannot formulate a policy on any subject. What is the party for anyway? 'The business of the Opposition is to oppose,' said Lord Randolph Churchill, but the Canadian Opposition does not even fulfil that conservative function effectively."

That is what the Montreal Witness says of that Reform party. It is true that before they met here during the present session, they were without a policy. One of the members of the Opposition an honest farmer, who thought commercial union was the platform of the Reform party, put a notice on the paper declaring in favor of commercial union. Then a hurried caucus was called, and the party formulated the policy laid down in the resolution now before the House. But I oppose the resolution for other considerations than mere party. I believe that if it were adopted and carried into effect it would prove disastrous to the agriculturists, to the manufacturers, to the laboring classes as well as the mercantile interests of the country. I say it would prove injurious to the farmers, from the fact that we here produce similar articles of produce to those produced in larger quantities in the United States, and as the produce of the United States comes into direct competition with the produce of the farmers of this country, and as their seasons are much earlier than ours, the effect is that they are able to export produce to this country to take the place of Canadian produce, and consequently a certain amount of our produce has to be exported. An hon. member speaking the other night made reference to the fact that our exports under the National Policy were less than previous to the adoption of the National Policy. He was answered by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House that as our manufactures had increased there was more labor employed in the country and more of our produce was consumed here. But I will give a better reason than that. I take the imports of grain from the United States in 1877 and compare them with the returns for 1887, on grain entered from home consumption, as the statistics appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns. The following is the result:—

GRAIN Imported from the United States and entered for Home Consumption:—

What do these statistics mean? They simply mean that those grains, ripening sooner than the Dominion product, were forced into this market and displaced $11,000,000 worth of the produce of Canada, which had to be exported to make room for the American product. Those are the true facts of the case, and it would continue if we had the commercial union to-morrow. The same may be said of fruit, vegetables, and all other farm products. I take the returns for apples, and I find the following:—

I say, therefore, that in regard to those items, our trade would suffer very materially, to say nothing about our cattle trade. Had we unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, our cattle would be scheduled the same as American cattle on entering the United Kingdom. What would that mean? It would mean a loss of from $1 to $6 on every animal exported from this country to the British market. A similar result would follow in regard to our dairy industry. We saw by the newspapers a few days ago that the Colonial Office had given instructions to enquire if Canadian cheese was adulterated by the products of animal fat. Why was this done? Simply because the Americans wanted to put their bogus cheese on the English market as Canadian cheese. We have noticed that large quantities of American cheese are sent to Montreal over the Grand Trunk railway, and there shipped to the English market. A similar result would also follow in regard to our butter industry. American bogus butter is at present shut out by legislation, yet if unrestricted reciprocity were brought into force that bogus butter would come in here and inflict great injury on our dairy industry, as was the case before that legislation was enacted. My hon. friend the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) read the other day the statement of one of the presidents of the Agricultural Institute of New York, stating that the value of their land had depreciated 25 per cent. during the last ten years owing to the fact of bogus butter being allowed to be made in the United States; yet hon. gentlemen opposite who take the farmers to their breasts and desire to do everything beneficial to them want to have the same state of things brought about that was in existence a couple of years before the legislation prohibiting the importation into Canada of bogus butter was passed. We have also requests made for legislation to protect the farmers against bogus lard, and I fancy before this Session closes legislation similar to that respecting butter will be passed. So much for the farmers of the country. Then I referred to the fact that I believed the adoption of the resolution would injure our manufacturers. I know this that there is hardly any manufacture in the United States without a combination of all the manufacturers engaged in the same line of industry. If we had unrestricted reciprocity our manufacturers would either have to join the combination or they would be crushed out; if they joined the combination they would simply have the trade they have now worked up to a certain extent, but the result would be that nine out of ten of them would be killed. I also realise the fact that our laboring classes would be injured. I believe so from this fact, that there are nearly as many men in the prisons of the United States engaged in manufacturing goods as there are free laborers in Canada, and if we had unrestricted reciprocity the free labor of Canada would come into direct competition with the prison-made goods of the United States. I need say but very little to show the effect it would have on the merchants of the country. I have already said enough to convince the House and the country that with unrestricted reciprocity our farmers, manufacturers and workmen would suffer, and these all suffering our merchants would also suffer likewise. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) said the other night that the National Policy had done little or nothing to develop our industrial trade. When I was home on Saturday I was in one of our manufacturing concerns in Gananoque, when the manager handed to me a letter, which, he said, contained a pretty decent order. It was dated Summerside, P.E.I.; perhaps the hon. member for Queen's knows where that is. West and McLeod, P.E.I., perhaps he knows those gentlemen. The order was for about $20,000. It was not for wheat or pork or beans or something of that sort to feed the starving farmers. That $20,000 was for luxuries, it was for top buggies to drive those poor farmers around the country in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Too poor to walk.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, too poor to walk.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the name of the firm?

Mr. TAYLOR. West & McLeod, of Summerside, P.E.I. You know them probably. He also showed me another order from Fredericton signed by a man named Johnson, for $30,000 or $40,000 for similar articles. Here now we have $60,000 of an order to a Canadian manufacturer and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman where those orders would have gone only for the National Policy? Would they not have been transferred to Boston and would not the manufacturers and mechanics of Boston have the pleasure and profit of making those goods while the American farmers would have had the pleasure of feeding them in place of the farmers of my own county selling their produce to Canadian mechanics and manufacturers. For these reasons I think the National Policy has developed an inter-provincial trade. Those orders were from gentlemen living down in the Maritime Provinces, and they represent the benefits to one factory in Ontario. But the same thing is being repeated all over the Dominion. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was making that blue ruin speech of his which we have often heard in this House before and was telling us that we lost one out of every four of our native-born population and one out of every three of our emigrants, there was a remark made by the hon. gentleman who sits beside, which did not get into the Hansard or into the newspapers, but which is too good to lose, and I think I will repeat it. When the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was dwelling on the great exodus my friend remarked: "My goodness, it makes one feel lonely to think we are losing our friends at that rate." I do not blame the hon. member for making the remark. If the exodus was going on at the rate it was pictured we would feel very lonely indeed, because we would be left alone all by ourselves. The hon. gentlemen opposite have told us in their speeches that the farmers of this country are being ruined by this National Policy, that they are being taxed to death, and the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), stated that the annual tax on the average family was $35 a year. I heard that figure mentioned before from a gentleman in my county, and I fancy they both must have got their information from the same source. Those speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite are made, I believe, for a purpose, and that purpose is to try to prejudice the farmer, and to raise a feeling of discontentment among the farmers of this country, and try to make them believe that the manufacturers and merchants are ruining them and that they are being taxed to death to support the manufacturers principally. I have made the statement before and I make it here in my place again, that it is possible for a farmer, a working man or for a gentleman, and many of them do live in this country and enjoy all the necessities and even some of the luxuries of life; without contributing one dollar a year to the taxes of this Dominion. I made that statement and an intelligent, respectable, well to do Grit farmer in my county contradicted me, and he said: "My taxes amounted to $35 last year." I asked him who he paid that to and who collected it? He said: "The tax collector collected $33." I said: "Where did the tax collector put it, where did it go?" and I told him I would resign my seat in Parliament if he would prove that one cent of the $36 that tax collector got from him found its way into the Dominion treasury. I said that was spent by your own council that you elected in the spring, it went for maintaining bridges and roads and paying the school rate except what went to the county council, and was probably expended in maintaining the court house, the jail and the registry office, and your reeve looks after that. Probably not one cent of it went to the Government." He said: "The Globe says we pay $35 a year and I believe it. It says we must pay it on everything we eat and wear," and I replied: "the Globe does not tell the truth and I will prove that to you." I said: "Here is a statement of the Globe made for the benefit of you farmers, and we will work it out and see how far it is true. The Globe says the gross debt is $281,000,000 and the net debt $220,000,000, and then it goes on to tell about how much that represents for every man, woman and child. It says the debt has increased $75 a minute under Tory rule, and the annual interest $21 a minute. Now let us take the debt at what the Globe says, $220,000,000. The average interest is three and a-half per cent. and that represents $7,700,000. Now what will the interest be at $21 a minute? There sixty minutes in the hour and twenty-four hours in the day and 365 days in the year and multiplying those figures together we find that it would amount to eleven millions some hundred thousand dollars, that is just about $4,000,000 of a mistake, which is not very much much for the Globe after all. Now let us take the other calculation of $75 a minute as the gross debt. There are sixty minutes in the hour; let us multiply 75 by 60, there are 24 hours in the day multiply that result by 24, and there are 365 days in the year and we multiply that again by 365. We have had Tory rule for fifteen years, and we say started out at Confederation without a dollar of debt, and the Mackenzie Administration did not increase the debt; let us multiply our former result by 15 (the number of years of Tory rule out of the twenty years since Confederation) and this would make our debt $591,000,000 if the Globe's calculation was right. That is only a little over $300,000,000 of a false statement for the Globe."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is nothing of a mistake.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is about on a par with the mistakes they make on the other side of the House. I told the farmer: "There are the figures the Globe has given to you, and it is trying to make you believe that you pay $35 a year taxes." He said: "But we pay it on what we eat." I said: "Well, I will go to your house, and I will sit down at the table while you are eating your dinner and we will see what you pay. Do not you raise on your farm every bit of meat and flour, and butter and eggs that goes on your table. Is there any tax on them?" He could not say that there was. I said: "Unless you drink whiskey or smoke cigars, which you are better off without, you do not contribute anything to the taxes of the country, except a few cents on the pepper and spices, and other little items that go to make up a tasty dish of hash. There is nothing else you pay on among the necessities of life. When the Mackenzie Administration were in power they taxed your tea. There is no tax on your tea now." I had a suit of wool cloth on at the time, and I told the farmer if it was good enough for me it was good enough for him. I pointed out: "You grow the wool yourself, you take it down to your own mill and it is made there, and you pay no tax. It is the same way with your cotton. The raw material comes in free. It is made here, and you as a farmer feed the hands that make it, so you see there is no duty on your cotton, for if you wish to go and buy in the United States and bring it here then you pay the duty. I said to him: "I will give you a practical illustration of who pays the duty." Here are two men keeping house; each keeps a cow. They each want to lay in a couple of barrels of flour for their family during winter. They say instead of buying the flour we will go out and buy the wheat. One man goes out and buys ten bushels of wheat at 80 cents a bushel. He says to the miller: "How much a bushel will you charge me for grinding it, giving me the offal required for my cow." This man gets his wheat ground and has his flour and the offal for his cow at $9. The other farmer does not believe in befriending the Canadian farmer or miller, and he says he will go to the American farmer and buy 10 bushels of wheat for 80 cents a bushel. He takes it to the American miller and gets it ground, with the result that suppose he gets it at the same price of $9 as the Canadian farmer; but then when he tries to bring it across the line, the custom house officer says he has to pay $1 duty on his two barrels of flour. This raises the price to $10, because the man had to pay the duty, which he would not have to pay if it were manufactured in Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. And he has to pay duty on the offal besides.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was just giving this as an illustration. That man paid the duty, and so does every man who brings anything across the line—the consumer pays the duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we pay the duty on what goes out, and we also pay it on what comes in. The hon. member for South Oxford stated that we produce many articles in Canada that are not produced in the United States, and vice versa. I dispute that statement. I ask the hon. gentleman to name an article, the produce of the farm or the factory, that is made in Canada and that is not made in the United States. On the other hand, there are a large number of articles made or grown there that are not made or grown in Canada. Now, I purpose dealing for a few moments with an article that I am very conversant with, that is barley, and I will try to satisfy my hon. friends opposite as to who pays the duty on barley. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) made the statement, the other night, that the farmers pay the duty, and he gave the right hon. leader of the Government as his authority for the statement, and asked me if I agreed with him. He quoted from a newspaper report of the right hon. gentleman's speech, and I read his quotation in Hansard, which was a misquotation, for I have read the speech of the right hon. gentleman on two or three occasions. That speech was made previous to the National Policy in 1878. At that time American grains were allowed to come into Canada free, while our grains going into the United States had to pay a duty. The right hon. gentleman, in advocating a policy of protection, described a farm on the boundary line of Maine, where the line is an imaginary one, and he said a farmer having a farm on each side of the line grows barley, and he had hundred bushels on one side and a hundred bushels on the other side. He takes his American barley to the American buyer, and sells it for $1 a bushel and gets $100. He also takes his Canadian barley over and has to pay 15 cents a bushel, and there sells it for $1 a bushel, and therefore he has only $85 for his Canadian barley. That statement is correct, and if the farmer did that, he paid the duty on the 100 bushels. But I want hon. gentlemen to understand that when he took his Canadian barley across the line it lost its identity, and simply sold at the price State barley was worth. But if he had taken that barley to the Canadian buyer on this side of the line, he would have sold it for $1 a bushel as well as in the

Mr. TAYLOR.

United States, and the buyer would have taken it to the States and paid the duty upon it himself, from the fact that Canadian barley in the United States was quoted at 15 cents a bushel more than it was in Canada. I have been buying barley for twenty-five years on the shore of the River St. Lawrence, and right opposite me on the American shore is an American buyer, and during those twenty-five years that buyer has not paid for American barley one cent more than I have paid for Canadian barley on this side. I will show you how the Canadian barley loses its identity when it crosses the line. Previous to the adoption of the National Policy American barley came into Canada free of duty. I was buying on the Canadian shore, and American farmers used to put barley on their boats and bring it to me. I paid them for it in Canada money; as Canada money was worth a premium at that time, it was an inducement to the American farmers to bring their barley to this side. No man will tell me that barley grown here is better than barley grown six or ten miles further south. No maltster can tell the difference between Ontario barley and that grown in the State of New York; but the maltsters control the price and they buy their barley at an export price. They want all the bright barley grown in the United States, and rather than let ours be exported to England, they pay the duty on ours. The barley that I bought from American farmers previous to the National Policy was consigned by me to commission merchants at Oswego or New York, and was bought by the American maltsters at 15 cents a bushel higher than the American barley, and I made profit on it. Will hon. gentlemen opposite tell me who paid the duty on that barley? Here are the quotations of barley in the Mail newspaper of 8th November, 1881, when the duty on our barley going into the United States was 15 cents a bushel. No. 1 bright Canada, $1.15; Rhode Island State, $1.00, just 15 cents difference between American bright No. 1 and Canada No. 1, the amount of the duty. What happened? The maltsters of the United States, knowing that they paid the duty, went to Washington in 1883, where it is reported they spent $150,000 in lobbying the Government to get the duty on barley reduced. They did get it reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents a bushel. Did the Canadian farmer get the benefit of that reduction in the duty? If he did not, would he get the benefit of the removal of the entire 10 cents? Here are the quotations from the same paper just after the reduction in the duty: Canada No. 1, 75 cents; choice State, 65 cents, just 10 cents difference, the exact amount of the duty. Now, who paid the duty? If the maltsters went down to Washington and got the duty lowered from 15 cents to 10 cents, did they do it in the interest of the Canadian farmers, or in their own interest? They simply changed the price, and ever since the reduction of the duty to 10 cents, the difference between the price of Canadian barley and State barley is just 10 cents a bushel. If we had unrestricted reciprocity, our barley would simply lose its identity. The maltsters would buy the crop of Canada as they do the crop of the United States to-day. They would buy on an export basis, and pay for it just what it is worth to send to England. That is the way they buy their own crop, and if we had unrestricted reciprocity, they would simply do the same with ours, so that if we could not make any more money out of it by exporting it than by selling it to them, we would sell it to them. The Americans have three quotations for barley to-day: The Western, State, and Canadian. Had we unrestricted reciprocity, there would simply be two lines, the western and eastern barley. Now these are the facts with regard to barley; and there is no gentleman in this House or out of it who can prove otherwise than that the maltsters of the United States pay the duty on Canadian barley; and after an experience of 25 years in shipping barley to the United States market, and on buying barley on the American side, especially State barley, I am satisfied that had we unrestricted reciprocity the farmers of Canada would not get one cent more for their barley than they do to-day, and they would suffer very materially in having the surplus produce of the United States, which ripens earlier than ours, displace so much of their produce. Our farmers would also have to compete with the bogus butter, bogus lard, bogus cheese of the Americans, and would lose by having their cattle scheduled; nine out of ten of our manufactories will be closed, and our laboring classes would be reduced to poverty. I have no hesitation in saying that in the interests of my county, I will vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford and support the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is with some feelings of diffidence that I arise to address the House on this very important question. We have had a very long and undoubtedly important debate on the resolution before the House. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has treated us to-day to a very long speech, and proved himself once more to be the champion reader of quotations in this House. Backed by his scrap book, which always supplies him the necessary fuel, he is enabled on every occasion of this kind to keep on speaking for hours; and I would suggest to the Government that, in the interests of economising our valuable time, it would be a prudent act on their part to place a small sum in the Supplementary Estimates with the view of buying out that scrap book and committing it to the flames. If they would do so, they would effect a considerable saving to the country, and do an act which would be a decided advantage to this House. The hon. gentleman's speech reminds me of the verse in the Good Book with regard to the impure fountain which casts forth fire and dirt, a good deal of which we have had this afternoon and to-night from the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman treated us to a very long speech before recess, and after dinner he evidently turned over his manuscript and went back over the same ground again. Some of his quotations he gave us as often as four times, showing himself to be very anxious to talk for a considerable time, and, no doubt, he served a useful purpose to the Government in that respect. We have had a perfect showerbath of quotations from the hon. gentleman. I do not know that I can remember an occasion in which the hon. gentleman, though he is always liberal in that respect, gave us such a liberal supply of extracts as he did this afternoon. In many of his quotations he was not correct. I had the honor, on a previous occasion, of following the hon. gentleman in a speech he delivered some years ago, and I found out in one case, when I came to examine the source of a quotation which he gave, that he had given the quotation in so garbled a manner as to convey a meaning directly the opposite of its intent; and when I gave the quotation over again, with the portions he had left out, it proved to be the very opposite in meaning to what the hon. gentleman said it was. As regards the telegrams which the hon. gentleman read to us to-day, it is quite clear he sent telegrams of a peculiar kind so as to obtain answers that would suit the occasion and his own purpose. The best evidence of this is that he refused to read the telegrams that he sent, although challenged to do so. He would give the answers but would not give the messages he had sent. That is the hon. gentleman's forte. We have heard some rumours that the hon. gentleman, in this lengthy speech, has been making his depart; we have heard rumours that he is to be sent to the Upper Chamber; and in this connection, I may say that an hon. gentleman whose decease we all regret, who once had a seat in this House and afterwards was sent to the Senate, in a discussion on some important question, made a speech, which an hon. gentleman on this side characterised as being a diarrhoea of words with a constipation of ideas. I do not think the Government could cast the mantle of the deceased gentleman upon a more appropriate member of this House than the hon. member for Lincoln. Now, we have heard a great deal said about the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite are evidently afraid that their pet policy is in danger, and are doing everything they possibly can to prevent the farmers from getting the impression that the National Policy is not an advantage to them. They evidently fear that if the farmers should wake up and discover the true secret of the National Policy, in operating against their interests and in favor of the interests of the manufacturers, they would record their votes against this policy. They also evidently dread that our fishermen and all our laboring classes will record their votes in opposition to the National Policy. I admit that the Government have been exceedingly fortunate in misleading and blinding the eyes of the farming community, the laboring classes, the lumbermen, and the fishermen during the last three elections. In the first place, the right hon. the First Minister said that what he intended was merely a readjustment. He did not intend, he said, to increase the burdens of the people. When the second contest was fought, in 1882, he was not willing to appeal to the country on the same terms as in 1878, because he was a little scared that the farmers might possibly see the hollowness of the National Policy from their standpoint; so before appealing to the people, he made up his mind that it would be prudent to readjust and gerrymander the constituencies and he went to work. He felt afraid that when the question came to be discussed before the people, a sufficient percentage in each constituency would become convinced of the hollowness of the National Policy from their standpoint to defeat his policy. In 1887, again we had the Franchise Act. We know the grounds upon which that election was carried, we know perfectly well that the Riel question was made to do duty as far as it possibly could, and in the next place we know that grants to railways in all directions, promises of post offices, promises of piers, promises to make public improvements in all parts of this Dominion, were held out in order to secure the people's votes for the Government on that occasion. And they were undoubtedly successful. These inducements, with the money which was spent and the promises of improvements which were made, carried them into power for the third time. The hon. gentleman who has addressed the House stated the advantages that the National Policy had produced to the people of this country, and went on to show something in connection with the statements which Mr. Blake made in his Malvern speech in regard to the manufacturers. He did not quote Mr. Blake any more correctly in that case than he did in others, and I will come to that part later on; but the National Policy of 1879 is not the National Policy of the present time. The First Minister declared that it would be a readjustment, but, in place of that, they have added to the taxation until now it is very much higher on every article that is imported which we manufacture here than it was at that time. We have never objected to grant certain protection to our manufacturing institutions. We have always held that a revenue tariff should be the basis of taxation, and that permitting our manufacturers to bring in the raw material for purposes of their manufacture, within the limits of that revenue tariff, was all that they could reasonably expect. But hon. gentlemen departed from that principle and adopted a protective tariff, and they have left themselves entirely in the hands of the manufacturers. The result is that from year to year the manufacturers come to the Government, imploring them to grant them increases from time to time in the duties, and to-day we have the unfortunate exhibition of rings being formed for the purposes of raising prices on articles that are manufactured in the country, and are manufactured, by a few people. To-day we have a committee of this House appointed to investigate these matters, and the evidence is that these people have got more advantages than were necessary for them, and it is clear that, if the Government had adhered to a revenue tariff instead of adopting a protective tariff, that would not have occurred, because they could have replied to the applications made to them, that the necessities of the Dominion Treasury did not require that they should increase the taxation. The result would have been that there would not have been the opportunity to form these rings. In 1877, Mr. McCarthy found a great deal of fault with the Government of that day for having increased the expenditure. At that time it ran up to something like twenty-three millions and a half, and he introduced a resolution condemning the Government for going beyond twenty-two millions. He declared that the Government should not exceed that amount. We find that, although on that occasion hon. gentlemen were anxious to keep down expenditure, they have departed from that view, and now we are expending something like thirty-nine millions annually. There is another question that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) referred to, and that was the question of importing wheat and other products from the United States. He gave some quotations in regard to imports which he said were entered for home consumption in 1878. Well, since that time, when they import, they do not enter for home consumption. There is a privilege under the National Policy by which, if a miller wants to import a certain quantity of wheat for the purpose of manufacturing, if in six months he manufactures a certain amount of flour and ships it out of the country, he is allowed to draw back the amount of duty he would pay on his importation. The result is that, when they do import, they import for the purpose of exportation, and get their wheat in free of duty. They import corn and they import wheat. The last hon. gentleman who spoke said that, if we had the system in force which we had in 1877, the crops of the United States, coming in so much earlier than ours in Canada, would result in our being able to bring in wheat and oats and corn at an earlier period than they become ripe in this country, and that, in that way, it would interfere with the Canadian farmer. Well, they have all these powers under the National Policy. They import wheat to grind into flour, and they can ship it out or turn it into the Canadian market and sell it, and, if within six months they can get Canadian wheat and grind it into flour and ship it out, they can draw back the duty paid on the imported wheat. It is the same in regard to corn. The distiller brings in corn and manufactures it into whiskey and he exports that whiskey, and he is allowed a rebate on the amount he paid for the importation. That is the case of the distiller and the miller. It is the same in regard to the oatmeal miller. If he wants to import American oats before the Canadian oats are ripe, he can bring them in and sell the oatmeal on the Canadian market, and, if within six months he can get Canadian oats and manufacture them and send the oatmeal out in a sufficient quantity to meet the quantity of American oats that he imported, he can draw back his duty? Can a farmer do that? He cannot. Take a farmer who has a large amount of feeding. Can he go to the United States, and buy corn when it is cheap, and feed his cattle, and ship the cattle to England, and get a rebate for what he paid for the corn? Not a bit of it. The man who manufactures the corn into whiskey and sends the whiskey across the Atlantic can get a rebate on what he pays for the corn, but the farmer who imports the corn and turns it into beef cannot get any rebate. The whiskey man gets his rebate, but the farmer gets no rebate. It is said that reciprocity would destroy our manufactures. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) dwelt upon that question, that reciprocity would destroy our manufacturing institutions, and would not benefit the farmer. It is a most amusing thing that, at all the meetings that have been held of manufacturers throughout the country, and particularly the one in Toronto, they declared that, after carefully and deliberately considering the question with regard to commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, they believed it would be a great injury to the manufacturers and would not benefit the farmer. It is a wonder that they give so much attention to the farmer. Why do they not allow the farmer to decide the matter for himself? Why do they not allow the Farmers' Institutes to decide the matter? No, the manufacturers, in their wisdom and sagacity, feel that, unless they take charge of the poor unfortunate farmer, he would be left at sea and would not amount to anything. The manufacturers have not had a single meeting at which they have not passed resolutions declaring that it would be an injury to the farmer as well as to themselves if we had commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Now, the hon. gentleman was boasting to-night with regard to his majority. He was telling us that he had 500 majority. Permit me to say that I was rather surprised at the hon. member taking such a bold and determined stand in opposition to unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. If there is any man in the House that should be prepared to endorse closer commercial relations with the United States, that man is the hon. member for Lincoln. Why, Sir, it is said that if we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, they are such sharp, cute fellows that we could not hold our own. Now, there is one hon. member who is in this House, and we have evidence that he was able to hold his own, and that was the hon. member for Lincoln. That hon. member possessed a timber limit some time ago, he sold that timber limit to an American, and he made a nice sum of money out of it, and yet he made that money when we did not have commercial union. Now, if we had commercial union, those who hold timber limits—and I am sure some of his friends, if we could consult the records, are yet possessors of timber limits, they could get better prices for their timber limits than he got.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh no, they could not get more.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that he got about all he wanted out of the Americans, and he does not want any more connection with them. I think that explains why the gentleman who bought the timber limit is opposed to commercial union. I dare say that if any person went to him and asked him "Mr. Sands, are you disposed to favor commercial union with Canada?" He would say "No, I am not." "Why are you not?" "Because I had one transaction with those fellows over there, and they are the worst lot I ever met, and I don't want anything more to do with them." I have no doubt that would be his reply with regard to commercial union. The hon. gentleman says that he had 500 of a majority in Lincoln this last election. Well, I question every much, if the hon. gentleman had not sold his timber limits, whether he would have had that majority; I think that largely explains the fact; and I dare say that if there had not been a technicality in the court proceedings, we would have the best evidence that such was the fact, evidence that would show that he got out of that position just the same as he has crawled out of a great many other difficulties he has been in during his Parliamentary life. Now, he went into a comparison of the farmers in the United States and in Canada. He pointed out some cases, and he exhibited a sheet that he held up in his hand with regard to a large tax sale that took place somewhere in the United States. I have no doubt that in some parts of the United States they have their drawbacks, sections of the country that are not worth very much, the same as are to be found in all countries. They have, I dare say, towns that have been surveyed and located, and that have been found afterwards not to be desirable sites to settle upon, and the result is that in all probability some of these lands were sold out to pay taxes. We have in our own country examples of that kind. Now, the principle bugbear that they keep continually exhibiting before the eyes of the farmers of the country, and that the hon. member for Lincoln has held up to-night, is the bugbear of direct taxation. They say it is impossible to conduct the affairs of this country if we are going to have reciprocity with the United States, without direct taxation. Well, I believe, from their standpoint, it is impossible; I believe that according to Tory rule, it is quite impossible. I believe that these men have become so accustomed in the past to a continuous increase of expenditure that they have become so completely ignorant of the true methods of economy that they would not be able to conduct the affairs of the country unless they had an enormous amount of money beyond what was really necessary. Year after year, they have added to the expenditure. I believe one Minister of the Crown has said that he would rather undertake at any time to defend a thousand dollar increase, than to justify a hundred dollar reduction. I believe they act upon that principle all the time, and the result is that ever since they have taken office, they have run up the debt of this country and have increased the annual expenditure to an enormous amount. I do not think it is wise. I believe when you take into consideration the enormous number of hangers on they have got, the barnacles of state that we see around this Chamber, and that are scattered all over this country, it will be evident that there is going on an enormous drain of our public resources. It is impossible for them to conduct the affairs of this country and reduce the sum down to what would be necessary if we had unrestricted reciprocity, even supposing we had to lose some 5 or 6 or 7 million dollars. Now, I believe that if we had unrestricted reciprocity and were called upon to reduce our annual expense 5 or 6 millions, there would be very little difficulty in doing so. I think, although I have never held an office of any kind, that I can look over the pages of the Auditor General's report and prove what I say. I think if you appoint a committee of earnest honest men to investigate that report in the interest of this country, they would be able, without much trouble, to cut down the payments very materially. I have no doubt that they might be cut down some 5, or 6, or perhaps 7 millions. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln says that he is pledged to the National Policy, he is bound to stand by it. That appears to me to be the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think they know what they owe to the manufacturers of this country; the manufacturers have stuck by them like bricks, they have stuck by them in the last three elections, and they have, no doubt, contributed largely to the election funds. We have reason to believe they have done so, and the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot very well turn their backs upon National Policy men and the manufacturers. They are undoubtedly disposed to stick by them, and I suppose they will, until once they realise the fact that they are not able to carry them into power any longer; then, I think, they will throw them overboard and enter into alliances with some other classes. The hon. member for Lincoln characterised the Ontario Government as a very corrupt government; he said it was a corrupt House. Now, if there is any man in this Chamber who should have hesitated in making a charge of corruption against the Ontario House, it is the hon. member for Lincoln. That hon. member once held a seat in that House himself, he once had the honor of performing the duties of a representative, and he has a record there, and I am going to give this House a little of the hon. gentleman's record during the time he sat in that House. I do not know that I should have done so if he had not pronounced the Ontario House a very corrupt House. While he sat there he certainly sowed the seeds of corruption himself, and if they have not been eradicated it is simply because there are men of his stamp there still. I will read a report, Mr. Speaker, of a Committee that was appointed for the purpose of looking into certain irregular transactions on the part of the hon. member for Lincoln:

"After hearing all the evidence submitted for their consideration, they find as follows:—"

"First—That the Great Western Railway of Canada, on or about the 1st day of February, 1870, paid the said John Charles Rykert, the sum of $1,000 for Parliamentary services, rendered by the said John Charles Rykert to such company in the then recent Session of the Legislature of Ontario."

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. McMULLEN—

"Second—That one Edward D. Tilson gave the said John Charles Rykert"—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must say that I think the hon. gentleman is digressing. These personal charges, unless they are to be followed up by some distinct proceedings against the hon. gentleman, should be avoided. I do not think they conduce to the good feeling of the House or in any way serve the public interest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you will allow me, Sir, to point out that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) made a distinct charge of corruption against the Ontario Legislature, and by his own act he has brought down on himself the exposure which the hon. gentleman was proceeding to give.

Mr. RYKERT. I made no charge against them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This has proceeded far enough. The charge, as stated by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), was one of those usual, although hardly justifiable, expressions that occur in debate, and I think such is quite different from specific accusations laid against an hon. member, unless it is the intention of the hon. gentleman making them to ask some other action on the part of the House, which I presume is not intended here. I would deprecate proceeding with that branch of the subject any further.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have read sufficient, I think, to satisfy this House, I am sure I have satisfied those outside of the House, that the hon. gentleman was wrong in making the charge of corruption against the Ontario Legislature in the way he did. I think when an hon. gentleman undertakes to make a charge against a House that is not represented here by any person to defend it, at the least the hon. gentleman's own record when a member of that House should be unspotted. The hon. gentleman has acted I think unfairly in doing as he has done. I will not dwell further upon that question. The hon. member for Lincoln read a number of extracts from papers of the United States to show the views held over there with respect to commercial union. He endeavored to show that the American press was opposed to commercial union. He tried to leave the impression on the House that even supposing the Canadian Parliament and the people of the Dominion should consent to commercial union, the press of the United States were opposed to it. I would meet that argument by saying that we have the reports of meetings of Boards of Trade in the principal cities in the United States that have endorsed the movement in the direction of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with Canada. Those boards have declared their belief that it would be advantageous to both, for their country as well as ours, and I think those boards are as well posted with respect to what changes in commercial relations would be advantageous to the United States as well as to Canada as the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has also spoken at considerable length with regard to free trade. He has tried to place the Reform party in the position of advocating free trade, and he has tried to shoulder upon Mr. Blake a charge that he had advocated free trade, and he misquoted Mr. Blake's speech at Malvern, in much the same way as he misquoted other speeches. I will give to the House Mr. Blake's speech upon this question. When Mr. Blake uttered the words to which the hon. gentleman referred he was speaking with respect to free trade, and he declared it was impracticable to have free trade in a country like ours with our enormously increased burdens. This is what Mr. Blake said:

"You know well that I do not approve of needless restrictions on our liberty of exchanging what we have for what we want, and do not see that any substantial application of the restrictive principle has been, or can be, made in favor of the great interests of the mechanic, the laborer, the farmer, the lumberman, the shipbuilder or the fisherman. But you know, also, that I have fully recognised the fact that we are obliged to raise yearly a great sum, made greater by the obligations imposed on us by this Government, and that we must continue to provide this yearly sum mainly by import duties, laid to a great extent on goods similar to those which can be manufactured here; and which results as a necessary incident of our settled fiscal system that there must be a large and, as I believe, in the view of moderate protectionists, an ample advantage to the home manufacturer. Our adversaries wish to present to you an issue as between the present tariff and absolute free trade. That is not the true issue. Free trade is, as I have repeatedly explained, impossible for us, and the issue is whether the present tariff is perfect, or defective and unjust. I believe it to be, in some important respects, defective and unjust."

It was in this connection that Mr. Blake used the words that the hon. gentleman quoted; but the hon. gentleman did not go the full length:

"And it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained and that manufacturers have nothing to fear. I then declared that any readjustment should be affected with due regard to the legitimate interests of all concerned. In that phrase 'all concerned' I hope no one will object to my including, as I do, the general public. In any readjustment I maintain that we should look especially to such reduction of expenditure as may allow of a reduction of taxation, to the lightening of sectional taxes, to the lightening of taxes upon the prime necessities of life, and upon the raw materials of manufacture, to a more equitable arrangement of the taxes which now bear unfairly upon the poor as compared with the rich."

Those were the words Mr. Blake used, and they were used in connection with the question of free trade or a revenue tariff. During this debate a great many references have been made to Mr. Blake's report, and to the fact that some statistics show there has been a great decrease in the value of land. I will show before I conclude my remarks that there are very great differences of opinion with respect to that subject; in some sections the people hope the lands may yet regain their former value, while in other sections they say that the value has very materially reduced. You cannot, therefore, rely upon these reports as absolute evidence of the price of the land being kept up. With respect to the arguments the hon. gentleman presented as regards our population, the hon. gentleman went on to criticise the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and to show that his statement with respect to the exodus of population could not be correct. He quoted the reports made at Sarnia by the American officer, in which he admitted that those reports were taken from previous records and were made out for numbers about the same as in previous years. In answer to that we simply ask, where have the inhabitants gone? They are not in Canada—our own statistics show they are not here. If they have not gone by Sarnia, they must have gone out of the country by some other route. Our immigration statistics show that we brought them here, and our provincial statistics show that our population has not made even the natural increase, without taking into account immigrants brought into the country. When the hon. member for Lincoln was dealing with this question, he might have shown the House where those people have gone, which would have been some satisfactory evidence on the point. We say they are not here, and we prove it by the statistics of the different Provinces. Where, then, have they gone if not to the United States? If they have not gone there, they must have gone to some other place. That is the best answer to an argument of that kind. Then, Sir, he went on to compare the several Provinces with the several States of the Union. He said there had been a reduction of population in some States, but the difference between our reduction of population and theirs is this: Their census shows decidedly in the increased number that they have in the new States that the population has gone from east to west. If our increased population in Manitoba was caused by a very large number of the people who had left the east and gone to the west to settle in Manitoba that would be satisfactory. But they have not done that. While in the United States those who have left the older States have gone to the west and settled in Dakota, Minnesota, Washington Territory and other places, those who have left the east of Canada are not found in the west. They are not found in Canada at all, and that is just the mistake made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they compare the United States to Canada in this respect. Now with regard to this tax sale list exhibited by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I should state that the mode of advertising tax sales in the States and here is very different. It is well known that in several States of the Union that, if immediately a tax is levied and not paid, the farm is advertised for sale, while in our country we hold land for some three or four years before advertising them for sale. In the States they advertise them right away if the taxes are not paid. I have been trying to deal with some of the arguments that have been used by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), and I shall now present some reasons why I think it my duty as the representative of an agricultural district to give my support to the resolution brought before the House and moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The question of bank deposits and deposits in our savings banks have been referred to almost by every man in this House who has spoken on the question, and it has been declared that deposits in savings banks are decisive evidence of the prosperity of the country. They say there is no better evidence of our prosperity than the increase in the savings banks deposits. Let us, Sir, take that and compare the statement with the general condition of things in England. In the year 1866, 1867 and 1868, when they had one of the greatest financial crises they have had in England during the present century, we find that the bank deposits in England never reached as high a point before as they did during those three years. Now in England at this time they ought to have had good times, and they ought to have had prosperity if we were to judge of the financial condition of the country by the savings bank deposits. They certainly had not good times, and we all know that they had the worst period of depression during the present century. This shows that on the whole the bank deposits are no criterion to judge by in regard to the condition of the country. In dealing with this question we have got fairly to face the fact that we have been doing a considerable trade with the United States for several years. Our trade with that country has been increasing, and notwithstanding the efforts made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to prove that the farmers of this country do not pay the duty I think there is not a farmer, not a sensible man in this country who does not realise the fact that he does pay the duty on what he sends across to the American side. That is the feeling of the farmers of this country. Before I conclude I shall give a few extracts to show that the intelligent portion of the farming community are under that impression. I hold that it is our duty under present circumstances to try and remove that burden off the shoulders of the farmers if we possibly can. When I come to consider that the farmers are the most important class in this country and that they ship one-half of the entire exports of this Dominion, we see that they are undoubtedly the most important class, and they deserve our first and best consideration. We must remember that the manufacturers only ship about one-twenty-third part of the exports of this Dominion, and it is unfair to say that the interests of the farmers, of the laboring classes, of the lumbermen and of the fishermen should be sacrificed simply because manufacturing institutions have got to be sustained at all hazards although they only export one-twenty-third of the entire shipments of this Dominion. We know that in 1886 we imported from Great Britain $40,600,000 worth in the year and from the United States $41,800,000 worth. Then of a total export trade of $74,975,000, we exported to England $36,700,000 and to the United States $31,463,000. Now on our exports to the United States of all the different commodities of products as well as cattle we paid about $3,500,000 duty. We paid that each year. And I think if we can, by any change of our fiscal policy, remove from the shoulders of our farmers that very heavy drain upon their resources it would be a wise and prudent act on the part of this House. We shipped to the United States last year 10,200,000 bushels of barley, on which we paid $120,000. Barley is an important factor in this Dominion, and we are coming to that period when if the older Provinces cannot make money on growing barley they cannot certainly make money on growing wheat, when we come to consider the low prices for wheat. The probabilities are that the price of wheat will still go lower when we remember the enormous production of wheat in India and the very cheap rate at which it is now carried to Liverpool. We must therefore look for low prices as far as wheat is concerned. Four years ago it cost 64 shillings to take a ton of wheat from Bombay to Liverpool, to-day it can be carried for 21 shillings and 4 pence or just about as low a price as we can take a ton of wheat from Toronto to Montreal. When we take this fact into consideration together with the very low rate of wages in India and the enormous development in the constructions of railways there we must expect low prices for wheat. The farmers of the older Provinces must give up growing wheat if they cannot grow it lucratively and consequently barley becomes a very important product. If we can increase the annual receipts of the farmers who grow barley by relieving them of the taxes or duties they have to pay to get it into the American market, it will be a decided advantage to them. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in treating this subject, said that wherever we had a natural outlet for our surplus produce, and where it was wanted, was undoubtedly our best market. We have a natural outlet in the United States for barley. It is wanted there and it is the best place we can send it to. If we can change our policy so as to enable this people to receive it from us without our farmers having to pay the duty, it would be a step in the interests of the farming community. I know it is said that if you open up the American market for the shipment of our surplus produce including horses, sheep and lambs, the result would be we would flood that market. I intend to prove that it is impossible for us to flood that market in this respect. The United States barley crop amounts to 90,000,000 bushels a year, and we send them 10,000,000 bushels, or one bushel in nine that they raise themselves, so that we cannot possibly flood that country with barley, even suppose we had the advantage of unrestricted reciprocity. Then take the item of horses and we have the same result. In 1866 we sent to the United States 21,000 horses, in 1887 we sent them 18,500 horses, and the duty paid was $442,000, and our census returns show that we had altogether 570,000 horses in this country at the last census. According to the census of the United States, the number of horses in that country is 10,357,000. Then, if we divide the number we send to the United States into this number, we find that we virtually send them one horse for every 500 they possess, and if we sent them all the horses they import in one year, we would only send them about one in every twenty. So it is utterly impossible for us to flood the American market even if it was entirely open to us. Again in regard to sheep; in 1886 we sent them 363,000, or 1,000 sheep every day in the year; in 1887 we sent them 363,000, so that the shipment of sheep is about the same each year. According to their census returns, they had themselves 35,192,000 sheep, so that we only sent them one sheep for every 97 they have themselves. The same is the case with cattle. The United States had some 36,000,000 cattle last year, and we sent them in 1886 36,000 and in 1887 45,767. Our trade with the United States in cattle is evidently increasing and if we could get the duty of 20 per cent. removed it would undoubtedly be a decided advantage to the farmers of this country. The farmers of this country must pay attention principally to cattle and sheep and the growing of peas, barley and oats, the only industries they can follow with any hope of profit; and if we can, by a change of policy, such as is proposed open to them unrestricted markets in the United States, we shall add to the gross receipts of the farmers of this Dominion $3,500,000 a year. Now, when we come to look at the financial condition of this country as compared with that of the United States, I am sorry to say it does not appear in a very favorable light. I am sorry to say that year after year we have been adding enormously to our indebtedness, while the United States have been reducing their debt. I know it was said last year by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the indebtedness of the several States, taken along with the Federal indebtedness, is in excess of our indebtedness in the Dominion of Canada. That I am going to prove is not correct. The State, city and county debt, in the United States according to their own census in 1880, amounted to $1,055,584,000. Their population being then 50,000,000, their per capita debt for State, county and city purposes was $21 a head. Then, the federal debt in 1887 was $1,700,771,000, while their population being taken at 65,000,000, would amount to $28.30 per capita. Taking these two amounts together, we find that their total debt, federal, state, city and county, amounts to $49.30 per capita. The net debt of Canada is $227,000,000; and our provincial, city and county debts do not amount to less than $200,000,000, making a total of $427,000,000, or a per capita debt of $85 a head, as compared with $49.30 in the United States. But this does not include all our debt, because we have railway bonds and other indebtedness to a very large extent. Now, Sir, the London Economist, one of the best financial journals in England, made an estimate last June of the entire indebtedness of Canada to England. That estimate was based upon information gathered from all sources. It estimated the entire debt of the Dominion to Great Britain, at $675,000,000. It took our net debt as $200,000,000, when in reality, it is $227,000,000; our provincial, harbor, municipal and railway debts at $325,000,000; and loans on stocks, mortgages and other securities at $123,000,000, making $675,000,000 in all. The interest on that sum at 4 per cent., amounts to the enormous sum of $27,000,000 a year, on a population of 5,000,000, or $5.40 a head. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln, when speaking of statements made to the people of this country at the last general election, said the Government had presented true and correct figures on that occasion. He stated that they had presented the financial condition of the country in a manner that had drawn from the people their confidence. Now, I hold that the statements the Government made in that election, whether knowingly or not, were not correct. Every Minister of the Crown started out on his election tour, one to the Maritime Provinces, one to Quebec and one or two to Ontario, everyone making the same statement, that the net indebtedness of this Dominion was $196,000,000. They also stated that the per capita tax was $1.63, only 3 cents above what it was during the time of the Mackenzie Government. Would any man in this House dare to get up and say that these statements were true? The evidence that has come to our notice since they were made proves that they were not true. We know that the net debt was really $227,000,000; we know that the per capita interest, based on that amount, was at least $1.93, if not $2, instead of $1.63. Yet it was on such statements that the confidence of the country was secured. The present Government have increased the burdens of the people of this country enormously. I have in my hand a statement, made up from the Auditor General's report, which shows that the present Government have increased the indebtedness of this country since 1880 to the present time, $106,559,000. In 1880 they added to the debt $15,000,000; in 1881, $5,000,000; in 1882, $85,000,000; in 1883, $3,000,000; in 1884, $40,223,000; in 1885, $22,221,000; in 1886, $8,461,000; and, in 1887, $4,154,000. In seven years they have added $15,000,000 a year. They have added $1,250,000 every month. They have added to the debt every day the sum rose since they took office, $41,333 a day since 1880. These figures show plainly the course in which this Dominion is drifting; they show the cause of the hard times; they show profligacy in the management of our affairs, and hon. gentlemen opposite will have to bear the responsibility, in this generation and in generations to come, of the enormous increase in our debt, and the constant yearly drain on the people's resources. The per capita figures during the time I have referred to is $21 a head. Take the case of the United States by way of contrast. The United States came out of a civil war with a debt of $2,500,000,000 and with a loss by death of nearly a million subjects. They have reduced their debt since that time $1,362,000,000, and they have increased their population from 33,500,000 to 60,000,000. The yearly reduction in their indebtedness is as follows: In 1882, they reduced their debt $145,000,000; in 1884, $132,000,000; in 1885, $63,000,000; in 1886, $93,000,000; in 1887, $109,707,000; in all, in six years they reduced their debt $542,542,707, or at the rate of $9 per head, while we have added to our indebtedness at the rate of $20 a head.

Mr. HESSON. In what way did they accomplish their reduction?

Mr. McMULLEN. By economy. By devoting their surplus revenue to the payment of their debts, in the place of squandering it.

Mr. HESSON. By taxing the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have taxed the people more than they.

Mr. McMULLEN. In 1870, the net debt of Canada was $227,341,000, which, with our population of 5,000,000, makes $45.46 a head, while the indebtedness of the United States shows but a per capita amount of $19 a head. In dealing with the question of how far unrestricted reciprocity would be an advantage to the farmers of this country, I shall give you a calculation which I made, which, I think, will bear investigation, and I am willing that it should be submitted to every farmer in this Dominion. I claim that unrestricted reciprocity would be, at the very least, an advantage of $1 an acre to every cleared acre of land in this Dominion. Take, for instance, a farm composed of 100 acres, with 75 acres clear. Let us say that the farmer is able to sell one colt for $100, the duty on which will be $20; one yoke of steers at $40, on which the duty is $8; 12 lambs, on which the duty is 50 cents each, $6; 300 bushels of barley at 10 cents duty, $30; 5 tons of hay on which the duty is $2, or $10; 30 bushels of potatoes on which the duty is 15 cents, $4.50. Now, any farm of 100 acres, with 75 acres cleared, would easily furnish that quantity of produce in a year. There is not a farmer in this Dominion who claims to hold a farm at all, who would have less produce to dispose of than that. The entire duty would be $78.50, which does not include the sale of poultry, fresh butter and vegetables. Now, I hold that any farmer who will seriously consider the question will easily come to the conclusion that the calculation I make is really below the mark. I will prove that it is below the mark, by a reply made by a farmer whom I dare say some of you know. I allude to Mr. Patrick McCallum, who owns one of the best farms in Pittsburgh township. It is named Spruce Lawn, and is not far from Kingston. Mr. McCallum, like many of his class, feels the duties on his exports to be burdensome in the extreme, and calculates that the sum of money he pays into the treasury of the United States on his exports amounts to a sum equal to what would be considered a reasonable rent for the part of his farm under cultivation. He was asked:

"How would commercial union benefit the Ontario farmer?—In many ways. The duty they now pay to the United States they would put into their own pockets, and they could get cheaper goods in many cases than they do now."

"What do you export to the United States at present?—I export barley, hay, horses, cattle, sheep and wool."

"What is the extent of your farm?—It is 500 acres, 400 of which are under cultivation."

"Can you give me any figures as to the quantity of produce you export?—Yes, as regards the leading products. Last year I exported to the United States 200 tons of hay, 800 bushels of barley, 6 horses, 80 sheep and lambs, and 1,000 pounds of wool. The duty on hay is $2 per ton, making the total duty $400 on my shipment. The duty on barley is 10 cents per bushel, so that the 800 bushels which I exported cost me for duty $80. On each of the six horses I paid $20, making $120. I paid $1.50 a head on my sheep, they are superior sheep, which amounted to $120, and 10 cents per pound for my wool, which cost me $100. That is a total of $820, or at the rate of $2 per acre for each acre I cultivate. From these figures, which I have no reason to believe are exceptional, you will see that the loss caused to the farmers by the tariff is $2 per acre, or a sum equal to an ordinary rent in these times."

These are the statements of a man who is a practical farmer. I want to show also something with regard to the values of land, concerning which we have had quite a discussion, some hon. gentlemen quoting Mr. Blue's report, and others other statistics, to try and show that land has not decreased in value, but I hold in my hand a copy of the report published by the Dominion Grange at their last meeting in Toronto:

"In five counties, viz, Waterloo, Durham, Bruce, Grey, and Peterborough, farm property was said to have depreciated in value, the depression in Durham, according to a delegate from there, amounting to a 'marked decrease.' In Halton, Mr. Fisher, who spoke for that section, said the value of property had not fallen to any appreciable extent. In Haldimand, it was 'difficult to sell,' in Peel, Wellington and Simcoe land values 'were stationary,' in Welland and Oxford values were 'still holding their own, but with a downward tendency,' and 'the mortgage debt was increasing.' The farmers who rent farms and those whose land is mortgaged—and these two classes probably constitute the majority of those engaged in agriculture in this Province—naturally feel the pinch more severely than the comfortable few who have got out of wheat and gone in for raising well-bred cattle and cattle products. Hence the partial failure of the crops this year, added to the fall that has taken place in prices, has broken the backs of many weak men; and loan companies and private mortgagees find themselves compelled to foreclose and throw their property on the market, to the injury of the solvent farmer, whose land is depreciated by the forced sale. In several parts of the Province well-to-do farmers have become disheartened, and are selling out with a view of trying their luck at storekeeping."

That is the report of the Dominion Grange that held their meeting in Toronto a short time ago. I was referring to the amount that each class contributed to the exports of the country in 1887. The forests supplied over one-third in value of our exports, the fisheries one-twelfth, the farmers one-half, and on the other hand the manufacturers only furnished one twenty-third part of our entire exports.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is correct, why does the Ontario Government put up the price of the royalty on the forest?

Mr. McMULLEN. I claim that, notwithstanding the statements which have been made with reference to the prosperous condition of the farmers, if any man will go through the several sections, especially in Western Ontario, with which I am best acquainted, he will find that the farmers are not in as good a position as they were some years ago. I listened to the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the farmers were generally content, that generally they were better off and making better financial progress, that they were doing well. Well, I would like that hon. gentleman to go to his own constituency or to any constituency west of Toronto, I would like him to advertise a meeting of farmers, to ask them to meet him, and to ask them to pass a resolution stating that they are making progress financially, that they are better off than they were before, and that their prices are better than they were years ago. I think the hon. gentleman would have some difficulty in getting such a resolution passed. Even in his own constituency, with could all the influence he exercises there, I do not believe he get a resolution of that kind passed. I also maintain that the Minister of Fisheries, notwithstanding his declaration that the farmers are doing well, would have great difficulty in getting any number of the farmers in his Province to agree to any such statement. As I have said before, barley, pease, sheep and cattle are the staple products of the older parts of this Dominion, and if, by a change of policy such as is proposed by the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), we can open up for our farmers, who are in financial embarrassment, better markets for their produce, markets free from the exactions to which they are now subject, such a proposition well deserves the attention of the people of this Dominion. The farmers are the backbone of this Dominion. They are the people upon whom the country's finances rest, and if we leave them to continue to contend with the difficulties which they have now to contend with, we may find out too late that we have neglected the means required to relieve them, and through them to assist the country that we live in. Have they asked anything unjust? Have they asked anything different from what the manufacturers asked in 1878? No, they have not. At that time the manufacturers asked for a positive increase in the tariff in order to give them advantages over imported goods. They asked that the farming community and the consumers of this country should be subjected to an increased taxation on certain commodities which they were going to manufacture, in order to enable them to manufacture them. Do the farmers ask now that the manufacturers should be subjected to any amount of taxation in order to benefit their condition? They do not. They simply say, give us free and unrestricted markets, markets where we were sending our stuff, and where it is evident we will still have to send it; remove the restrictions if you can, by any policy you may agree on with the United States, and give us the advantages which that change will bring to us, and that is all we ask; we do not wish you to subject the manufacturers to any special tax in order to benefit our condition, but we simply ask you to relieve us from these restrictions. That is all they ask, and I say it is only fair that we should grant them that request. They have labored under their disadvantageous circumstances for ten years. They have waited long for the fulfilment of the promise of the First Minister that their prospects would be improved by the adoption of the National Policy. I remember hearing the Finance Minister, who is now the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, state that free traders never received better prices than were received under the National Policy. That hon. gentleman, I am sure, is possessed of more wisdom and common sense than not to know that he was simply humbugging the people of this country in making that statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to withdraw the statement if it is out of order, but it cannot be too forcibly put to the members of this House and to the people of this country as to the deceit which was practised in holding out the advantages which were held out to the farmers under the operations of the National Policy. They have not received the advantage which was promised them, they have not got the increase in prices which was promised them, they have not got the home market which was promised them; our shipments show that they have not got that home market, and, in place of getting that home market they have been compelled to seek another market for a larger portion of their produce than ever before. In order to illustrate the way in which the farmers of the country have been used, I may tell a story or an anecdote of a Scotchman and an Indian who went out together to shoot. The Scotchman was a longheaded Scotchman, something like the Premier of this Dominion. They made a bargain that, when they came home at night they would divide the game. During the day they shot a duck and a crow. At night the longheaded Scotchman said to the Indian, "Now, Indian, you take the crow and I'll take the duck, or I'll take the duck and you take the crow." "But," says the Indian "you always say crow to me." Yes, every change that has taken place in the tariff, the farmer has got the crow and the manufacturer has got the duck. That has been the case every time, and so it will continue as long as we have our present trade policy. Now, I shall not say anything with regard to combines, except on one point. Very few have any idea of the extent to which these combines exist in this Dominion. I know a man in my section of the country who wanted to go into the undertaking business, and could not get the necessary supplies unless he went into the combine. He was compelled to pay $30 as a fee to go into that combine, and he could not get the necessary trimmings for his business unless he produced a certificate that he was a member of that combine. Has it not come to a pretty pass in this Dominion, that, after paying all the extra and increased amount that we are compelled to pay for the special benefit of manufacturers, we cannot even commit our deceased friends and relations to their last resting place unless under the auspices of a combine? It is an outrage that things are in the condition in which they are. Now, it is always said that our manufacturers cannot compete with the United States. I maintain that our manufacturers can compete with the United States. There is nothing in the world to prevent them. But the reason that they do not want to compete is that under the operations of the National Policy, they have got a soft thing, and they think to themselves that they would be fools to part with it so long as they can hold on to it, and as long as they can persuade the Government and the people of this country that they cannot compete, so long will they hold on to the advantages which they now enjoy. That is the reason why they are not disposed to compete. Why can they not compete? Cannot raw material in the articles of cotton or sugar be laid down in Canada as cheaply as in any other place? I was amazed at the remarks that fell from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with regard to the article of sugar. He challenged the correctness of a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford with regard to our interest in Bahama. He said we owed a certain debt of national honor to England, and he went on to explain that statement, and before he got through with the speech he said, take the article of sugar. It was carried in British bottoms from the place of production to England, it was there transferred to railways and carried on British railways to British factories, it was there manufactured by British labor, and was then re-shipped in British bottoms and brought to our shores; on that article we paid the duty after it had been brought to the highest condition of manufacture. "Now," said he, "take the condition of things as we find them at present. We bring sugar from the place of production, in our own ships to our own shores, we manufacture the sugar ourselves, our own people get the advantage of all the labor, and all the profit goes into the pocket of our own people." Well, now, I thought that if he was so strongly devoted to the interests of England, if he wished to hold so determinedly to his allegiance to the manufacturers of England, he certainly should not have made that comparison, because it clearly shows the truth of the statement made by the First Minister, when he said that if the National Policy endangered British connection, all the worse for British connection. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite never say a word about the smuggling going on from the United States into Canada, of which there was never more done than at the present moment. At one time, after the close of the war, all the smuggling was out of Canada into the United States, simply because goods were cheaper in Canada than in the United States. Now, I want any hon. member on the other side of the House, who advocates the National Policy, to say why it is that under the operations of that policy the tide has turned, and that to-day goods are dearer in Canada than they are in the United States. There is a very large smuggling going on; I know from personal knowledge that I have obtained from parties who live in Buffalo, that the goods are smuggled into Canada as far up as Brantford, bought there and taken into this country free of duty. Now, this shows that while in our country articles have been increasing in price, they have been lowering on the American side. Now, who is going to be at the expense of preventing all this smuggling? Before things got to this condition the Americans had to pay the cost of a large staff of preventive officers to prevent smuggling; now, our Government will have to pay that cost. The Americans have no fear of goods being bought in Canada and carried across to the States, simply because people can buy them in their own country cheaper than they could here. They have reached that point in their history that they will be relieved to a large extent of that expenditure. Here we have an enormous frontier of several thousand miles across which goods will be continually smuggled so long as the respective prices remain as at present. I say in order to relieve us from that enormous expense it would be much better to have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States in the natural products of the soil as well as in manufactured goods. Now, it is said also that we should be loyal to the Empire; we should be loyal to ourselves. Well, Sir, I will venture to say that perhaps there is not an individual within the reach of my voice who has not got a relative in the United States; I would venture to say that from one end of this Dominion to the other, you will meet with but very few who have not got relations over there. Now, is it to be looked upon as a national crime on our part because we send to our own relatives across the border, things that they want, and we take from them things which we require and that they have to part with. And is it looked upon as disloyal that we should trade our own blood relations? You will not find on the face of the earth two nations so near together, so conveniently located for trade in many respects, the same race of people, that are subjected to such absolute restrictions in trade as exist between Canada and the United States—caused, first by the National Policy introduced into the United States after the close of the war, when they put on a very large duty; and secondly, caused by the foolish and unwise course we have adopted in increasing, from year to year, the duty upon goods coming from there, so as to make this absolute wall of separation. Now, hon. gentlemen are very loud with regard to the question of loyalty. You would fancy, to hear them speak, that there was not a loyal man on this side of the House, you would fancy we were all rebels, that we are all annexationists, that there was not a drop of loyal blood in our veins, and that we are disloyal to the core.

Mr. SPROULE. Correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, we had better go back and review the history of this country. The best way to judge of a party is in the same manner that the hon. member for South Oxford stated at one time that he judged of the First Minister of this country; he said he never took much stock in what he said, he always took stock in what he did. I think that is the best way to decide our loyalty. We had better go back and see what they did in the past. We had Parliament buildings in this country burned at one time; I do not think the Grits did it, they were never charged with doing it. We had a Governor General in this country who was stoned and rotten-egged on a certain occasion; I never it heard it was the Grits who were charged with doing that. Then again we had an annexation manifesto signed at one time; I never heard they were all Grits who signed that manifesto. Now, when hon. gentlemen undertake to lecture us about loyalty, they should look back over their own record, and see whether there are any black spots on it before they attempt to charge us with being disloyal. Now, the next question I shall touch upon is the iron duties. Last year we had increased iron duties put on, and we know that England remonstrated with regard to the increase of iron duties. It is said, of course, that no change in the tariff should ever be made that would be likely to offend the mother country or estrange it from us; but hon. gentlemen opposite do not appear to have given that consideration much attention when they increased the iron duties. We find remonstrances in regard to the iron duties made by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, by the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, by the British iron trade, all the iron associations joining in denouncing the increase in the iron duties. They went on to show that this was not a friendly act on the part of Canada towards the mother country and that the imposition of those duties was very likely to strain the friendly relations existing. When these protests were made one of our Canadian journals undertook to prove that these duties were not imposed for the purpose of striking the English iron trade, but for the purpose of striking the American trade, and after that paper had used the argument the Minister of Finance took it up and used it likewise. The statement made was as follows:

"It was implied that the Canadian duties on certain lines of iron goods were only a little over 25 per cent.; whereas a writer in the Liverpool Post shows that the duties referred to range from 40 per cent. on pig to 55 per cent. on bar iron. Lastly, the statement made by one of the Ministerial journals and re-echoed by Sir Charles Tupper, to the effect that the iron duties had been imposed out of a sincere desire on our part to strengthen the Empire, struck the English press as peculiarly audacious. It would have been more ingenuous in Sir Charles, they thought, as well as more complimentary to British intelligence, to have confessed at once that our aim was to protect the Londonderry venture regardless of British interests."

It is thus apparent that hon. gentlemen opposite were not so particularly anxious about our relations with England when they imposed the iron duties as they now appear to be in regard to unrestricted reciprocity. They now hold up before the eyes of this House and the country that such a policy is likely to strain the friendly relations between the Dominion and England; but, as I have said, when they imposed the iron duties, this never seems to have entered their minds. In discussing this question further and in connection with commercial union English manufacturers say it matters little to them how we supply ourselves with iron if the duty is placed in such a way that they are virtually shut out of the market—they say it matters not whether we produce the iron ourselves or take it from the American side.

"If it be said that under commercial union we should have to adopt a higher tariff than the existing one, and that British exporters would therefore be injured more seriously than they are at present, the answer is, that whilst the tendency in the United States is to reduce duties the tendency in Canada is to increase them."

So much for the imposition of the iron duties. When the Minister of the Interior addressed the House upon this resolution he said that a number of people who had gone to Dakota were returning. In my section of the country I can assure the hon. gentleman that there has been quite an exodus to the Western States, but I do not know a single instance of a man who has returned. I would indeed be glad if they did return. I was rather amused that the hon. gentleman, in comparing the prices received for farm produce in this country and the United States, went all the way to Milwaukee for prices to compare with Toronto prices. Another peculiar point in the discussion is that hon. gentlemen opposite are always ready, as stated by the Minister of the Interior, to give the largest measure of reciprocity, consistent with the National Policy. Only keep the National Policy in tact, only protect the manufacturers, and if you can by any side wind, or in any other way, give a little advantage to either the laboring classes or the farming community all right, but do not disturb the National Policy. I notice also that the operatives are threatened with being thrown out of works; hon. gentlemen opposite say they will not have the labor, that this resolution strikes at them as well as at the manufacturers. Manufacturers coming from the United States into Canada can come across the border without paying any duty. There is no protection on labor coming in or going out. How, therefore, is unrestricted reciprocity to strike the laboring classes? I noticed, the other day, that a certain railway company ran out of engineers, and the company sent to Montreal and from the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway obtained almost all the men they required. The men had no duty to pay on going to the United States, as Americans have no duty to pay on coming here. Consequently, there is no protection for the laboring man, while there is a protection for the manufacturer. If a manufacturer comes to this country he has to pay duty on the machinery and raw material he uses, and in that way he has protection. I was rather amused by the Minister of the Interior saying we did not want reciprocity or commercial union. It is singular that he should express that view when the Government in their tariff policy of 1878 stated they would be only too glad to accept reciprocity if the Americans would give it to us, but now they are not willing to accept it. The hon. gentleman also made reference to Mr. Blake's speech at Malvern. That speech appears to be a source of comfort to hon. gentlemen opposite; but if hon. gentlemen will turn up the proceedings of the House they will find that on the very first occasion last year Mr. Blake took the opportunity of showing that he did not intend and did not accept the National Policy as a necessity. Mr. Blake has always held to the principle of a revenue tariff, so adapted that it would give the manufacturers incidental protection by allowing them to import their raw materials free. He has not, on any occasion, departed from that view, and when he spoke at Malvern he merely wished to convey the idea that there was no question as between free trade and protection but as between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff, because those were the great questions then before the country. The Minister of the Interior declared that up to this time we had been without a policy. We will not be a party without a policy any longer. We have a policy, which we will try to make the people understand and which will be fully explained to them. Some hon. gentlemen seem to be terribly confused with regard to this reciprocity question and do not realise what it is, although we have endeavored to grind it into their understandings in very plain and pointed speeches. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in a very able speech very plainly and pointedly declared what in his opinion would be the effect of unrestricted reciprocity, and if hon. gentlemen are in ignorance of the true meaning of that principle, it is because they have not listened to the statements made. In 1879 the Minister of the Interior said that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie had offered reciprocity and had done their best to secure it. No doubt that Government did try to secure reciprocity, and hon. gentlemen opposite have declared by the National Policy that they were prepared to accept reciprocity when the United States were prepared to give it. I believe that clause in the protective tariff was inserted for the purpose of misleading the farmers. They went to the farmers and said: We are willing to have reciprocity with the United States just as soon as they are willing to give it to us, and I have no doubt that when another general election takes place in this Dominion you will find the amendment proposed to the resolution now before the House by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, hawked around every constituency and the supporters of the present Government will say: Do you doubt that it is not our intention to give you better trade relations with the United States? Look here, there is a resolution moved by us in the House of Commons and your friends opposed it and voted against it. We are earnestly anxious to do everything that we can for you and we are going to give you reciprocity just as quickly as we can get it. That will be in accordance with the promise made in 1878, when the party opposite was going to give the farmers home markets, and better markets, and better prices, for all products than ever they got in previous years. Another statement the Minister of the Interior made was when he told us that the farmers of this country did not send 10 per cent. of their stuff to the United States. If he looked up the returns he would have seen that the farming products exported to the United States last year amounted to $15,000,000. Well now if 10 per cent. is taken that will be $150,000,000 of products. I can hardly think that he intended to make such a statement, but it is evidently a statement made without due consideration. He also spoke in regard to the increase of population and wealth in the city of Toronto. Allow me to tell the hon. the Minister that Toronto has increased at the cost of the outside towns. I know that in my own town that there have been I am sure quite 150 of our population who have left and gone to Toronto. The reason for that is that manufacturers are being centralised largely there. I also know the town from which the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) comes, and I think he will not dare to deny the statement that a large manufacturing institution in that town has established a branch institution in the city of Toronto, and they were just about to move their entire plant there when the town legislature decided to give them a large bonus to keep the manufactory or part of it in that town. In my own town we have lost very seriously under the operation of the National Policy, and how? Why, Sir, those blacksmiths and carriage makers who in a quiet and small way produced what the people wanted, have been compelled, owing to the extensive manufacturing institutions that have been put up, to quit the business altogether. We have to-day in our town two foundries and a carriage shop standing idle and not a single hammer going in either of them—monuments to the destruction the National Policy has worked in those trades. This is simply because under the operation of the National Policy the tendency is to centralise and get up large factories while those small places have been ruined. I believe this is the case with many places as well as the town I come from. While we rejoice at the progress which has been made in the city of Toronto, we claim after all that it is largely caused by the influx from the country towns and villages around of manufacturers, laborers and others, and that it is not a growth that has been caused by the influx of population from other parts of the world. I come now, Sir, to say a word or two with regard to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and I am sorry he is not in his place. He ought to be because Ministers are paid annually their salaries to attend to the duties of the House, and they are paid a sessional allowance to be here and discuss public questions. The hon. the Minister of Fisheries in the introductory part of his speech found fault with some expression used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He tried to show that that gentleman was in the habit of using certain words very frequently and he said that one word "it is clear, it is clear, it is clear" was used several times in his speech. I remember on a former occasion the hon. the Minister of Fisheries undertook to reply to the hon. the then leader of the Opposition and he commenced a criticism at the same time. He said he had read over his speech on that occasion once, and read it over a second and a third time, and all he could find in it was a repetition of the word "maybe, maybe, maybe." The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) on that occasion undertook to deal with the hon. the Minister of Fisheries and he compared him to a bird of prey flying over the landscape which he failed to behold and flying over the beauties of the river, which he failed to behold and missing the grandeur of the landscape his only object was to light on some dead horse in the fence corner and stick his bill in the carcase up to his eyes. We find the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries still a bird of prey. He has started on the same course again and it appears that his classic ear is wearied of the use made of the Queen's English in this House. He has no doubt been hobnobbing at Washington, and I suppose he takes it upon himself to criticise all that is said and done within this Chamber. The hon. gentleman had better perhaps not be too severe in that regard for although he holds a portfolio in the Government just now the days were when he used to deliver lectures on temperance at $10 apiece. I am told he has stabled his temperance horse for the present, but he might be yet called upon to take it out and saddle it and do the same duty with it again. It is for him to say. I notice he has pretty well avoided his temperance sentiments, but he does not care just now. It does not serve any good end and as long as he is permitted to occupy a seat in the Cabinet with $7,000 a year he puts his temperance sentiment to one side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I request you to confine yourself more closely to the question under debate.

Mr. McMULLEN. He stated in his address that the only market or outlet we could get for our surplus product was where it was wanted. I would like to know if the United States is not our natural market for what we send there, and if our only market is to be found in England? The reason why we send them there is because we get better prices for them there than we can get in other places. He spoke also with regard to the population in his own section who have left there. He said the reason they went to the United States was because they wanted freer and better and broader lands. Now, Sir, that is rather a peculiar admission for a Minister of the Crown to make. I thought we had as broad and free lands here as could be got in any part of the world. I thought we had a great deal to boast of with regard to the extent of our fertile territory in the North-West, and that the inhabitants of New Brunswick should go to the Western States to get broader and freer lands I cannot understand. He referred also to the quantity of coal that is carried over the Intercolonial Railway, as an evidence of the growth of international trade. I do not think that this is much evidence. The fact of the matter is, when we take the history of the Intercolonial Railway and notice that it is run at a very serious loss of income and consider the fact that last year the Minister of Railways and Canals acknowledged that coal was carried at a loss, I do not think it is a very great advantage to this entire Dominion that we are working up at an annual loss an international trade in the matter of coal. He also stated that if we got an international trade, it would tend to increase the "combines" rather than reduce them. He pointed out that "combines" existed in the United States. They may possibly exist, but an argument that extending our commerce and obtaining trade with an extensive country, composed of 60,000,000, would tend to increase the number of "combines" is a rather peculiar argument. According to that argument, if the whole world had adopted free trade, then there would be huge combines, because the more extensive you make the trade relations of a country the greater inducement there is to "combines." The hon. Minister of Marine also stated that Sir Charles Tupper, when he was in Washington made a demand for closer trade relations with the United States, but that demand was declined. It is very singular that he made a demand for what a number of hon. gentlemen opposite hold we do not want. One reason why we contend that it would be a decided advantage to the Maritime Provinces, as well as to Ontario and Quebec, to have unrestricted trade with the United States, is that the large population in the border cities would afford excellent markets for the products our people have to sell. When we consider that we have within twenty-four hours' run, New York, with 1,206,000, Brooklyn, with 555,000, Buffalo, with 155,000, and Rochester, with 100,000, it must be clear that with closer trade relations these cities would be large consumers of our surplus produce. In this connection I will read a letter which was written by a gentleman whose name I am sure is respected by every man in this House—a letter addressed by John Bright to Joseph Aspinall, of Detroit, in answer to an invitation to be present at a convention in favor of reciprocity between the United States and Canada. It is as follows:

"The project of your convention gives me great pleasure. I hope it will lead to a renewal of commercial intercourse with the British North American Provinces, for it will be a miserable thing if because they are in connection with the British Crown and you acknowledge as your chief magistrate your President at Washington, there should not be a commercial intercourse between them and you as free as if you were one people living under one government."

That is the view held by Mr. Bright of what should be the prevailing sentiment in regard to reciprocity of trade. Now, Sir, I have some quotations here from the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Marine. He says, speaking of the farmers:

"But I have full faith in the intelligence of the farming community, that, if this question comes to be a serious question, to be fought out before them, and both sides of it are fully ventilated, the farmers of this country will hold themselves aloof from the bait held out to them, and will keep themselves to the connections they have to-day, well assured that by so doing their future will not be prejudiced, but, on the contrary, will be prosperous."

Well, Sir, I would like to hear the hon. gentleman address a large gathering of farmers and present these views to them; I think he would find they would not be prepared to endorse them. I believe he would realise that the time is past when farmers can be misled by statements of that kind, and that they are not willing to listen to promises of good prices and better times as they were in 1878. The hon. gentleman said again:

"A large proportion of the clothing he and his family wear is also paid for out of the products of his farm, and no taxes paid."

I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman comes to that conclusion. Again, in dealing with the farmer, he says:

"Oh, but my hon. friend says, there is the tariff on coarse woollens, and consequently the man who wears these woollens pays a heavy tax on every yard he uses. Does he? The farmer has sheep on his own farm, which he often shears himself, and whose wool he has often made up in the mill of his own locality, and his family wear the clothes thus manufactured. Where is the tax that is paid on these?"

At the present time there is not a single woollen manufacturing establishment in this Dominion that will take wool from a farmer, and manufacture it into cloth. The manufacturers will take his wool at the market price, and will sell their manufactured goods to him at the market price, with all the advantages of the tariff under which they manufacture, but there is not a single one of them who will take his wool and make it into cloth for him. They know too much, because under the operations of the National Policy they know that they have the advantage of the farmer, and they take all the advantage they can get. Again the hon. Minister says:

"If we consider advisable to discriminate against Great Britain, we have the right to do so. We have our own interests and they are paramount, and that assertion was made still stronger to-day by the hon. member for Queen's, and it was echoed by my hon. friend from South Oxford. The hon. member for South Oxford says: If it does discriminate against Great Britain, we have a right to do it, our own interests are paramount."

That part of the statement I referred to a short time ago, showing that under the imposition of the duties on sugar the hon. gentleman was not consistent in holding those views. I shall now say something with regard to the value of lands. Mr. Blue's book is quoted as an authority on this subject. Mr. Blue does not go back and give full quotations, but he gives quotations for only some years. I notice that in 1882 the value of farm lands was $632,000,000, in 1883 $664,000,000, in 1884 $625,000,000, in 1885 $626,000,000, and in 1886 $648,000,000, a considerable decrease on what it was in 1883; so that when hon. gentlemen attempt to say that farming lands are still getting more valuable they are mistaken, even basing their arguments on the evidence produced by Mr. Blue.

Mr. HESSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that Mr. Blue reports farm lands throughout Canada as lower to-day than they were last year?

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Blue may be correct with regard to some sections, but I say he is not with regard to all sections. Then, Sir, we had the production of wheat. The hon. member for Lincoln gave us some idea of the amount of production of wheat in 1882. The following are the figures of our wheat for several years past:

| | Fall Wheat. | Spring Wheat. | Barley. |
|------------|-------------|---------------|------------|
| 1882 | 31,277,048 | 9,665,995 | 24,284,407 |
| 1883 | 11,656,957 | 9,726,063 | 18,414,337 |
| 1884 | 20,717,631 | 14,609,661 | 19,119,041 |
| 1885 | 21,478,281 | 9,129,881 | 16,533,587 |
| 1886 | 18,071,142 | 9,518,553 | 19,512,278 |

In 1885 the average yield of fall wheat was 20.4 bushels per acre, and the largest yield was in Hastings, where the average was 26.2. In 1885 the average all over the Province was 24.5 bushels. Of spring wheat the average yield in 1886 was 16.5 bushels. In 1885 it was but 11.4 bushels. The average yield of barley in 1886 was 26.5 bushels. In 1885 it was 27.7 bushels. The average yield of oats was 36.2 bushels in 1886 and 35.8 bushels in 1885. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said what the prices were. Let us see what the prices were for the last seven years. The prices, taking an average of what was paid in all the principal Ontario markets, were:—

| | Fall wheat, per bu. | Spring wheat, per bu. | Barley, per bu. | Oats, per bu. | Peas, per bu. |
|-----------|---------------------|-----------------------|-----------------|---------------|---------------|
| 1882..... | $1 01 | $1 05 | $0 65 | $0 43 | $0 74 |
| 1883..... | 1 05 | 1 07 | 0 57 | 0 38 | 0 71 |
| 1884..... | 0 80.5 | 0 81.4 | 0 53.6 | 0 33.1 | 0 64.4 |
| 1885..... | 0 81.5 | 0 80.6 | 0 55.2 | 0 31.5 | 0 58 |
| 1886..... | 0 73.6 | 0 72.5 | 0 51.3 | 0 32 0 | 0 52.6 |

This table proves that,—in place of the farmers getting increased prices, the prices have been running down every year; yet still the Minister of Marine and Fisheries declares the farmers are getting good prices.

Mr. TAYLOR. Give us the prices for 1876 and 1877.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, with regard to the price of farm lands, I can speak only for my own section, and I can say I have had considerable experience both in selling and buying lands, both for myself and for other people. I know personally that four miles from the town where I am, a man in 1880 was offered $7,500 for his farm. He refused, and rented the farm for five years. Before the five years were up, he died, and the farm was sold, under his will, for $1,900. I also know the case of a man who went to Dakota and borrowed money on his farm for which he was offered $3,200. He refused the offer and left his property in the hands of his land agent and of another man who was to take some interest in its disposal, to be sold. It was advertised three months for sale, but not an offer was made for it. It had then to be sold by auction, and was bought in for $3,800, or $400 less than the owner was offered for it when he went away. These are cases that came within my own knowledge, and I care not for what Mr. Blue or any other man may say, when I have personal knowledge that furnishes undoubted evidence that land in our section is not holding its own. I could make similar statements with regard to North Perth, where I know some of the lands are not holding their own. I have been making valuations, and I know that in my own section of country to-day, there are no less than six farms put up at public auction under mortgages, and in not one single instance has a buyer been found. I know of an instance where a farm was brought for $3,700 in 1879. The owner mortgaged it, and he was offering it within the last month for $2,300 without being able to obtain a buyer. To say therefore in the face of these facts that farm lands are holding their own is an absurdity, as regards my section at any rate.

Mr. HESSON. I will give you evidence about North Perth.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have had some discussion with regard to the article of butter. An hon. gentleman the other afternoon contended that England was our market for our butter, and that we could always get good prices there; and that even if we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, we could not sell our butter there. I have a letter from a practical gentleman addressed to the Mail. In this letter, Ambrose Zettel, a Bruce County farmer and secretary of the Formosa Butter and Cheese company, gives some excellent reasons for his belief in commercial union:

"At the end of last season our company had 20,000 pounds of very fine butter on hand for sale. The English market, however, was so overcrowded that the buyers would not give a satisfactory price and the company were forced to look to the United States. My brothers, who own a creamery in Minnesota, informed me that our butter would bring from 25 to 26 cents a pound any day in St. Paul, and the same class of butter was quoted in the Buffalo wholesale market at from 28 to 30 cents. The duty, however, was in the way and the company were forced to keep their stock in the hope of getting a market elsewhere. We kept it until the holidays, when the patrons of the factory, becoming anxious to receive their money, insisted on a sale at whatever price could be obtained. The price obtained was 20½ cents and the butter was shipped to British Columbia. The patrons thus lost about $1,200 on their stock by being kept out of the Buffalo market. Other factories lost even more in the same way, as they were obliged to sell at even lower prices. Mr. Zettel states also that even in the face of the duty, large numbers of fine stall fed cattle are shipped to the United States. If the buyer had no duty to pay they would not only buy more cattle, but would pay our farmers just so much more for them, for we have better facilities for raising and breeding cattle and are nearer the Eastern markets than the Western farmer. I advise Canadian farmers to study this question carefully, aside from party politics, and I feel convinced that if they do so they will be almost to a man in favor of commercial union."

That is the view which that man holds in regard to butter and in regard to stock. I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) state that commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was putting in the thin edge of the wedge of annexation. I do not see how he can reconcile that with the position that hon. gentlemen opposite take in regard to extended relations with the United States. During the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty from 1854 to 1866, I do not think that our people were more inclined to join the Americans than they are at the present moment. I believe that, instead of our people becoming Americans, they will continue to be Canadians, but I believe that, unless you carry out unrestricted reciprocity or give our people some advantage in the way of extended markets, you will compel them to become Americans by going over there to live; but if you give them an opportunity of parting with their stuff in a lucrative way, the probability is that they will remain in Canada and will continue to be Canadians. The hon. gentleman also stated that he was afraid he would lose his nationality by the adoption of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, that, after that had been in force for a year or two, we would not be able to say whether we were Americans or Canadians. That reminds me of a story. An Irishman, whose sister got married, met a friend of his about a year afterwards, and said: "Dan, did you hear the news?" "No," said Dan, "what is it?" "Why," said he, "my sister has presented her husband with her first born, and the peculiarity is that I don't know whether I am an uncle or an aunt." So, the hon. gentleman said, that he would not know at the end of a year whether he would be an American or a Canadian, and therefore he was so much afraid to encourage reciprocity. Another thing which is said is that the result of this will be to wipe out all our industries. I do not think it is right to impress upon the people of the country that there is any such intention on this side of the House. We are willing, and we always have been willing, that our industries should have all the advantages that justice to all the other sections of the country will allow them. We do not believe in burdening the people who are now in financial embarrassments, in order to keep up the manufacturers. We are willing that our manufacturers should continue to prosper, and should have all the advantages which we can extend to them, but, if they think the rest of the population of the country are to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for their advantage alone, they should be made to understand that the people of this country will not bear with anything of this kind. They should be willing to get from this House justice, and no more. They have been getting more than justice for ten years. They have had all the advantages, and the other portions of the people have been having all the injustices, and it is time that these manufacturers should be asked to stand alone without drawing on the resources of the consumers to an unjust extent, as they have been doing. There has been no case in the history of any country where those restrictionists have been willing to give way when once they have obtained an advantage. Look at the United States and see how manufacturers there are fighting against the reduction of the tariff, because they have had for many years the advantage of a high tariff, and consequently have been making millions, and the history of every country shows that, when once a high tariff gets a foothold, the manufacturers will fight for the continuation of the advantages they have, and that will be the case with the manufacturers of Canada. Hon. gentlemen have declared that we will lose $7,000,000 if we adopt unrestricted reciprocity. They cannot think it possible for us to conduct the affairs of this country under those circumstances, without direct taxation. In their hands, it may be impossible to do so, but I believe that, in the hands of gentlemen on this side of the House, it would be possible. I believe we could make such reductions in expenditure that the government of this country could be conducted without direct taxation. I believe that hon. gentlemen on this side are prepared to pledge their word to the people of this country that they will so handle the affairs of the country that direct taxation will not be necessary, even with unrestricted reciprocity. I could quote some articles on which I think they could save at least five millions and a-half. For instance, there are legal expenses on which $61,000 was spent last year. There is outside printing, which could be easily done under the contract with the Government here, for which we paid last year $97,500. At least we could make a reduction in that amount. Then there is outside advertising, which amounted to $68,000. Reduce that by $50,000 and you still leave $18,000. Then there were payments to extra clerks or to clerks hired in the several departments for extra work, amounting to $120,000. I think that the clerks should be made to understand that all the duties they perform should be done within hours, and that no extras would be allowed for work after hours. If they understood that would be the rule, I believe they would do all the work without extra allowance. Last year we paid $3,542,406 for reduction of debt, though the estimate was $2,097,958. I do not know whether the extravagant commissions which were paid were the result of the absence of the High Commissioner from London, but, when he was appointed, we were told that he would save us an enormous amount of money by living in London in connection with these commissions. On that item, $1,444,000 should have been saved. On Civil Government, I think, $150,000 could be saved, and on Civil Government contingencies there could be a reduction of $100,000. I think we could save $100,000 by economy in our penitentiaries. If you compare the cost of our penitentiaries with that of the Central Prison in Toronto, you will find that the latter is managed for $55,000 a year, while one of our penitentiaries, which accommodated about the same number of prisoners, costs, $106,000. We have not a penitentiary in the Dominion which is conducted on the same economical basis as the Central Prison in Toronto. That expense could be easily reduced by $100,000. Then, we could very well do without the superannuation system, and I was glad to see that a Committee which was introduced to one of the Ministers recently petitioned the Government, amongst other things, to do away with superannuations. If you abolish that, we will save $150,000. Then, again, if you will do away with pensions, this change will save $160,000. Then in regard to public works, we spent last year something like $2,500,000 in that branch. We might cut that sum down by $1,000,000, and we might make less expensive post offices, such as we have built down in St. Jérôme, in the constituency of the Secretary of State. There are some 300 or 400 people in that village, and we pay the round sum of about $16,000 for a post office—I forget exactly what the postmaster gets. We appropriated last year $10,000 for that post office, and I notice in the Estimates this year $6,000 more are asked to build a post office down in a little village where there is no necessity whatever for it, but simply because the Secretary of State wanted it in his constituency to strengthen his cause with the people. It will be a benefit to him when the elections come round; I suppose it was a benefit last election. Go into western Canada, and there is only one town in the county of Wellington that has a post office, that is in Guelph. I live in a town of 2,500 inhabitants, where the returns are something like $1,400 a year, but there is no post office. The returns at St. Jérôme are not one-half that sum, I think the entire receipts of the office are something less than $800, I do not know that it reaches that sum. You could make a reduction of $250,000 in the matter of immigration. Then again you could reduce our legislation expenses by $100,000. We could easily reduce our railway expenses by $150,000 by dismissing all the unnecessary officials and running railways on economical principles. Then again you should apply to the purpose what is voted towards the sustenance of the savages of the North-West, in place of giving it to a whole lot of officials. I think there is about a million altogether spent in connection with feeding the Indians, and I think about one-half of the money goes into the pockets of officials. Now, if you were to establish a system whereby the public money would be economically expended I think we might save in connection with the Indians $400,000 a year. Then again on Miscellaneous, we might save $140,000 in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. We add to the capital of that line about $1,000,000 a year, and I think we could well do without it. During the time of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, they closed the capital account, and made up their minds that they could make the road pay its own expenses, and I think they did, or nearly so. It is time it should be done, but this Government have opened a capital account, and year by year they have added to it. Well, Sir, all these expenses I have read over to you amount to $5,644,000. Now, I wonder if any economical Government cannot go to work and reduce the expenses of this country by at least six millions, if they are disposed to do it. But hon. gentlemen opposite never will do it, because they are not in the direction of reducing the expense, their direction is rather to increase it. Now, these hon. gentlemen talk to us loudly about their loyalty. We come across things at times that show their loyalty is from the lip out. They deprecate, strongly and pointedly, investments outside of our own Dominion. Why, I can remember last year when some members of the Ontario Government were supposed to own lands in Dakota, what hue and cry there was, a perfect yell, that Ministers of the Crown of the Province of Ontario should be owners of land in Dakota, and they were taken very pointedly to task in the Conservative press because they were supposed to have invested some money out there. Well, now, Sir, we come across an investment that was made by some hon. gentlemen opposite some time ago, away down in the State of Texas. We find there, Sir, a gentleman—I do not know who he is—but I find that his name is William Bullock Ives. I do not know where he lives, but I notice that he has led a whole lot of them into the bullock business down in that wonderful bullock producing state of Texas. I do not know whether he has made it a profitable investment or not, but I know that he has been the principal instrument. I find that there are a great many prominent men who have invested in this bullock business. There is the Hon. Senator Cochrane, who is a large stockholder. The Hon. Hugh Ryan is a large stockholder to the extent $133,000. Then R. R. Pope—who he is, whether he is a relative of the Minister of Railways or not, I do not know, but he is a stockholder to the extent of $20,000. I find, that this individual, William Bullock Ives, is a stock holder in two companies, in one for $14,500, and jointly with Mr. Pope for $33,000. I find, Sir, in the list—who do you think? The Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Finance Minister of this Dominion, who is a stockholder to the extent of $21,000. They are all stockholders in this wonderful company away down in the State of Texas, in which they have invested quite a lot of money. I notice, amongst other names, that of Alexander Ferguson, $5,000; and I notice that they have got one Grit, in the city of Montreal, I do not know how they got hold of him—he is a stockholder to the extent of $80,000. Well, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, he was a stranger to them, politically, and they took him in. I do not know if he has made any money by going in with them; from all I can learn he has lost about all he has put in. It is rather amusing to think that our Finance Minister who, by the way, was home at the Indian and Colonial exhibition in London all last year, and who, no doubt, was telling the people that he interviewed of the enormous resources of our North-West, the enormous amount of land, the grand ranching country we had there, without its equal on the continent of America, the grandest place for producing stock that possibly could be found—and while he was telling them all that, he was going secretly away down into the State of Texas and investing $21,000 himself. That plainly shows that he has no confidence in the country. If he had confidence in the ranching capacity of the North-West he would not have gone away down in Texas to invest his money. Now Sir, there is one peculiar thing. Of course these men are very lofty; if a lot of Grits were to invest their money in that way, there would be a terrible yell about it, and every Conservative paper in this country would publish that the Grits were untrue to their country, that they were not faithful to its interests, that they were taking their money to invest it in the United States instead of using it to develop the resources of their own country. Now, Sir, the First Minister of this Dominion has had a very peculiar career. He has held, or attempted to hold, the reins of power in this country for a great many years. Well, he has held them in a very peculiar way. His policy has been to distribute the loaves and fishes to his followers. His appeals have been to the needs and the greed of the people with regard to railway subsidies, public buildings, and advantages of one kind and another. And, Sir, he has had a following in this country, yes, quite a large one, I admit, a following that has followed him, not because of his statesmanship, not because of his ability, not because of his patriotism, but they have followed him from day to day, and year to year, and Parliament to Parliament, because they do eat of the loaves and fishes and are filled at the country's expense. They get advantages, offices, and positions of one kind and another, until our country to-day is filled with officials of this Government from one end to the other sucking the life blood out of the people of this Dominion. I say it is time we had an end of this thing, and I believe the day is not far distant when the people of this country will wake up and will declare that they will not put up any longer with the extravagant condition of things that exists in this country; and when they will call to account, very pointedly, the men who are at the head of the Government for the manner in which they have handled its public affairs. The First Minister has quite a record. He has erected a monument to his memory; his friends will not require to erect a monument to him as they did to Sir George Cartier. The right hon. gentleman has erected a monument of $150,000, 000 of national debt, under which the people will grind for years after we have ceased to take part in public discussions, a monument which generation after generation will feel the results of, and future generations will feel the extravagance that characterised the acts of the Government over which he presided, and in consequence of the manner in which public affairs were administered by his Government the people will be called upon the bear burdens and meet the consequences.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 50, respecting the North-West Territories. He said: I make this motion now for the purpose of having the Bill stand for a second reading at as early a day as convenient after the recess. The Bill is on the lines of the measure introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) when he was Minister of the Interior. It provides that the North-West Council shall have the character of a legislative assembly, having not less than 21 nor more than 25 members. A schedule of the constituencies is now under consideration, and is not yet attached to the Bill. It is proposed that the nominated members of the council shall cease; but as there are at present no legal men in the council, nor is there much chance of there being many legal men in the first assembly, it is proposed that the Government may have power to appoint certain legal experts, not exceeding three, who shall sit and assist in the drafting of Bills, and have the power of discussion but not the power of voting, something like the representative delegates from the territories in the United States Congress. That provision is intended to apply to the present term of the legislative assembly; it is hoped that in the second term some legal gentlemen may find their way into the assembly and enable us to do away with that provision. It is proposed to extend the term of the existence of the legislature from two or three years. The qualification will remain the same, household suffrage with the addition of an income suffrage. The Lieutenant Governor shall no longer sit with the council or assembly, but shall, as in the Provinces, be a separate estate, and the assembly will be presided over as this assembly is, by a Speaker. There is an extension of the powers of the assembly which I need not trouble the House with now, but the subject will be fully entered into when the Bill is under discussion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about executive councillors.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not propose to have executive councillors. There is a proposition of that kind in one of the petitions of the North-West Council which is before the House, but after consideration those gentlemen are opposed to it themselves. They say that it is really a retrogressive step, rather than one in advance. These are the principal features of the measure.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not aware that the resolutions of the North-West Council with respect to this matter have been placed before the House. If they have not been, I suppose the hon. gentleman will place them before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am sure the House will be glad if the hon. gentleman would afford us some further information on this important Bill. The people in that country have made considerable progress in number and in the development of the country, and a government a little more approaching that of a Province than that which at present exists there is no doubt required; but in all our Provinces we have parliamentary responsible government, and I do not understand from the hon. gentleman's observations how he proposes that the executive government shall be carried on. The proposition he has made relates purely to matters of legislation. Does he propose that the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories shall have the power of vetoing the measures of the Legislative Assembly of the Territories? Does he propose that when the Legislature meets and passes a law which it believes to be for the good of the Territories, within the limits assigned to it, the Governor in Council here shall have the power, by instruction, to disallow it? Does he propose that the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories shall have an executive council to advise him with regard to the administration of the affairs of the Territories? For you will observe that the powers possessed by the Governor in Council there now are not purely legislative powers, but administrative and executive powers as well. How are those administrative and executive powers to be exercised? Are they to be exercised by the Executive of the Territories, acting under the advice and approval of the majority of those whom the people have elected to represent them? Does the hon. gentleman propose they shall act on the advice which they may, from time to time, receive from the Government here? Now, I say that these are matters of the very first importance, and that before we are asked to take any step in advance in the legislative and governmental development of that country, we should note precisely what we are called upon to do; for it does seem me to be rather extraordinary to admit that the people of the territory are so far advanced, by way of organization, into a political and social community, as to make it necessary that they should have what may be considered a mature system devised for the purposes of legislation, and yet that that the legislative and administrative affairs of the country should be in the hands of an irresponsible body. Certainly the power of legislation and administration should go hand in hand. If the community are entitled, and I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman is doing right in recognising that they are entitled to complete legislative control over those matters which are exclusively assigned to them, they should have equally independent control over the executive and administrative affairs of the territory, within the same limits. They should be made commensurate with the legislative authority; they should be governmental to the same extent, and it would be a wholly anomalous condition of things for the executive and administrative affairs to be directed, not in consonance with the views of the majority of those whom the people have returned to the Legislature, but should be controlled by instructions given, from time to time, to the Lieutenant Governor from Ottawa. That would be simply Downing Street over again. It would be simply introducing into the North-West Territories precisely that condition of things which existed in Upper and Lower Canada before responsible Government was established. They had legislative bodies that could represent the people, but they had an executive Government that represented Downing Street, and it would be rather a retrograde step to introduce any analogous system of government into the North-West Territories. I am sure the House will be anxious to know precisely what the hon. gentleman proposes to do in this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is perhaps not the time to discuss in extenso the various questions which the hon. gentleman has raised. In the first place, I must tell the hon. gentleman that in the North-West they have a most holy horror of responsible government. The representations are, I may say, without any exception, against the premature introduction of responsible government. If the hon. gentlemen were in the position of the Minister of Interior, he would find that the one cry is: do not at all at present give us a government of that kind. I take it the assembly, although sitting separate from the Government, will have the same administrative as well as legislative powers which they had when under the name of a council. The relations between the Lieutenant Governor there and the Government here will continue to be the same as they were before this Bill was introduced—

Mr. MILLS. They cannot be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—or the same as between the Lieutenant Governors of the Provinces and the Governor General. All these are important matters, and I am glad the hon. gentleman has called attention to these points. They will be discussed more conveniently after the Bill is in the hands of the hon. members.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can understand that a certain class of the people in the North-West should have a holy horror of responsible government, but, in my opinion, the experience of the past few years shows the people there should have a holy horror of bureaucratic government. I am glad this question has come up for discussion. It is a very important one, not only for the people of the North-West, but for the people of the whole of Canada, who are interested in seeing that administration of public affairs in the North-West should be a little different in the future from what it has been in the past.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Now the Governor votes with the council, and if he happens to be in the minority he is outvoted and has to submit?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman proposes, by this Bill, to separate the Governor from the legislative body. What is his position? Has he any voice at all in the legislative assembly?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that he has much. I take it that the veto by the Lieutenant-Governor is like the veto by the Queen. It is, in fact, gone.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Queen is advised.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The utmost we could do, and I think it ought to be reserved to him, is to reserve that power.

Mr. LAURIER. Has he to sanction the Acts passed by the Legislature?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a veto.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Her Majesty sanctions all the Bills, but she never has in Her long life exercised the right to veto.

Mr. LAURIER. She has it in esse if not in posse.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Her Majesty is advised by those who sit in both Houses. Now there is nobody responsible for the legislation. The Governor exercises no control whatever in the initiation of measures in this assembly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not now.

Motion agreed to; Bill read first time.

REPORT.

Mr. CARLING laid on the Table, Report of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1887.

RUSSELL ELECTION.

Mr. LAURIER. I now beg to renew the motion which I made yesterday:

That the warrant issued by Mr. Speaker for a new writ of election for the electoral district of the County of Russell, Ontario, as appears in the Journals of this House, on the 23rd January last, be withdrawn, and that Mr. Speaker do forthwith issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After considering, I have come to the conclusion that this motion ought to carry. The House knows that I consistently and persistently have pressed that such matters in connection with elections should go to the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and in two cases, the one the rather celebrated case of Queen's County, New Brunswick, and the other that of the County of Kent, there were points of law raised that had to be settled, and we considered, and the majority of the House considered, that whenever a question of that kind arose, it ought certainly to be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. WELSH. May I ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries when the papers in connection with the Northern Light will be laid upon the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. In reference to Captain Finderson?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. They will be ready for the hon. gentleman after Easter.

Mr. WELSH. Immediately after?

Mr. FOSTER. Nearly so.

Mr. WELSH. I suppose they are under consideration.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

On order to resume adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879, and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other, and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. MILLS. Before we resume the adjourned debate I propose to make some observations. I have on two or three occasions asked the Government when they proposed to introduce their measures relating to parliamentary elections, voters' lists and controverted elections. All those are referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and last week, in response to an enquiry which was made to the Government, the Minister of Justice informed the House that these measures would be brought down early this week. If I understood the statement of the First Minister yesterday, those measures are not to be brought down until after the vacation. That seems to me to be a very highly objectionable course. The Government must have considered the present law to be very defective when they proposed to amend it, and, when they so advised His Excellency on the 23rd February, it must be taken for granted, that Ministers had, at that time, marked out the lines they proposed to follow in amending those Acts. We have been in Session nearly a month. We know that our usual Sessions last about three months. Up to this time, we have no knowledge of the changes which are proposed in the law, and that is a procedure which has never been adopted in England. I have on two or three occasions before brought under the attention of Parliament the practice in England in relation to the amendments proposed to the Franchise Act, the Representation of the People Act, and other important measures, and I have shown that in fifty years there has scarcely been an instance in which those important measures, which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne are not brought down within the first three weeks of the Session. We know that in England the Session extends for six or seven months, so that several months are allowed for the country to consider the matters which are submitted to the House. That is not the course adopted by the hon. gentleman. In this country we are peculiarly situated. In England the members receive no sessional indemnity and no salary for their attendance. Here it would be impossible to constitute Parliament in that way. Here members receive an indemnity which is supposed to cover the expenses to which as members they are subject, and we know that our usual period for a Session is three months, and that the indemnity allowed to members has reference to the ordinary period of a Session. What is the plan the leader of the Government has adopted during the whole continuance of this Parliament? The hon. gentleman keeps back important measures in regard to which there may be differences of opinion on both sides of the House and between the different parties in the country—he keeps them back until near the period for the conclusion of the Session, and then they are submitted to Parliament, not with the view of giving the country an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the contents of those measures, but simply to convert this House into a mere registry of the Government, whose business it is not to criticise, not to supervise, not to exercise an efficient control over the legislation submitted to it, but simply to approve of what hon. gentlemen choose to submit to us.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman indicate the nature of the motion he proposes to move?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I propose to move the adjournment of this House. I was going on to say, when you, Sir, interrupted me by your observations, that the course pursued by the Administration was altogether at variance with the principles of responsible government. The hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches are a committee of Parliament, they form a permanent standing committee, possessing for the time the confidence of the Crown and the confidence of the people's representatives, and it is the business of those hon. gentlemen, acting on behalf of Parliament, to advise Parliament in reference to the measures they propose to submit, before Parliament votes the supplies which are necessary to carry on the works of the country. We know the course that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have pursued with reference to these measures before. Has any hon. member in this House forgotten the Gerrymander Bill, the circumstances under which it originated, and the solution which the First Minister and his colleagues proposed in order to secure to themselves a majority of the representatives from Ontario by the vote of 1884. We know what he did at that time, and we know also what he did in regard to the alteration of the franchise, when he proposed to confer upon the wards of the Government the controlling influence in certain constituencies; and we know what he did when he took the control of the voters' lists out of the hands of the municipalities, and we know the result. We know that under the old system it cost the Government nothing to obtain the voters' lists. The hon. gentleman took that matter out of the hands of the local authorities, and, in the eleventh week of the Session, he introduced a Bill which occupied the attention of the House for three months afterwards; we know that he would consent to very few amendments being made, and that, after he succeeded in carrying that measure at the end of a Session of nearly six months, he found that it cost upwards of $400,000 to prepare the voters' lists. That was the result, and, while it was contrary to the promises of the hon. gentleman, it was consonant with the predictions made on this side of the House as to the result of that Bill, that the hon. gentleman did not allow that measure to continue in force, but last Session introduced a suspensory clause, providing that last year no voters' lists should be prepared. At present there is no provision by which these voters' lists can be prepared. There is no law by which it can be done. Yet we know that there is a variation of about 10 per cent. in every constituency every year. That being the case, I think that, at the period of the Session at which we have arrived, we ought to know what proposition the Government has to submit to the House in this respect. The country is entitled to be consulted in regard to it. Some of the supporters of the hon. gentleman, when discussing this motion put forward by my hon. friend as an abstract proposition, have said that we have no mandate to alter the fiscal policy of the country. I would like to know what mandate the hon. gentleman has had to legislate in regard to these two matters which he promises to deal with this Session, in regard to elections. What is the policy adopted in England? Does any Government there propose to adopt radical changes in the representation of the people without giving an opportunity to the people of expressing their views on the subject? What were the views expressed by Mr. Disraeli when Mr. Gladstone introduced his measure to disestablish the Irish church? He said, We are entitled to allow a certain length of time to elapse, in order that this Bill may be sent to the country, and that we may have the views of the country on the subject. What opportunity does the hon. gentleman give us, in regard to the policy which he is adopting, to consult the country on the measures affecting the representation of the people which he proposes to submit? My constituents are intelligent men, and I daresay that those who returned the First Minister are intelligent men. Have they no opinions or views on this subject? Are they not entitled to be considered? Are they not competent to advise the hon. gentlemen upon the subject of the measures which they propose? Why, Sir, no Ministry in England would think of carrying through an important measure of this sort without giving the country an opportunity of considering its merits, without giving those who choose to express opinions upon the subject, an opportunity of consulting their representatives. But the hon. gentleman, from the first time he took his seat on the Treasury benches to this hour, has denied to the country an opportunity of considering any important measures submitted to Parliament. Why, Sir, when the hon. gentleman proposed his National Policy, he proposed a resolution here and was prepared to go to the country upon it. Why, then, is he so much averse to giving the country an opportunity of knowing what he proposes to do upon this important matter? I say that the course the hon. gentleman is taking is one which converts parliamentary government into a farce. I say it is one which denies to the representatives of the people an opportunity of exercising that controlling influence over the policy of the Administration which is necessary to the preservation of parliamentary government. Why, Sir, if those hon. gentlemen who sit behind the First Minister and support him, did their duty to the members of the Government and to the country, they would refuse to sustain the Government, no matter what might be the character of the measures, unless they introduced them at such a time as to give them an opportunity of fairly considering them. Why have these hon. gentlemen had commissions issued in their case, and put their judgment under the control of the First Minister? If not, how is it that they have not failed to remonstrate with him and with those associated with him in the Government? On this very important matter, I will move Sir, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am very sorry, indeed, that the mere circumstance that the hon. gentleman will not have an opportunity of spending Good Friday in considering the Electoral Franchise Bill has induced him to occupy the time of the House in making an attack upon the existing law, upon the subject of the National Policy, and upon everything else that was remotely removed from the subject on which he rose to speak. With regard to the hon. gentleman's contention that we ought to follow English practice with regard to the introduction of those Bills, I would remind the hon. gentleman that procedure there in connection with the time at which measures are introduced, and the time which is given for their consideration, are wholly different from the condition of things in this country. It is, as the hon. gentleman says, not uncommon in that country for Government matters to be introduced at a very early period of the Session; it is not at all uncommon, in that country, to see Bills, after having been so introduced, stand over from year to year because Parliament had not time to consider them, or any important business which the Government desire to bring forward. The condition of things during the present Session, in which the hon. gentleman's indignation is more particularly excited, is that never in the history of this Parliament has Government business been so far advanced as it has during the past four weeks. The time of the House, not only on the Government days, but on nearly every private members' day, has been fully occupied with the consideration of the business which the Government had presented. In regard to the Bills which are indicated in the Governor General's speech, there are nine mentioned, four of which are now before the House, and not one of them has the House had time to take up and dispose of; and yet the hon. gentleman makes a grave complaint against the Government because the other five are not laid upon the Table of the House waiting the consideration which the House has not time to give them. I think that the fact that the Railway Bill, the Bill relating to the North-West Territories, the Bill mentioned in the Speech relating to the law in Manitoba, and the Bill relating to the procedure in Criminal Cases, are before the House, removes the hon. gentleman's complaint altogether from the province of reasonableness. Now, with regard to the hon. gentleman's complaint with regard to the Franchise Act, I think the hon. gentleman was led, by his desire to find fault, into a mistake, when he assured the House that there was at the present time no machinery by which a voters' list could be established. The hon. gentleman by this time has reflected that there is a full and complete enactment by which a voter's list can be established during the present year, and, therefore, that criticism, made on the ground of finding fault with the Government for not having brought forward earlier the Franchise Bill, certainly appears to be of little weight. It is true, as the hon. gentleman has said, that when the House approached the subject a few days ago, I expressed the view that early in the present week these Bills would be ready to lay upon the Table of this House; they are not so ready, and as the First Minister has informed the House, they cannot be presented until after the recess, when I hope they will be laid upon the Table the first day after the re-opening. Until then I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be more decorous to reserve his reproaches about radical measures, and his discussion of what these matters are to be, and the necessity of submitting them to the people at the polls, because I venture to say that when they are introduced, they will be found to be measures that even hon. gentlemen cannot ask to have delayed until the opinions of the voters have been expressed upon them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As a matter of fact I think the hon. Minister of Justice is seriously misinformed when he supposes that the Government business is more advanced in the present Session than it has been in former years. Unless my memory is altogether at fault, I could refer him to two or three years, at least, under the presidency of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) when we had passed pretty nearly all the estimates before the fifth week in the Session, besides bringing down a very considerable number of Government measures to a vote. Now, it appears to me that reason and common sense, and the convenience of members on both sides, are wholly on the side of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mill). There is no doubt whatever, that it would be a saving of the time of the House, that it would save us very many prolonged and inconvenient sessions—at the close of the ordinary Session—if full information was given in good time of the measures which the Government proposed to introduce. Sir, when measures are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, we have a right to suppose that they are ready for introduction. Those measures, a reference to which is put into His Excellency's mouth, ought to be so far advanced that they merely required to be printed and placed into the hands of members. That is, as both the First Minister and the Minister of Justice know, in conformity with English practice and precedent, and, as I have said, with common sense, and the convenience of members. Now, Sir, it is doubly so in this case. The hon. gentlemen summoned us together, in the first instance, for the end of January, a proper thing to do, a very good time for the meeting of the House. Then, for reasons connected, I presume, with the fishery negotiations at Washington, they put us off until the 23rd February. Now, they were doubly bound, under these circumstances, to have all their measures ready. It will be, as everybody knows, extremely inconvenient if we are thrown into the summer, as we have been once or twice, inconvenient to hon. gentlemen on that side quite as much as to hon. gentlemen on this. Therefore it is exceedingly to be regretted, I think, that the hon. gentlemen, with their customary habits of procrastination, were not ready in the first or second week of the Session to inform us what they proposed to do. Now, there is an additional very strong reason which justifies my hon. friend in calling attention to the state of things. Every one knows that there are an unusual number of very important questions which will probably occupy a very large proportion of the time of this House, over and above our ordinary and necessary work. We have in the first place, I presume, to discuss the fisheries treaty and the negotiations there anent, a subject which will undoubtedly occupy the House for some days. We have the budget to be discussed, a matter that cannot be got rid of in an afternoon, even if hon. gentlemen, as indicated, do not propose any considerable changes in the tariff, because, unless I am very much mistaken, it will be found, whether changes in the tariff are made or no that very heavy additional liabilities are likely to be inflicted upon the people of this country before we separate. The hon. gentlemen have stated from their own places in this House that they expect a deputation from Newfoundland, and I presume there will be a discussion, an important discussion, with respect to the proposals those gentlemen may bring. And there is, as everybody knows, a very important question indeed, involving probably many other important questions, the action to be taken with respect to the Province of Manitoba. I forbear to speak about that at this moment, but I have no doubt a good deal will have to be said on both sides of the House before that matter is disposed of, and therefore it is exceedingly important that we should have in our hands, at the earliest moment, the Government measures, unless, indeed, the Government are prepared to assure us, as the Minister of Justice, in a sort of way, did, though not very emphatically, that those measures, when brought down, will be of a very perfunctory nature, or, at all events, of a character which does not involve any important changes. I agree with my hon. friend in thinking it is a very great mistake, and a thing very much to be regretted, that the Government, when they introduce measures into the Speech from the Throne, do not, at the earliest date, place the House and the country too in possession of their intentions in detail.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Mr. Speaker, in resuming the discussion of the question before the House I promise one thing, and that is, that I will be brief. I will not attempt to follow the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in his periphrastics in search of scandals or of evidence to show that distress prevails in the country. I will merely take up a few of the points and leave the House to judge of the balance. I hope in the few words I have to say that I will be able to avoid anything that has heretofore been gone over in this House, and I think hon. members will agree with me that this is a very difficult task at this particular stage of the debate. I may just say here, as it may be referred to by hon. gentlemen who may follow me, that a meeting in favor of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, which means one and the same thing, was held in my county a few days ago. I have looked at the paper, and I find all the men at that meeting, with the exception of one, were opponents of mine at the last election, and would continue forever to be opponents of mine. They are an unforgiving people and they remain Grit, and will eternally remain Grit, I suppose. I found, however, one of those Reformers, a strong and substantial and influential one, raised his voice against Commercial Union, and notwithstanding the fact that that meeting was almost exclusively composed of Reformers, they only carried the motion by a three-fourths majority. I will say, before going further, that in my section of the country and throughout the Niagara district we are large growers of fruit of all kinds, and only two years ago I was requested by the Reformers and Conservatives in the counties of Lincoln and Welland to endeavor if possible to have further protection placed upon the fruits grown in that district. I may say also that I was petitioned in 1883, the first Session I sat in this House, to see if an increased duty could not be placed upon oats and coarse grains, in order to protect the people of those counties against the importation of coarse and cheap grains from the Western States, brought down by vessels and thrown upon the markets on the Welland Canal. So I am not afraid at this time, or at any other time, to discuss this question. It was said in my county that I had better wait to see how the cat jumped before I came to a conclusion on the question. On any matter affecting my county I have an opinion of my own, and unless I can lead the people of my county I will retire from my seat in this House. I do not believe in swinging on the coat tails of public opinion in a matter of this kind; every man ought to have an opinion and express that opinion fearlessly, and I am not afraid of this question. I might just say here that I am in favor of a reciprocity treaty as will be fair to both contracting parties. I say we should have a voice in determining what that treaty should be, and it should be a treaty that would be fair and honest to every particular department of trade and agriculture in this country. I am entirely opposed to unrestricted reciprocity, as I believe it would not only injure the manufacturing industries of the country, but would injure the farming industry as well. I will endeavor to compare those two industries before I close, and I think hon. gentlemen will concur with me that the manufacturing industry is not even second to the agricultural industry—and I am an agriculturist myself—in point of money and value. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) talked of the scrap book, and said the Government ought to make an appropriation to buy the scrap book and burn it. I undertake to say that every hon. gentleman opposite would vote for that appropriation. It is the most inconvenient thing for hon. gentlemen opposite, because they never have a solid opinion upon any subject but are always wavering, they are found on every twig of the bush when it suits their particular purpose, and accordingly they do not wish their acts put in record. But the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who spoke last night, has a scrap book containing the history of every hon. member opposite, as well as hon. members on this side of the House, and he is always ready and prepared to bring it forward. The hon. member for Wellington took occasion to speak of a certain timber limit, and he said that that timber limit was the cause of the election of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) in 1887. I can tell the hon. member for Wellington that if during thirty years he continues to represent his present constituency and then stands half as well in the estimation of the people of his county as does the hon. member for Lincoln, he will have a good record. There is no man in this House who has fought a bolder and nobler party battle than the hon. member for Lincoln, and for that reason he has opprobriums thrown across the floor at him, and he is admired by his constituents and by every one in the Niagara district, in my constituency and in the adjoining constituency, as a fearless opponent and one worthy of his position, and he will adorn the Upper House should he get there. I will now follow rapidly a few of the observations made by the hon. member for Wellington. The first point is with respect to increasing the burdens of the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite now complain that our importations are decreasing. If duties place a burden upon the people and our importations are decreasing, the burdens of the people must be decreasing as well. Now, Sir, he speaks of "combines," and I will run over that subject hastily. Why, on the other side of the line, as to the matter of combines, it is well known that the combines regulate the whole trade of the country, and yet this is the country the hon. gentlemen invite us to go to. The hon. gentleman refers "to the poor innocent farmers of Canada." The only evidence I see of the "innocence" of the farmers of this country is the presence of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), in this House. I have remarked, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate that not a solitary word can be said in derogation of the people of the United States but that gentlemen on the other side of the House jump up to defend and explain away those remarks. That is very strange. They are presenting such a spectacle as is not to be found in any other legislative assembly in the civilised world at the present age. It is a strange spectacle to see nearly one-half the representatives of the people standing upon the floor of their own Parliament, ready and prepared to refute any little thing that may be said in favor of their own country, and standing up in defence of a neighboring country. Such a spectacle has never been seen before and never probably will be seen again. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) rises in this House and apologises for the land sales in the State of Dakota, and he says that there must be something wrong and that Dakota is a haven of rest and joy instead of what it has been shown to be. Let me just give an answer to one of his arguments. He says the farmers of this country pay the duty upon horses. I will deal with that question further on, but I would just ask this question in answer to his assertion. If the farmers of this country pay the duty upon all horses exported to the United States, how is it that the United States Government found it necessary to make half the horses imported, free of duty? Was it for the purpose of saving the people of this country from paying the duty? I think not. It was for the purpose of saving their own people from paying the duty, or they would not have taken the duty off. That I believe is an answer to this argument. Now, Sir, it is said that the United States have reduced their debt, and I will deal with this question further on, but I assert here that they have reduced their national debt at the expense of increasing their State debts, and I will show that. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has made a calculation upon the farmer selling a colt and a steer and matters of that kind. I want to know how many farmers find a market in the United States for colts and steers? Nine-tenths of all the products of our country are sold in our own markets, and I will show that there is no market in the United States for the products of the farmers of this country. The hon. gentleman contends that farming produce is reduced in value, but he must know that this is due to the reduced prices on articles of export in the Liverpool market, the only market there is for the produce of the farms in North America. This is not due to the National Policy, and I will be able to prove my statement. He further contends that the farmers in Canada are not in as good a position as the farmers in the States. I will prove from the statistics of Mr. Blue's report that the agricultural interests of this country have grown to a proportion that is not equalled even by the farmers of the United States. We will take Mr. Blue's report, in preference to the tale told by an hon. member in this House, of a particular farm which he drove somebody out to see and which did not suit the somebody because perhaps the percentage required on the sale was too small. I want to ask the hon. gentleman also whether the farmers in the United States are not in a worse condition than they were in a few years ago? He must know that throughout the known world complaints are now made in all agricultural industries that the farmer is not in the position that he was a few years ago, and that this is simply because of the over-production of farm products, which has reduced the values, and as the values are reduced so the value of the farming industry must reduce. The hon. gentleman tells us that 150 people have gone from his county to the city of Toronto, and that Toronto's population and wealth is enhanced by reason of the population coming from the surrounding country. He must remember that if we had unrestricted reciprocity those 150 people would have gone to the United States, and that 300,000 people in this country who are engaged as artisans and mechanics would have gone there also. He complains that Toronto has grown at the expense of Listowel, but were it not for the National Policy some States would have grown at the expense of Listowel and of Toronto as well. The hon. gentleman, as well as the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), spoke of the markets in Buffalo, Detroit and Rochester, but they must be aware that there is more produce grown in the neighborhood of those cities than those people can consume, and that they are even exporting almost every article that the farmer of this country has to sell. Why, Sir, they can get wheat cheaper at Cleveland and Buffalo from the city of Chicago than they can get it from any point 100 miles from the frontier in the Province of Ontario. It only costs $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents a bushel to place wheat from the elevators in Chicago into the city of Buffalo and you cannot send wheat from the city of Toronto to the city of Buffalo at that price. Neither can you send it from the city of London, nor from any point in Ontario to the city of Buffalo at so low a rate. They can send it far cheaper to the city of New York when they get in the route of the canal boats. The hon. gentleman has also spoken about oats and butter, and I will tell you my experience of what the export of those articles means in a border country. When I left home oats were selling in the city of Buffalo at 42 cents and I had to pay 53 cents in my own town. As regards butter, in Niagara Falls we had to pay 25 cents during the winter season and I know of others in the township of Berth whose names I need not give who were selling their butter for 24 cents. When I went down there I told them that they could get 25 cents for their butter in Niagara Falls and they were surprised to hear that they could get more there for it than they could in Buffalo. There are a great many other articles of our commerce which are exactly in the same position. I can tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that there is a higher price for the produce of the farmer in Canada than there is to be found in the United States. There is more raised with an easier access to the markets of the States east of Indiana than would feed the whole people of the Eastern States, and they have even a surplus to spare. So that from Indiana east they are large exporters of everything that the farmer produces in this country, and we can find at home a more profitable market for our produce than we could in the United States. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), said that the right hon. the leader of the Government had built up a monument that would stand in history as a "disgrace" and all the rest of it by the debt of the country. If the hon. gentleman had been candid enough he would have told us that \$109,000,000 of that debt which he says has been heaped up by the right hon. gentleman was taken by him, from the shoulders of the Provinces, and at the time when it was paying an interest of 5 per cent. by the Provinces, and he has placed it to the debt of the Dominion at an interest of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. thereby saving over a million dollars to the people of this country. I wish there were forty monuments of that kind and it would be all the better for the country generally. I do not intend to deal with this public debt question just now. But, Sir, I say that provincial debts which we assumed relieved all the Provinces of about 5 per cent. interest which they could only realise on at about par, and the Dominion has taken those debts and at the same time relieved the Provinces, while paying only $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. To-day the bonds are selling at 116 in the European market. Hon. gentlemen talk about deterioration, about woe, despair, and desolation in this country; but the most sensitive test to be found in the world as to the prosperity and financial condition of the country is in the money markets of the world; and a complete answer to all the speeches made on the other side of the House is this, that the credit of Canada is continually rising in the money market of the world—that in the opinion of people who have not an interest to get into office in this country, we are steadily advancing and increasing in prosperity. The hon. member for North Wellington ought to know this, if he knows anything, that the name of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will live in the hearts of a grateful people when the memory of his detractors will be forever forgotten, and history will give him the credit of having made a country. Now, the hon. gentleman spoke about the Intercolonial Railway, and, although he was very minute in all his facts regarding everything that might damage his country and injure the Government of this country, he was not so particular in his facts about the management of the Intercolonial Railway when the hon. member for East York had control of the affairs of this country. He forgot to tell the House that instead of its running to pay expenses at that time, there was a deficit of about three-quarters of a million on the running expenses.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The hon. member for North Wellington said last night that the right hon. the leader of the Government kept himself in power, not by his statesmanship or by any virtues he possessed, but by buying all of us who are sitting on this side of the House. I should say, judging from the hon. gentleman's conduct in this House, that if I wanted to get a supporter for money, I would go across there. When he stands up in this House, and accuses others of that sort of thing, I say he would be one of the first men who would offer himself for sale, and his price would be small.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to order. You were good enough, or the hon. gentleman who occupied your place last night was good enough to interrupt the hon. member for North Wellington a great many times for far less offence against the decorum of the House than the hon. gentleman has committed. I call upon you to press the hon. gentleman to withdraw his words.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). If I have used language that is unparliamentary, and I suppose I have, I will gladly withdraw it, but the provocation was very great. Now, I said I would endeavor to compare the product of the farm with the product of the factory in the United States, and I will take the year 1880, for it is the last year for which I could get returns. The total value of farm products for that year was $3,764,743,327. The capital of the factories was $2,790,223,506; the number of hands was 2,738,930; and the total amount of wages paid was $947,919,674, or nearly a thousand millions a year paid to the factory hands of the United States. The value of the products of the factories of the United States was $5,369,667,706, less raw material, say one-third, $1,789,889,235, making the net products of the factories $3,579,778,531, about equal in value to the products of the farm. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen say that the factory is of very little consequence in this country. I say it is of great consequence, and I think I shall be able to show that it is. The net product of the factories of the United States is equal to $65 per head of the total population of 55,000,000. The product of labor is the only source of wealth in any country, whether that labor is expended on the farm, in the factory, in the mine, or anywhere else. Now, let us compare the product of the factory in Canada with the product of the farm. The total value of the field crops in the Province of Ontario in 1886 was $110,764,623; for the whole Dominion, say three times as much, which is fair calculation, making $332,293,869. Now, let us see what the factory has produced. In the same year the total value of the product of the factory was $160,000,000, less raw material, say one-third, $153,333,333; leaving the net product of the factory at $316,666,667, or within $6,000,000 of the total value of the field crops. Now, we find that the amount of wages paid to the hands employed in the factories of this country was no less than $85,000,000. What does that amount of money represent? It represents a market for the products of the farm; but hon. gentlemen opposite desire to transfer that $85,000,000 across the line, along with all the capital invested in factories, and they ask the farmers of this country to sell their products across the line instead of to people in this country. Now, the total farm population of Canada is estimated at 3,400,000. Thus we find that the wages paid by the factories amount to $26 per head of the farming population; that is to say, the wages paid annually to the factory employes secure a market to every farmer in this country of from $160 to $200 a year, which is about the total value of the products he is able to spare off his farm. Now, the $85,000,000 which is paid to the factory hands is about one-fourth of the total value of the field crops of the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite say that we have a market in the United States, and I propose to deal with that subject in a few words. In 1886 the United States exported:

|--|----------------------|
| Animals..... | $ 12,518,660 |
| Breadstuffs..... | 125,848,558 |
| Beef products..... | 18,599,017 |
| Pork products..... | 58,072,932 |
| Dairy products..... | 10,876,466 |
| Imitation butter..... | 93,363 |
| The oil..... | 2,954,954 |
| Clover, timothy and other seeds..... | 1,949,990 |
| Fruits..... | 2,967,801 |
| Hay, hides, skins, honey, hops, eggs, oil cakes and meal, broilers, vegetables and wool..... | 12,741,259 |
| Total..... | $246,621,000 |

Now, this is the market that hon. gentlemen tell us will be of great value to the farmers of this country; yet the great majority of these articles are raised within easier and cheaper access to the eastern markets than the products of the farms of Ontario. Transportation from Chicago is as cheap or cheaper. Canada's exports of sheep to other countries during 1887 was as follows:—

|--------------------------|------------------|
| To Great Britain..... | $ 568,433 |
| Germany..... | 20,975 |
| Belgium..... | 368 |
| British West Indies..... | 1,285 |
| British Guiana..... | 580 |
| Newfoundland..... | 19,017 |
| St. Pierre..... | 7,227 |
| Total..... | $617,685 |

The United States took $74,282, or very little more than we exported to other countries. Now, Sir, take horned cattle. Our exports for the year 1887 were as follows:—

|-----------------------|--------------------|
| To Great Britain..... | $5,334,375 |
| Germany..... | 23,040 |
| Belgium..... | 71,000 |
| Newfoundland..... | 133,408 |
| St. Pierre..... | 26,619 |
| Total..... | $5,588,442 |

To the United States, $887,756; or we sent to the United States only 15½ per cent. of our total export, and we are asked to drop a market to which we sent 5½ million dollars worth in order to accept a market to which we only sent $887,000 worth. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to make us believe that every horse we sent to the United States was charged with a duty of 20 per cent. Well, I find that the United States imported in 1886 $6,944,000 worth of animals, and out of that $6,944,000, we find that $3,330,595 worth was free of duty, or one-half of the importation of animals into the United States is now free of duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, when they make their calculations, should take this into account. And, Sir, the other half we sent through in bond and otherwise to the European markets. Now, the United States is not a market for the Canadian farmer, but it is the home of the middlemen, who buy in the Canadian market for transshipment to Liverpool. We want these middlemen to reside in the cities of Montreal, Quebec and Toronto and not in the cities of the United States. Let them be stationed in our cities and buy the products of our farms, and in place of sending our products to the United States for the Liverpool market, we will ship them direct from Canada and have here all the profit and advantage which now goes to the middlemen in New York. I desire for a few moments to show this House how the debt of the United States stands, because in this paradise, in this promised land, we ought to see how things stand before we take the leap we are invited to make. My opinion is that should we take this leap, we would find that we had jumped out of the fryingpan into the fire. If we are highly taxed here, we would still be more highly taxed there, and under unrestricted reciprocity, we would have to resort to direct taxation in order to pay the interest on our public debt and meet our other expenditure. Let us see how the debt of the promised land stands at present:

| In 1880..... | |
| Net State debt..... | $234,436,261 |
| Net County debt..... | 122,877,686 |
| Net municipal debt..... | 698,270,199 |
| Total, 1880..... | $1,056,584,146 |
| Total, 1870..... | 868,676,758 |
| Increase in 10 years..... | $187,907,388 |

Or an increase of 22 per cent. in 10 years. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the increase in our debt, but it is well known that our Provinces are very little in debt, and that we have but little municipal debt, while the municipal debt of the United States, the county debt and the State debt, in 1880 was $21.07 per head in every State and Territory of the Union, every cent of interest on which has to be paid by direct taxation. Let us take the debt of the different States. The public debt of the different States is shown by the following statement:—

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman please inform us where those statistics are taken from?

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). From the Bureau of Statistics to be found in Washington.

Mr. CHARLTON. The debt of New Jersey, as given last year, was $1,496,000.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Let the hon. gentleman look at page 305.

Mr. CHARLTON. The discrepancy is so great that I thought proper to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to it, and it would be more satisfactory if the hon. gentleman would give us the statistics for 1887.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. Here is another report of the same kind.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The United States raised for State purposes in 1886 by direct taxation no less than $62,773,366 including the Territories. This amounts to $1.12 per head of the population of 55,000,000, and I think that is a fair calculation for the population of that year. We pay about 80 cents per head of the population to the Provinces for provincial purposes. Then, if we take that $1.12 a head for their taxes for State purposes, and add to it the 80 cents which we pay for provincial purposes, it will make a difference of $1.92 per head for every man, woman and child of our people, in our favor. Take our population at 5,000,000; that would amount to $9,000,000 in favor of our people, which would allow this country to pay off her national debt at that rate, in case we would submit to the taxation which is placed upon the people of the United States. Together with that, it will be remembered that the tariff of the United States is somewhere between 20 and 30 per cent. higher than the tariff in Canada, so, if the tariff in this country is, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, the measure of the taxation of the people of this country, they must add 20 or 30 per cent. which the tariff of the United States is higher than ours to the taxation of the United States, as well as the amount of $1.92 per head, and what do we find in that case? The State of New York—and the hon. gentleman will find it in that red book, and it is the highest authority on this continent—raised in 1886 for State purposes $9,512,813. Placing the population of that State at 5,000,000, that would be equal to $1.90 a head of the population. Now, compare that with the Province of Ontario. The State of New York is taxed by money taken out of the pockets of the people directly by the tax collector $1.90 per head. Add to that 90 cents which we receive, and that would make a difference in favor of the people of Ontario of

$2.70 per head for every man, woman and child. The comparison with the State of Maine is about the same, with the exception that it is more favorable to Canada. The taxation there was about $2 per head of the population taken from their pockets and collected by the tax collector, so that would make a difference in favor of our people of $2.80 per head. We can find, in that red book which the hon. gentleman has, what the taxes were for State purposes in 1886, the amount raised on real and personal property, and the hon. gentleman will find that it is as follows:—

| Amount of Taxes. | | |
|---------------------|-------------|------------------------|
| New York..... | $9,512,813 | 3 mills on the dollar. |
| Maine | 1,301,270 | 4 do |
| New Hampshire | 400,000 | 1½ do |
| Vermont..... | 371,697 | 1 do |
| Massachusetts ... | 2,005,937 | 0½ do |
| Connecticut | 1,463,328 | 1½ do |
| Colorado..... | 534,228 | 4 do |
| California | 3,861,644 | 5 do |
| Arkansas | 966,000 | 4 do |
| Alabama..... | 1,041,898 | 6½ do |
| Illinois | 3,000,000 | 4½ do |
| Iowa | 1,148,396 | 2½ do |
| Nebraska..... | 1,117,934 | 7½ do |
| Nevada | 516,861 | 9 do |
| Kansas | 1,082,477 | 4½ do |
| Minnesota | 658,998 | 1½ do |

This shows an average taxation of 4 mills on the dollar in these States. Then, take the taxation of the American cities which the hon. gentleman will also find in that red book, and we find this as the amount of taxation on each $100 of taxation:

|------------------------------------|--------|
| 1883 Chicago..... | $3.37 |
| 1883 Jersey City..... | 2.90 |
| 1883 Louisville, Kentucky..... | 2.35 |
| 1882 Lewiston, Maine..... | 2.25 |
| 1883 Milwaukee..... | 2.50 |
| 1883 Minneapolis..... | 1.92 |
| 1883 New York..... | 2.25 |
| 1882 Peoria, Illinois..... | 5.76 |
| 1883 Philadelphia..... | |
| 1882 Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania..... | 2.92 |
| 1883 Portland, Maine..... | 2.15 |
| 1882 Poughkeepsie, N.Y..... | 2.53 |
| 1883 Rochester, N.Y..... | 2.86 |
| 1882 Schenectady, N.Y..... | 3.00 |
| 1882 Savannah, Georgia..... | 3.00 |
| 1882 Springfield, Illinois..... | 3.00 |
| 1883 Troy, N.Y..... | 4.16 |
| 1882 Topeka, Kansas..... | 2.75 |
| 1883 Toledo, Ohio..... | 2.50 |
| 1882 Scranton, Pennsylvania..... | 2.40 |

All this is for municipal purposes. You may add 4 mills on the dollar, which is the average for State purposes, and you will find that the taxation in the United States is from 3 to 4 per cent. of the total value of the real and personal property. If we would submit to that heavy taxation, we could easily pay off our national debt in a short time. I want now to give you the United States market, and the hon. gentleman will find that statement in the same book, comparing the twelve years of the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty, and the twelve years succeeding the Reciprocity Treaty. I will take the statistics as given in the city of New York, giving the lowest and highest prices in the years named:

The hon. gentleman can get the statistics in that book; let him go over all the figures and he will find my calculation is correct; you can take any year you like; you can take the average of 12 years succeeding reciprocity, and the 12 years of reciprocity, and the former period gives a higher price for the total products of the country than the 12 years of reciprocity, with the exception of one article; in the article of wheat there is a difference of 5 cents only. I was going to deal with the value of farm property, but I will not do so now. I think, you will agree with me, Sir, that I have given you figures enough; they are all correct, and they will, to some extent, at least, satisfy the House that when comparisons are made, figures do not redound to the advantage of the scheme of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if, during the election of 1887, the Liberal party had succeeded in reaching the Treasury benches, would this proposition ever have been brought before the House? No, Sir, it would not. It is brought here now because they are disappointed and have been rejected by the people of this country. They are taking their sweet revenge upon the people of the country because they would not place their confidence in them during the late election. Now, as long as they go on in this way, decrying their country, doing all manner of things to injure their country, the people never will have confidence in them. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, what the object of this discussion is, at this particular time. It is not for the purpose of forming a party policy, because there is no election in view. Then what is the object? The object is to strengthen the hands of the opponents of this country at Washington. They tell the people at Washington: "Stay your hand, wait, and you can get better terms." Sir, it would be a curious thing if, during the negotiation of that treaty for the settlement of difficulties between the United States and this country, the people of this country should, in their legislative halls and public occasions, say to the United States: "Do not sign the treaty, wait, and we will give you better terms." There can be no other motive, no other object. If there is a motive, if there is an object beyond that, I would like to hear it, and I will gladly withdraw the accusation, because I do not like to think it, but I am forced to think it. Now, Sir, there is another point which I will just mention. A very strange thing was said, that we could have our tariff, and they could have their tariff, that we would have control of our tariff, and they would have control of their tariff under free trade between the United States and Canada. What would induce the people of the United States to join hands with us? Only one of two things—they either want our market, or they want our territory. If they want our market, what use would it be to them unless it was protected in the same degree that theirs is protected? No, Sir, they never would submit to join hands in equal trade, or free trade, unless we made the protection of our market as high as they are protected themselves. If the United States, for instance, want a 40 per cent. tariff to protect their market against outsiders, what use would this market be to them if we only had a tariff of 20 per cent.? Of no value or use at all. Sir, we could not have two tariffs. They may just as well acknowledge the corn at once, and say commercial union. Then I say that if there is commercial union, we must have political union. You cannot have commercial union with one nation and political union with another. Why, Sir, what would be the result of commercial union? A barrier set upon the shores of this great Dominion against the whole outside world, whether it be Asiatic or European. We set up a barrier, and we say to the outside world: "You shall not trade with us, we are a people within ourselves, we can trade within ourselves, and we do not want you at all." That would be the result. Ships would be withdrawn from our shores, the trade of the St. Lawrence would be dried up in a short time, Montreal would cease to be a commercial centre, Toronto would disappear as a commercial centre, all the ships crossing the Atlantic would come to New York city, the leading commercial houses would be there, and we would have none of that trade whatever. Why, Sir, we would be abandoned by the rest of the world. What would be the result if Mr. Hitt's Bill should become law. Let us see what he says of it himself:

"I say that this treaty, if we had a treaty to-morrow for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, that treaty would last just so long as it suited the American people and no longer."

The moment it ceased to suit them, they would then abandon that treaty, and might is right, and would be right, because we would be abandoned by the rest of the world. Besides that we would be a small people and they would swallow us up. Their invitation, if there is any, is the invitation of the spider to the fly; they will take us in and consume us, and then they are done with us. No, Sir, what does Mr. Hitt say?

"But we can at any time withdraw from commercial union if it works unfairly."

That is just what they are after, Mr. Speaker, they want to get us into treaty, a commercial union with them, and then, Sir, these combines that exist in the United States, both agricultural and manufacturing, would pour down their surplus upon us here for the purpose of extinguishing every member of life and every industry in this country. Just as soon as they succeeded in extinguishing that, then the whole of the capital of this country would be transferred to the United States, and when they had all our artisans also on the other side of the lines, they would say "we want your treaty no longer," and might is right in this case, as I have already said. Then in what position would we be placed? It would cost us to try the experiment, and it would be only an experiment; what? It would cost us about three hundred thousand artisans. What do three hundred thousand artisans mean to this country? Each one of those artisans and his family are worth to Canada at least $1,000, and you can multiply three hundred thousand by one thousand dollars and find the cost. We would lose that to start with. We would also lose two hundred or two hundred and fifty millions of capital now invested in manufactures. And what would we lose besides? We would lose the respect of every right thinking man, not only in this country and in Great Britain, but of every honest, patriotic and right thinking man in the United States, who would look upon us with scorn and contempt. That is the situation in which hon. gentlemen opposite desire to place Canada. I repeat that this question has not been brought up for the purpose of forming a party policy, because it is useless now; it has been brought up for some other object, and I wish some hon. gentleman opposite would relieve me from the suspicion that it was not taken up with the object of promoting the best interests of the people of this country.

Mr. BECHARD. Mr. Speaker, after the numerous and elaborate speeches which have been delivered on both sides of the House since the beginning of this discussion, I feel it would be idle on my part to attempt to review at any length the different branches and details of the question or to read long statistics which would probably have no other effect than to weary the House at this advanced stage of the debate. To say, Sir, that free trade between Canada and the United States is a question which is highly interesting and popular is simply asserting a truth, which is so manifest, so palpable, so vulgar, if I may use the expression, that no one would venture to deny it. The people of Canada remember that under the old treaty of 1854 they enjoyed a prosperity unknown to us before, and since its abrogation they have continuously wished its renewal. Before the abrogation of that treaty the Canadian Government took steps towards its renewal, and since its abrogation they have on different occasions attempted to negotiate a new treaty, one on a wider and more liberal basis. Subsequently, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, being the leader of the Opposition and perfectly acquainted with public opinion in this country, thought he could do nothing better to win the confidence of his countrymen and be restored to power than to persuade them that it was in his power to give reciprocity of trade with the United States to Canada, that he had found the means whereby that beneficent measure could be secured—he would apply reciprocity of tariff and within a few years that measure would produce reciprocity of trade. In 1879 the National Policy was inaugurated under the auspices of the right hon. gentleman. He had placed on the Statute-book of the country a declaration by which he gave proof to the people of Canada that he was determined to fulfil his promises and to carry out the reciprocity policy which he had enunciated and promised on the hustings, as soon as the Government of the United States was ready to reciprocate. But they did not reciprocate. Eight years have elapsed. During the interval we have had the National Policy, and we are still waiting for a reciprocity with the United States. But will it be said that the people of Canada have become indifferent towards reciprocity with our neighbors? Surely no one will pretend to make such an assertion in face of the numerous meetings that have taken place from time to time, and in the presence of the correspondence which has taken place recently between the Canadian and American Governments. On reading that correspondence it is reasonable to hold that the Canadian Government, by proposing to the Americans to make some arrangements providing for freer commercial relations between the two countries, intended, if they succeeded in negotiating a new treaty, to obtain a treaty on broader, wider and more liberal terms than the old Reciprocity Treaty, because the American Government had already refused to renew simply and purely the old treaty. These facts to which I have referred show conclusively that the Government of this country, from the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1854, held that reciprocity between Canada and the United States was a desirable measure and one advantageous to Canada. It seems as if they had changed their programme on the other side of the House, for to-day you can hardly find any vestige of reciprocity on the other side of the House. By the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the gentlemen opposite have entirely banished reciprocity from their programme. Since that amendment was placed before the House reciprocity has met with an unfriendly feeling on the other side of the House. Let us hear what that amendment says:

"That all the words after 'That' be struck out in order to add the following:—'Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879, and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.'"

What is the real and precise meaning of this language? What is its interpretation? According to the hon. gentlemen opposite, it means this, that Canada in the past has been desirous of securing reciprocity with the United States, but as for the future, Canada is no longer desirous of securing such reciprocity as would interfere with the National Policy. That, Sir, according to my humble judgment, is the true meaning of this amendment. We all know, Sir, that the National Policy has been formed not only for the purpose of protecting the manufacturers of this country against foreign competition, but it has also been instituted for the purpose of protecting the Canadian farmers against competition on the part of the farmers of the United States. Surely, Sir, no man will pretend to say that even reciprocity limited to the exchange of natural products between the two countries can exist, to such an extent, without interfering with the National Policy of this country. I hold, Sir, that if this amendment contains the real opinions of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House with regard to this question, that they are to-day opposed to any sort of reciprocity between Canada and the United States. It is true that we have heard some of those gentlemen express opinions favorable to limited reciprocity, but at the same time I have noticed and I found it very strange that their whole line of reasoning on this point, if not positively antagonistic was very far from supporting such a policy. We heard the Minister of the Interior—for whose talents and eloquence I always had a great admiration—say that he was favorable to that "limited reciprocity," and by limited reciprocity I mean reciprocity only in the interchange of natural products between the two countries. He said he was in favor of such reciprocity, but at the same time he took care to tell us that the United States produced more natural products than they could consume in that country. It is easy, Sir, to see the inference from that statement. The last speaker who has just taken his seat has spoken in the same way and expressed views in the same direction. He said that the Western States produced a large surplus and that the United States were bound to export a surplus of those products to other countries. What does it mean? It means that the United States market is not after all so good a market for the exports of the natural products of Canada. Those two gentlemen are not the only ones who spoke in the same strain. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) whom I am glad to see in his seat opened in the same way. That hon. gentleman told us in a short speech a good many things which going to the country need I think some discussion. He told us exactly the same thing as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat—that the United States possessed a large surplus of natural products and that they are bound to export them to other countries, and that we in Canada must expect to send our surplus of natural products to markets where they are needed. What is the meaning of this language? How do you interpret it, Mr. Speaker? I do not know, Sir, although I am aware of your abilities and of the very logical mind that you possess—that you would interpret it in the same way as it would occur to my mind. But the interpretation which I make of it is this: That the United States possessing a large surplus of natural products; a larger quantity than is needed to supply their own market, that the market of the United States is not the real market to which our farmers ought to export their natural products. Yet in the same breath those hon. gentlemen tell us that they are in favor of reciprocity so far as the free interchange of natural products is concerned. I would ask my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat for what reason, under such circumstances, would they be favorable to reciprocity at all? Under circumstances such as they have described, of what avail would it be to them at all? My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) said in his remarks that the great prosperity enjoyed by this country under the Treaty of 1854 was principally due to the American war. My hon. friend had forgotten surely that the treaty was inaugurated in 1854, and that the war began only in 1861, and that therefore seven years elapsed from the beginning of the inauguration of the treaty to the breaking out of the war. Surely during that long interval the farmers of Canada enjoyed great prosperity. I regret to see—I deeply regret to see—the attitude my hon. friend has taken with regard to this question. I have much personal esteem for my hon. friend. Our counties lie adjacent to each other. Both are agricultural constituencies having identical interests. Although my friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) and I have not often agreed in politics, I did hope that upon a question of this kind we could stand together. It is true that my hon. friend advocated and supported the National Policy, but I thought that like his distinguished former leader he had supported it only as a means in order to secure free trade—or reciprocity—between Canada and the United States. My hon. friend said that our farmers were satisfied with the National Policy, that they were making money under its operation, and that some of them had deposits in banks. Well, Sir, I do not think the fact that some farmers have deposits in banks is conclusive proof that their business is actually good and prosperous. It may show that they enjoyed some prosperity in the past, which enabled them to make some savings. But, Sir, we all know that the farmers as a class do not generally keep their money in banks. They are rather inclined to suspect the stability of those institutions, and they are not satisfied with the small profits they draw from their deposits. They generally prefer to invest their money in land; but, Sir, within the last few years business has been so dull—I speak of the farmers of the Province of Quebec—that those of them who have been most prudent and have made some savings, prefer to have their money in the banks to investing it. Some of them have invested their money in land, but they find themselves pledged to obligations which they cannot fulfil, and some of them have been obliged to go to the United States. But those who kept the money in the banks are now waiting for better times to bring them opportunities for investing it. That a large number of the farmers have been for a time satisfied with the National Policy I do not undertake to deny. They were led to hope that that policy would make them all rich; but a change of times has brought a change of mind, and to-day those farmers have their eyes open. They understand that the great prosperity they enjoyed a few years ago is not to be attributed to the National Policy, but to the abundant crops with which we were blessed in this country, and the great increase in the demand for our natural products in Europe, where the crops were comparative failures. They understand to-day that the high prices which they obtained for their products during those prosperous years were not fixed by the National Policy, as they understand that this same National Policy is powerless to raise the low prices that prevail at the present time. Sir, the farmers in Rouville are not any more indifferent than these in the other counties of Quebec to free trade with the United States. They know very well that the horses they sell are shipped to the United States. They know that a large proportion of their cattle, their sheep, their wool, their barley, their eggs, and their poultry which they sell is shipped to the American market; and they know that every ton of hay which they sell is shipped to the United States. The hon. gentleman for Rouville knows that in many counties of the Province of Quebec hay is one of the principal products of the farm, and the one upon which the farmers depend most to make money. There are large tracts of land in the Province of Quebec which are natural meadows, the soil being specially a hay producing soil; and there are other large tracts where artificial meadows are made. For a number of years our farmers, finding that they could produce hay more profitably than grain, have given their attention to that industry, and they are to-day producing large quantities of hay, the surplus of which is almost wholly shipped to the United States. The hon. member for Rouville, I regret to say, endeavored the other day to create the impression that this hay trade has been diminishing in importance within the last few years. He quoted statistics to show that the importation of hay by the United States has been decreasing since 1865; but if the exports of hay from Canada to the United States have brought less money to the farmers this year than last year, that does not prove that the trade is decreasing, because the reduction in the value may be due to the fact that the price of hay is lower in the American market this year than it was last year; and it may also be due to the fact that the hay crop has been smaller this year than last year, and therefore that a smaller quantity has been exported. Now, Sir, I find by the Trade and Navigation Returns that in 1885 the whole of our exports of hay amounted to 134,936 tons, of which the United States imported 127,820 tons, leaving only 7,000 tons as the quantity exported from Canada to other countries. In 1886 the whole export was 93,944 tons, of which 85,490 tons were exported to the United States, leaving a balance of 8,000 only exported to other countries. In 1887, our whole export was 76,843, and from that quantity we exported to the United States 69,450 tons, leaving 8,000 tons for export to other countries. You see by these statistics that the trade between Canada and the United States is not losing its importance. I repeat what I said a few minutes ago that the farmers in the constituency of my hon. friend are not indifferent, but are far from being indifferent to reciprocity with the United States. Does not my hon. friend remember that a few years ago some leading men of his constituency made strenuous exertions to secure the construction of a railway which has placed the greatest portion of that constituency in direct communication with the Boston markets? Does not the hon. gentleman remember that some of the municipalities, through which that railway has been built, voted bonuses in order to secure its construction? Why, he knows that his town, where he lives, voted a bonus of about $40,000 to that company, in order to secure the construction of a branch which would connect it with the railway to which I have just referred, and consequently place it in direct communication with the markets of the Eastern States. These facts show conclusively, according to my humble judgment, that the farmers of Rouville, as well as the farmers of other constituencies in Quebec, consider the markets of the Eastern States good markets for the sale of a large portion of their products; and they explain that they are good markets for our products on account of the good quality of our products, and because we are in closer proximity to the Eastern States than are the Western States, which produce the large surplus exported by the United States. Here I must pay my respects to my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) to whose speech I listened with great attention. I noticed that he could not understand why we should grant free trade to the United States when we did not grant it to England. The reason seems obvious. It is because, if we have reciprocity with the United States, we discriminate in favor of the United States against England, and in return the United States will discriminate in our favor against the whole world, while England, in receiving free of duty all our products, confers no favor upon us, but does for us what she is doing for the rest of the world. My hon. friend told us that we pay 20 per cent. duty to-day on our exports to the United States, but that with unrestricted reciprocity, we will pay much more than that by direct taxation. If my hon. friend is as friendly as he professes to be to the farmers of Canada and the farmers of his constituency and Province, he should go in heart and soul for unrestricted reciprocity, for that would have the effect of removing immediately all those obnoxious taxes which are weighing so heavily, according to my hon. friend, upon the farmers of the country. The National Policy has always been, and shall always remain, powerless to relieve the farmers. With unrestricted reciprocity, when a farmer in Rouville sells a horse worth $100, he will not be obliged, as he is to-day, under the National Policy, to lose $20 on the price, so as to pay the American duty, but he will receive the full price without any deduction. To prove that the opinion that the heavy duties on exports to the United States are paid by the producer is correct, I may mention the fact that the hay merchants who buy our hay and sell it in the United States have been endeavoring for the last few years to get refunded by the American Government the extra duty which was exacted during several years by the American customs officers. That shows that in the minds of these merchants, as in the minds of those whom they buy the hay, it is the Canadian producer who pays the duty. My hon. friend is afraid direct taxation will be the consequence of unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, I confess that if I were persuaded such would be the result of the policy, I would not only hesitate to vote for it, but I would unhesitatingly vote against it. I am far, however, from being persuaded that such will be the result of the adoption of this policy. My hon. friend from South Huron, in his able speech the other day, explained in a satisfactory manner the various ways by which we could compensate for the loss of revenue that would follow the adoption of that policy. Sir, we governed this country with the expense of $23,000,000 a year when the hon. member for East York was at the head of the Government; and I do not see why we should not still govern the country with about the same amount. Reduce the expenses of the country to that figure, and there will never be any fear of any direct taxation. Unrestricted reciprocity, instead of leading to direct taxation, would have the effect of rendering us more economical. It would be the antidote which would cure the spirit of extravagance that now reigns in the expenditure of public money. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to unrestricted reciprocity, because they fear it would injure our manufactures, and on that account my hon. friend for Rouville told us that he would not sacrifice the manufacturers even to give reciprocity to the farmers. He said that with unrestricted reciprocity, the American manufacturers would not come to Canada to manufacture but would slaughter our market. Well, market slaughtering can only occur under certain conditions. No market can be slaughtered unless every other market is perfectly glutted and goods are sold at a great sacrifice. Under such circumstances I can understand that large quantities of goods may at some time be poured from the glutted market into the other market, which may then become glutted, but, with unrestricted reciprocity, there will no longer be a Canadian market and an American market, but they will be one and the same market where the prices of goods will be the same from one end to the other. I cannot understand, then, this idea of slaughtering. I admit that some manufacturers will be injured in their interest perhaps, by unrestricted reciprocity, and especially that class of manufacturers, who, taking advantage of the high tariff which protects them, have enriched themselves and supplied the consuming public with an inferior article. They will surely be condemned to choose one of two alternatives, either to improve their manufactures or to disappear from the scene and make room for others, and I think that their disappearance would be no loss to the country. But those manufacturers who have sufficient intelligence to conduct their business properly, who do not depend entirely upon the tariff to give stability to their industries knowing the great natural advantages which have been given to this country, knowing that labor can be procured here as cheap, if not cheaper than in the United States, knowing that living here is cheaper than in the United States, knowing that improved machinery can be obtained here cheaper than it can in the United States, and knowing that our raw material can be bought here as cheap as it can in the United States, I say that those manufacturers do not fear competition, because already they have taken care to equalise the conditions of manufacturing between themselves and all possible competitors. Those manufacturers do not dread competition from the United States, but what they dread is the narrow market in which they are situated, and what they want is the broad market in which they can easily sell their products. The National Policy, according to the intention of its promoters, was to accomplish one great thing amongst others. It had for its mission to stop the emigration of our countrymen to the United States, and not only that, but to bring back those who had already emigrated. How many of them did they bring back home? I do not think it would be a very difficult task for the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to count them, and we all know that the emigration has been going on just the same. If you go to the Province of Quebec at this season, every Sunday you will hear, after divine service, the announcement that farmers are going away, that they are selling their farms and selling their stock because they are going to the United States. This is the state of things in the Province of Quebec. But, with unrestricted reciprocity, that which no policy has been able to cure would find its cure, because that would increase the manufacturing industries of this country, and I venture to say that, under that policy, within ten years, the manufacturing industry would have taken such a stand in this country as could never be obtained in half a century under the National Policy. Those who now go to the United States would find here what they are seeking, and that is the only remedy which would keep them in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have raised the cry of annexation. I cannot take my seat without making an observation on that point. Those hon. gentlemen seem to think that annexation would be the unavoidable result of the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity, and they seem to dread that result so much that they are inexhaustible in their expressions of loyalty. It is not the first time, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, that I have witnessed such an explosion of loyalty. I have never yet spoken of mine, because I always thought there was no reason for it, and, if on this occasion I briefly refer to it, it is not because I think that my own interests will be served by it, but I will do so in order to prove to hon. gentlemen opposite that loyalty is not their exclusive property. I am not an annexationist. I think we enjoy as much liberty in this country as they do in the United States. I think, if there is any difference between the two countries, the difference is in our favor, because I think that sometimes their idea of liberty in the United States goes a little too far, and is contrary to the preservation of good order. Like the rest of my French-speaking countrymen, like the rest of the French Canadians, I am loyal to British institutions, although, not being of British extraction, I may consequently not feel in my bosom that same degree of filial affection for England which burns in the hearts of her own sons. Yet, Mr. Speaker, from boyhood, I have been led to admire and to love England. I have studied her history, I have admired her great achievements and the genius of her great people. To a certain extent, I have been acquainted with her literature, and have been charmed with her poets. I have endeavored, although I have succeeded but imperfectly, to learn the language of her sons, amongst whom I am happy to count some good friends and men for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration. But above all, Sir, from boyhood I have been imbued with her principles of self-government, which she has taught the civilised world. Being born a British subject, and with such a training, you will easily understand that I could not help loving and admiring the great nation to whose destinies the fate of my native country was bound. But, Sir, permit me to add that while I love and admire England, I love Canada more, and should anything occur in the course of events to compel me to choose between my loyalty to England and my loyalty to Canada, I would not hesitate to side with my native country. I feel in my heart that by doing so I would be playing the part of a patriot. But, Sir, the contention that annexation must be the unavoidable result of the adoption of unrestricted free trade with the United States, is untrue. I cannot see any reason why a broad and liberal measure of reciprocity between these countries would accomplish more in that direction than has been accomplished by a narrow and small measure of reciprocity such as the Treaty of 1854 gave us. Sir, before the Treaty of 1854 was entered into, annexationists were found; men of high standing became annexationists, and published a manifesto expressing their annexation opinions, which was spread broadcast throughout our country. Annexation meetings took place in some of our rural districts, where resolutions were passed endorsing annexation. I was a young man then, attending college, but I remember quite well those meetings. I have particular reasons to remember them. I remember that all persons whose names were published as being connected with those meetings, or as having endorsed those resolutions, were dismissed by the then Canadian Government from the honorary offices which they held under the Crown, such as justice of the peace, or an officer in the militia. Well, Sir, these facts show that there was an annexation feeling which, at one time, found favor in Canada. Sir, a very old axiom says si vis pacem para bellum—if you want to preserve peace, prepare for war. Let me tell this House, let me tell the farmers of this country, that if you wish to prevent the development of an annexation feeling in this country, give to the Canadians unrestricted free trade with the United States.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, this, as has been very often said, during the course of this debate, is a matter of very great consequence to this country, and I could not give a silent vote upon it inasmuch as it is a matter that has never come before the people yet. It is only a year ago in February that we had a general election, and then we went to the country with all the matters of practical politics that had been talked about for years past; and one would have naturally thought that if there was to be such a very strange and startling departure from our fiscal policy, hon. gentlemen opposite and the hon. leader of the Opposition, who was then in the country leading that party, would have promulgated it and brought it before the people in order to give them an opportunity to decide upon it. The National Policy was no new thing. It had been spoken about from the hustings, from every school house in every part of the country from 1878 until the date of the last election, and at the general elections and at every bye-election changes were rung on the National Policy, on the one hand upon the great benefits derived from it by the people, on the other hand upon the great ruin it brought upon the people. One would have naturally thought that if a great change was to be placed before the people, that not only were we on the brink of a great calamity that might have been averted by hon. gentlemen opposite, but we had actually fallen into the abyss of misery and despair and there was no help for us now except by this heroic treatment of which we have heard,—one would have naturally thought that the country being in such a desperate state, requiring such heroic treatment, those hon. gentlemen would have taken the people into their confidence, would have spoken to them as a physician would speak to his patient, would have asked the patient the seat of the pain and the seat of the disease, and having ascertained what was the trouble would have prescribed accordingly. But we heard nothing about it. On the other hand, candidates who were running in opposition to the Government not only did not oppose the National Policy, not only did not speak against it, but in very many instances within my own knowledge, they came out as advocates and supporters of the very National Policy which for many years before they had so bitterly denounced. What was the excuse for this turn-about? Their leader had come to the conclusion that the country was so much involved in debt, that it would be dangerous to introduce any new fiscal policy, and therefore they had perforce to accept the policy of their opponents, and they told the people that if they would entrust them with the reins of power they might rest assured that the industries of the country would not be interfered with. That was the state of things in February last year. We heard nothing about this new policy during the last Session of Parliament. The leader of the Opposition was then in his place in this House, and yet we heard nothing of this terrible calamity that in the meantime had overwhelmed the country, and nothing of the necessity of this heroic measure being adopted. But after that hon. gentleman, through indisposition, was obliged to leave this country, temporarily, I hope, then we find this policy is introduced suddenly upon this House. Now, I take it we are in this position—I am in this position and every other hon. member is in this position—he is not here as the representative of this new fangled idea. The people have not sent representatives here to say what should be done in this crisis. On the contrary, the majority of the members have been sent here as supporters of the National Policy, as members pledged not to interfere in any way with our industries or to change our fiscal policy in any way whatever. I would be recreant to my trust if I did not carry out that pledge, and I would never hesitate one moment about the way I would cast my vote on this matter. If I thought differently, if I agreed with hon. gentlemen opposite, having been sent to represent certain principles, I would feel it my bounden duty rather than vote with the opponents of those principles, although I agreed with their contentions, to resign my seat and go back to the people and ask them what they thought about the matter. That is the only logical way of doing in such a case. Is this country in that despairing state that hon. gentlemen opposite have depicted it? With the permission of the House I would like to take a brief retrospect of our history in Canada. It is not a very long history. Although born in Canada myself and not a very old man, I recollect the day, and it does not seem very long ago, when there was not a single railway in Canada and not a single telegraph line here, when all the passenger traffic between Montreal and Toronto was carried on by a single coach each way per day. Now look at the contrast. That was probably up to 1854, and the Grand Trunk, I think, commenced in that year; and not very long before that, probably in 1858, the first telegraph line was built in this country. Canada in those days was, comparatively speaking, a wilderness compared with what it is to-day. With the permission of the House I will read a short extract from a work by Mr. Talbott, the son of Governor Talbott, I think, who describes the country then in better language than I can use. He said:

"Nature has probably done more for Upper Canada than any other tract of country of equal extent; and art seems to conduct herself upon the modest principle, that it would be an act of unpardonable presumption in her, to attempt the further improvement of a country so greatly indebted to the kind indulgence of her elder sister. Here is the finest field for the exercise of human industry and ingenuity; a soil not only capable of producing in abundance all the necessities of life, but equal to the culture of its greatest luxuries; a climate not only favorable to the human constitution, but also eminently calculated for the cultivation of every species of grain and fruit. And yet, so great is the delusion under which many Europeans still labor, with respect to the real character of this fine country, that most of those who have not seen it compare it with the deserts of Siberia; and receive all that travellers relate in its favor with no more candor than can be expected from persons who evince no wish to be undeceived."

I think we are a good deal to blame for the idea that the people of England and other countries have of Canada. It seems to be thought that the only things we can send from Canada to represent the habits of its people and the products of its soil, are small articles made by Indians, little canoes, snow shoes, toboggans, a miniature of the ice palace at Montreal, all of which go to give people in England the idea that Canada is a perfect desert, just as Mr. Talbott wrote over forty years ago. It is said that Canada is not well known in England and other countries. Why it was only the other day that an historian—a very celebrated man—came as far as Buffalo and when he looked across Lake Erie and saw the waste of waters, and saw the ice floating about, he did not think that he ought to come to Canada, and he afterwards talked about our country as a perfect Siberia. I am sorry he did not come into this country because he would have found that it was a different place from what he represented. I have told the House the position Canada occupied in 1840 and 1850. In 1854 the Grand Trunk Railway was commenced and in 1853, I think it was, the Crimean war began, and those two influences gave a very great impetus to trade in Canada. For instance land went up to a very high figure. In 1856 I went from Cobourg to Lindsay, in the county of Victoria, and I have lived there since. Farms which you could have bought for $20 an acre went up to $60 an acre at this time, and town lots that were sold in Lindsay—quarter-acre lots—at $700 in 1857 and 1858 are not worth one-quarter the money today. There was an extraordinary advance in the price of land at this time, and there was also an extraordinary advance in the price of grain. I recollect that wheat sold at $2.50 a bushel, and farmers thought there was no end to their wealth, and they were prepared to buy any amount of land either in town or country. This state of things could not, of course, last forever. The land from being an extraordinary price had to come down somewhat, and it did come down, but I do not admit it has come down to such an alarming extent as gentlemen opposite have stated. I wish to say a few words in reference to the remarks made by the member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), and I am sorry he is not in the House, because I told him I was going to comment on his speech and on some very extraordinary statements that he had made. In the first place he states that he was alarmed to find the extent that farmers in his county were ready to go in order to obtain access to the American markets. I suppose what he meant by that was that they were in favor of this motion now before the House, or rather commercial union, because it was commercial union that was talked about at the time that he must have met those persons. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that statement, although he is their representative I know the people of North Victoria probably far better than he does. As I told you I have lived in the town of Lindsay, in the centre of the county, about thirty-three years, and I know the people, and I know further that there is no constituency that will give a more decided vote upon unrestricted reciprocity than will the electors of North Victoria. Were my hon. friend here I could tell him what he probably knows, and that is, that he represents that constituency to-day not because they love him more but that they would have nothing to do with the party who was there before. My hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Barron) seems to have loaded himself up with figures and statistics gleaned from I know not what source, because they are very erroneous indeed. I think that he has well earned the name and title of "Baron Statistics the Second." He told us that he wanted to be very accurate, and that he had gone to a great deal of trouble in order to make out his facts and figures correctly. Notwithstanding this he makes the astounding statement that in the county I have the honor to represent there are 31,563 farmers. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are just about 1,700 farmers in North Victoria, and that is all; yet he has added on over 12,000 more than the entire population engaged in other industries. I wish there were 21,000 farmers engaged in agriculture in North Victoria, and if there were it would be a splendid county. But this statement shows that the hon. gentleman, knowing nothing whatever about the facts, loads himself up with those figures without knowing what he talks about. I will not quote the figure of speech used by the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), but I may say that we have heard a great many gentlemen in this debate and "an avalanche of figures with a deluge of facts." It is an extraordinary thing that of over 200 representatives chosen by the people of this country for the purpose of coming here and legislating for the good of the country, we cannot find out such simple matters as to who pays the duty on horses or barley or butter, and when they have got to go to all kinds of figures and statistics, both in Canada and the United States, to find out whether or not the United States pays the duty on horses exported to that country. I think the best thing we can do is to get two or three practical men to solve that question, because after all it seems to me to be an important question in this debate as to who pays the duty on horses or lumber, or anything of that sort.

Mr. SCRIVER. You solve it for us.

Mr. HUDSPETH. You have not succeeded in having it solved yet. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)— for whose ability I have a great respect—as I understand him, says that the Americans pay the duty on barley. I am quite willing to take the hon. gentleman's opinion because I think he is correct, but then the great majority of the hon. gentlemen opposite are not content to take that opinion and they have not yet solved the question. I must congratulate the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) who spoke last on the very sensible speech that he made, and I could agree in a great measure with his remarks were it not that I am so very strongly attached to British connection, and I cannot bear to do anything that would in any way lessen the bonds that bind us to the mother land. Were it not for this, Mr. Speaker, I think I could agree with everything he said, but I will have some remarks later on to make about matters on which I think he is a little mistaken. Now, Mr. Speaker, talking about the depression in the value of land. There is no doubt that owing to the Crimean war, owing to the extraordinary expenditure in Canada by the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway and other railways, and owing to the American war which followed in 1861 and which paralysed all the industry and trade of that country, not only during the years of the war but for many years afterwards, there was an impetus given to every kind of business in Canada, and to the farming interests it gave a very extraordinary impetus. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, I am allowed to have my opinion and I express the belief that it was those wars and this large expenditure of money which increased the price for horses, cattle and all kinds of products and which raised the price of land to an abnormal extent. There had of course to come a reaction. When the Americans recovered themselves, as they did very rapidly, they no longer paid such high prices for grain and everything we had to sell, and the influences of those wars passed away. The large expenditure of money for railways in Canada, ceased to a very material extent; our North-Western country was opening up; an immense territory in the Western States had been opened, large wheat-growing tracts in South America and Central America as well as in India were being developed. All these things combined to pull down the prices of our farm products. I think it is absurd for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to argue that the National Policy alone could raise the price of everything we produce. It has assisted, no doubt, but there are other powers and influences at work. Nor can I agree with hon. gentleman opposite that the National Policy has been a bad thing for this country. I think it has been a good thing for the country on the whole. I think we ought to protect our industries, and it would be a very silly and foolish thing to attribute the depreciation in the value of land and the lowering of the prices of our products, to the National Policy; the man in the moon has got just about as much to do with it. Now, I am not going to trouble you with very many statistics, because they are not very reliable things after all. You can prove almost anything from statistics, I have heard one hon. gentleman say, and I believe there is a good deal of truth in that. But I will give you this for what it is worth—it relates to my own riding of South Victoria. I wrote to the county treasurer, without the slightest idea of what the result would be, to send me the assessed value of property in that riding from 1876 to 1887, inclusive, which he has done. I find that there has been no very material change in the value of the land. The township of Mariposa was assessed in 1876 for $2,712,940, and it varies very little. It goes down a little in 1877, 1873, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884, and then it goes up again in 1886 and 1887. In 1887 it was about a dollar more than it was in 1876; so there is very little change in the value of land in that township from 1876 to 1887. In the township of Ops the assessed value has decreased some $300,000 in 1887 from what it was in 1876. In Verulam it has decreased $100,000 odd. In Emily it has increased enormously. That shows how little reliance can be placed even on this class of statistics, which is probably the best that can be obtained. My idea is this: Different assessors are appointed, and they have different ideas of the value of land. Then, a few years ago the Ontario Legislature passed an Act requiring the assessors to value the land at its actual cash value, that is, at the price at which it would sell at an ordinary sale. So, I think these figures are probably as good as any could possibly be, and are worth something. I do not say that they are actually reliable, because a man would assess his farm at a great deal less than he would sell it for; but if you took all the municipalities throughout the Province in the same way, you would be able to see whether the land had depreciated to the enormous extent hon. gentlemen opposite say. Now, the town of Lindsay was one of those places which was boomed by the construction of the Midland Railway in 1857, and the assessment of lots in that town must have been very high in the years immediately succeeding 1857. Notwithstanding the depreciation in the value of property in most of the towns of the Province—and we in Lindsay, like other neighboring towns, have felt very materially the effect of the land booming in the city of Toronto—yet the assessed value of Lindsay in 1887 was $2,000,000 higher than it was in 1876. We have got over our depression; and although Lindsay is not what you might call a manufacturing town, we have a few manufacturing industries in it; the town is going ahead; we have not a single vacant house in Lindsay, and preparations are being made for building a great many houses as soon as spring opens. The hon. member for North Victoria spoke of the exodus which is going on in many parts of this country, and he mentioned one young man who left Lindsay to better his fortune in the United States. If he had applied to me I could have given him other instances. I know that a great many have gone from his constituency in the last few years, since the North-West has been opened up, and I do not blame them a bit. There is in North Victoria a great deal of very poor land, for instance, in the township of Carden; you would think no man would inflict such a punishment on any man as to compel him to go and live there. The Ontario Government built a colonisation road; settlers went in and built their houses; and as long as the lumbering operations went on, and they were able to cut beaver hay, and grow a little oats and a few other things, they were able to make a living in the shanties in the winter. But after the lumbering was finished, they borrowed all the money they could from some unfortunate company on the rocks they occupied, and went to the North-West or to the States, whichever would suit them better. Travelling through that country a little over two years ago, I passed a great many empty houses which had no doubt been deserted in that way. But this is only the case on those poor lands. There is nothing of the sort in South Victoria, and nothing of the sort in North Victoria where the land is good. But I will tell you what is a great cause of the exodus. As hon. gentlemen know, the great majority of the farms in Ontario, at any rate, only comprise 100 acres each, and many are even smaller. The consequence is that a man who has a good farm, and is quite able to maintain his family comfortably, finds that if he has two boys, he is not able to buy land for them at $60 an acre, and the result is that one boy gets his father's farm, and he gives the other what he can afford, and lets him go to the West and take up land for himself. Now, that will go on, and continue to go on, and I do not care whether you abolish the National Policy or have commercial union, or annexation, or whatever you will, it will not better that state of things. It is just as natural as that the bird shall leave the nest when it can fly. These people must have lands to live upon, and if they cannot get them here, they will go elsewhere. If our Government see their way to develop the North-West Territories, and in every possible way give advantage to these settlers, I have no doubt that in a few years our young men, farmer's sons, instead of going to the Western States, will go to our North-West Territories, and make their homes in their own country, but that exodus must go on. Another thing which has a great deal to do with it, is education. Our farmers are educating their sons, our professions are crowded with their sons; they cannot find sufficient field for their talents in Canada, and they must go to the States. They will go to the wealthy country. Do you mean to tell me, Sir, that annexation is going to remedy that? You might as well try to keep Scotchmen as Canadians out of New York, if they can better their circumstances in that city. There are more Scotchmen in London to-day than in Edinburgh, and more Irishmen than in Dublin, and it will ever be thus. The large centres will attract the clever men; and if you educate your sons you must expect they will go where their education will be appreciated. Why, we had two school teachers in the town of Lindsay, to whom we paid $300 apiece, and since the first of January last we have lost them both. One went to Chicago and got there $600 a year, and she telegraphed to the other, who joined her, and who also gets $600 a year. I could not blame the girls; no one could. They had a perfect right to better their fortunes. It was not because of the National Policy that they left Canada, but because they got $600 in the States, when they could only get $300 here. I know of two of our young men who left the town of Lindsay for New York, where they are now getting $2,500. You could not blame these young men. They did not leave the country because they hated it, for no more loyal men could be found anywhere, but they went to New York as Scotchmen go to London, because they had a field there for their abilities; and I am proud to say our schools are doing good work, and our farmers and mechanics and even laborers are giving their sons such an education as no other country on the globe gives them. The consequence is that for a time at least we must have an exodus of these young men. To say that can be cured by heroic treatment, such as annexation to the States, is utter folly; and I do not believe hon. gentlemen opposite believe it can be cured in this way. As to the value of lands, my experience is that they have not much depreciated in value. Within the last three or four weeks two transactions have taken place in my presence which do not show evidence of depreciation. In one case, in Mariposa, a farm of 98 acres with very poor buildings on it was sold for $6,100 cash; and in the other case a farm of 100 acres in the township of Ops was sold for $6,900. The price asked in the latter case was $7,000, but as the cash was paid down, the seller took off $100. That does not look as if the people had no hope and as if the country was in an abyss of despair. People who can pay $70 per acre for land are not in a very bad way, and when that price can be got for land I do not think the country is in such a bad state. But I must confess that poor lands have gone down tremendously. I speak very feelingly on that subject, because I know it to my own cost. You cannot sell poor land at any price, for men will not go on poor farms when they can go to the North-West and buy good land at $4 an acre. Now, a good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the mortgage debt of the farmers and the miserable state they are in. No doubt, there is a good deal of mortgage debt in the country, and the mortgage debt shows two things. It shows not only the indebtedness of a great many of the farmers but also the money that other farmers have made off their farms, because, as was stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, there are a great many mortgages which the companies do not take. A great deal of private money—what is called private money in the country—is lent out, and the great bulk of that private money is lent by men who made it in farming. I speak advisedly upon that subject. I know many farmers in the town of Lindsay who live upon the interest of their money, men who retired from their farms and rented them, and came to the town where they educated their families, and they are now living, in their old age, upon their earnings. There is one thing on which we may congratulate ourselves, and that is the great decrease in the rate of interest. From 1857 down to 1868, when I had to do with that kind of business, the rate of interest was from about 10 per cent. up to 25 or 30 per cent. I have known many mortgages to have been drawn at 25 per cent. and a great many at 10 to 15 per cent. Now interest runs from 6 to 7 per cent., which is a great change indeed, a change of which the farmers have the benefit. But why was it necessary the farmers in Ontario should be mortgaged to the extent they are? I think I know something about it. In the first place, owing, as I said before, to the very high price of produce caused by the Crimean and American wars and the expenditure in building railways, the farmer got an extravagant idea about the value of land. They, in fact, thought this thing was going to last forever. They bought lands, they paid a part of the purchase money, and gave a guarantee for the balance. Then the poor years came, poor crops sometimes came, low prices came, and they had to increase their mortgage debt, but I am happy to say a great many farmers have been paying off their mortgages. Some, of course, not so good farmers as the others, were unable to pay off their mortgages, and lost their farms, and have gone out of the country. I would like to give the House practical knowledge on this subject, because we have had so much information volunteered, and I will not read anything from any friends of my own, but I will give you the opinions expressed at a meeting of the West Victoria Farmers' Institute, where my opponent in the February elections and several strong Reformers who opposed me as hard as they could, spoke; and I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will pay some respect to the opinions of these gentlemen. At a meeting held in Mariposa the other day Mr. Glendenning, from Manilla, who is a strong Reformer and a farmer, read the following paper upon the question: "Does farming pay?" Now, so much has been said in the House about the farmers being in a dreadful state of despondency, that it will not be out of place for me to read this paper, which is not very long:

"The question is often asked, 'Does farming pay?' and nearly always answered in the negative by those asking the same, and in proof of this assertion they point to the increasing indebtedness of the farmers. Permit me to state that that is not sufficient evidence to establish the case. Mercants might answer the question 'Does mercantile business pay?' in the same way by pointing to the large number of failures constantly occurring amongst their class, but the farmers would not accept that as conclusive evidence that the mercantile business was a failure, in general, and they would be wrong in doing so. Farming like other callings in life will pay just in proportion to the amount of knowledge, capital, skill, economy and labor put in the business. Many farmers sigh for the good old times they had and when they made money. Let us go back twenty-five or thirty years ago. What had the farmers to sell then? Wheat, pork, horses, cattle, sheep and wood. Except in the case of wheat can he not raise as much per acre as then? But even this point is questionable. On some farms the average has been higher within the last ten years than it was at that time. Pork can be sold for as much on the average now as then. Cattle can be sold for more. A better price and demand for horses. Wool will not bring as much, but lambs realize better prices. While on the other hand the farmer has many new avenues opened up to him to make money. Notably among them is barley, clover seed and potatoes. Also a better demand and prices can be obtained for poultry, butter and eggs. He also has the advantage of railways, enabling him to sell in the best markets when he is ready. He has larger clearings; his fields are free from stumps and stones, which permits him to work his lands more easily and to better advantage by using labor-saving machinery.

"He can buy his implements, groceries and wearing apparel for less money. Yet with all these advantages many farmers complain that they cannot make ends meet. For this there must be a cause, which I think can be accounted for largely by the following facts: For nearly twenty years, with only short intervals during that period, the farmers had large crops and high prices for most of their products. And with their increasing prosperity many of them undertook the purchase of land on credit at high prices either to enlarge their own domains or farms for their sons, which seriously crippled them when less prosperous years came. All, or nearly all, acquired more extravagant habits of living which they have not learned to curtail. In many cases too much farm machinery has been bought, simply because some machines comes out with high praises and flashy paint. After a time the purchaser finds out that he could have done nearly as good work with the old discarded machine that he gave to the agent or lies rotting in the fence corner. This brings us to another point. Many farmers have not provided sufficient house room for their increasing implements and vehicles, consequently some of them have to stand out in the weather to rust, warp, rot and break when hitched to, which operation tends to break their temper and break them financially. Farmers who have not contracted heavy debts and who live within their income will generally tell you that farming pays and be satisfied with their position in life, but it is sometimes very hard to make farmers believe that their present mode of living is different and more expensive than it was twenty-five or thirty years ago. Well, I will ask how many farmers at that time sported a carriage with fine harness, or they and their families wore as expensive clothes as they do now?

"I do not wish to deny farmers and their families the use and luxuries of these articles, for I think there is no class of people in the Dominion who should enjoy the good things of this life more than the farmer; but when we find a top buggy and trappings to match for himself and each boy that is grown up, and other things that are just as ridiculous, is it not time for him to stop and ask himself the question, Can I make farming pay at this rate? One drawback the farmer has to contend with now is the high price of labor; but that is in part offset by labor-saving machines, which enables him to do a greater amount of work with the number of hands employed."

Now, Mr. Speaker, those sentiments were approved of by my friend Mr. Lownsbrough, who was my opponent at the last election.

"Mr. Lownsbrough said he thought from an honest standpoint farming did pay. Mr. Glendenning thought the wages paid by farmers were too high. He could not agree with the assertion. The farm hands had only about half of the year to earn wages, or at best not more than eight months, and had to go idle the rest of the year. Mr. Glendenning called Mr. Lownsbrough's attention to his paper that he had not said farmers were not paying too much."

Mr. Fee, who was one of the bitterest opponents I had, who is a farmer, was asked to criticise Mr. Glendenning's paper—

"But found nothing to disagree with him. He fully agreed with him and more too. The farmers were to be greatly blamed for their extravagance in buying too much machinery and not taking proper care of it. A great many farmers bought farming machines they did not need."

There is the opinion of farmers who, I say, are second to no farmers in the Province of Ontario, and they say that they do not find any fault, and they give their reasons. Now, is the country in that dreadful state in which it has been depicted by hon. gentlemen opposite? Are we wallowing in the Slough of Despond? Are we vainly endeavoring to get assisted out of that Slough of Despond? Where is the evidence of it? Where are the people coming to this Parliament and asking to be assisted, and claiming that they are suffering in this way? I did hear some years ago that there was a great deal of destitution in this country, when petition after petition was sent in, and deputation after deputation was coming down and getting no assistance from the Government of that day. We heard of soup kitchens at that time, and we know that there was a great deal of destitution then. Can any one say that there has been any such destitution in the country of late years? There may have been some distress among people who have been borrowing money needlessly, but it is not of such a kind as to require the heroic remedy that the hon. gentleman proposes. The people of Canada are not in the Slough of Despond that the hon. gentleman has depicted. I have tried in my imperfect way to show what I think have been the causes of the depression, because we know that there is a depression in the price of wheat. I have tried to give my reasons for it, that it is principally because the supply exceeds the demand, and I cannot for the life of me see how this unrestricted reciprocity is going to remedy that, because we know that it is not the United States that settles the price of grain, but that it is the English market that settles it. It seems to me that there is no market for us in the States for wheat, and, as far as barley is concerned, I am inclined to take the statement of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), that the Americans buy our barley simply because they must have it, because it is of a brighter color than the barley which is grown by themselves, in preference to the statement of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who does not know anything about it except what he gets from blue-books and statistics, whereas the hon. member for South Leeds knows all about it as a practical man, and he stated, as I understood him, that the price in Canada is the same as the price in the United States, and, when they buy it here and take it ever there, they pay the duty. If we get a $1 for our barley, and the price there is $.10, of course we do not pay the duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Of course you may laugh. I notice that those who laugh are generally those who do not know anything about the subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes, you may say "oh, oh." You are only making yourselves ridiculous, and more and more ridiculous, like the monkey climbing the pole. I do not think this is a laughing matter, it is a very serious matter, and we should try to find out the facts of the case. I hope I have not hurt any gentleman's feelings by any remarks I have made. I should be very sorry to do it. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) mentioned something about the benefits which would accrue to this country from unrestricted reciprocity, and he argued very neatly, what would be the good of reciprocity at all if we did not get the advantage of an exchange of our products with the United States? He said, very fairly, and very clearly, and very logically, that gentlemen on this side said that there was nothing to be got by the exchange because the United States had the same kind of products as we had, and therefore they did not require our products, and there was no necessity for any duty at all. Well, I do not go quite as far as that. I think that an exchange, even by one town with another, is often beneficial, and that if we could have a reciprocity treaty that would be fair both to Canada and the States, it certainly would be an advantage to us, and I think it would be an advantage to them. Now, I was speaking to a gentleman in Peterborough who manufactures sawn lumber—he is one of the largest manufacturers in the western part of the Province—about this question of the duty of $2 per thousand on lumber. I asked him if he thought that the abolition of the duty of $2 would give him that amount more for his lumber, and he said: "No, I don't think it would, but I think we would get a little more for it." I said: "How much do you think you would get more for it?" "Well," he said, "I think about $1 a thousand. The supply and demand regulate this matter to a great extent, and I do not suppose if the duty upon lumber was abolished to-morrow, that we would get anything like $2 a thousand more for our lumber than we get now." Well, I suppose the same thing might be said about horses. It has been said by the hon. gentlemen opposite that the farmers lose about $25 upon every horse they sell to the United States. Now, there are two young men up in my county, Bisailon and Dundas, who are buying horses. I saw them the other day in Lindsay, and I enquired what amount of business they had done in 1887, and they said they had paid out $30,000 in the town of Lindsay and in the outlying county of Victoria for horses during that year. I asked them what was the average price that they paid for horses in Lindsay, and they said that they paid on the average $109 for each horse. They bought them for the Montreal market, but a great many of them found their way into the States. I asked them what they thought of the duty upon horses. Well, they said they thought that if the duty was abolished, they would get a little more for horses in the States than they do now, but that the Americans wanted our horses, they were healthier than their own, and stronger. I suppose that the same rule applies to horses as to barley. The Americans must have our horses, or a certain number, and they must have our barley. Now, I cannot agree with the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) when he says he is prepared to pay the price for this unrestricted reciprocity. He is quite prepared to run the risk of our being isolated from the mother country in order to get the benefits which he imagines would be obtained by trading with the United States. He says they could sell their hay without the duty, they could sell their grain without the duty, and that they would be benefited in a great many respects. Well, I dare say from his standpoint he may be right, but that is a rule that works both ways. I suppose as far as the lumbermen in the States are concerned that if it was not a benefit to them to have this duty upon lumber continued, they would not be opposed to reciprocity, as they are now, and they would be perfectly satisfied to have the duty abolished; but it seems to me that they are very bitterly opposed to anything of the sort. They think that the duty enhances the price of the article, that by taking off the duty it might depreciate the price of the article. That is their opinion, at any rate, and I suppose the same rule will hold good with anything else. I am perfectly satisfied, and I believe that the great majority of the people of this country are satisfied, to have a very full measure of reciprocity with the United States, provided always that it does not interfere with our relations with England. That is the point, it is the crowning point, and that is the point hon. gentlemen will find when they go to the country. People will say yes, we want trade with our neighbors, we always want to trade with them, but do not ask us to trade with them at the expense of cutting us adrift from the mother country. They will not stand that one moment. Now, our country is not alone in suffering from the depression. One would think that our fair Canada was lying, amongst all the other countries of the world, a pitiable object, suffering from every possible political ill and the hon. gentlemen want to apply this heroic remedy, as it is called, to relieve her in her miserable condition. England is surely as much depressed as Canada. There is real destitution there, there is great shrinkage in the price of land, a depreciation in the price of all articles raised upon the farm. A bitter cry has come out from all of the agricultural districts of England. Hon. gentlemen say nothing about that. So far as I can learn, the farmers of the United States are in no better condition than the farmers of Canada, in any shape or way. I have read you the opinions of practical farmers in my own riding, showing you the causes which have lead up to any depression that may exist among them. They tell you truthfully what the reason is. They tell you that farming will pay if conducted skilfully by men who understand their business just the same, with the present prices, as any other business. Then I say there is no need of this heroic remedy, the country is not in a state to require it. But there is a depression, there is a shrinkage. What is the remedy? I do not think it is annexation, to the United States, I do not think it is commercial union—hon. gentlemen seem to have abandoned that name now—I do not think that it is unrestricted reciprocity. I must confess that I think there is some common sense if a man wants to break from the mother country and annex himself to the United States. There may be some common sense in commercial union, because people can understand it. I daresay that the United States would be perfectly willing to take us under their protecting arms and dole out to us our share of the duties, because there would be the same wall put all around both Canada and the United States. But I cannot understand unrestricted reciprocity. With your permission, Mr.

Speaker, I will read an article upon this point from the Chicago Times. After leading up to this point that paper says:

"It provides that whenever Canada desires free trade with the United States, and the same system of internal and tariff taxes, it can say so, and thereupon the President will appoint three commissioners to meet the same number appointed by the Canadian Government and prepare a plan for assimilating the internal taxes of the two countries, and the taxes on imports from all other countries, and dividing equitably the revenues derived from these sources.

"This, at least, shows some comprehension of what is necessary in order to effect the kind of commercial union about which there has been so much loose talk—the kind which goes to the extent of absolute free trade and the entire obliteration of the customs line between the two countries. Mr. Hitt and the committee evidently see that this involves not only an identical tariff but an identical internal revenue system for the two countries, which most of the advocates of commercial union have either not seen or affected not to see. As The Times has repeatedly pointed out, if there is absolute free trade between the two countries, and no custom houses, as between any two States of the Union, there must be the same tariff for both, for otherwise the lowest duties imposed by either would practically be the duties for both. To illustrate: If Canada should lay 30 per cent. and the United States 70 per cent. on woollen goods imported from other countries, all woollen goods imported would be entered at Canadian ports and pay the 30 per cent. duties and thence be sent free of duty into the United States. Thus the Canadians could force us to adopt whatever duties they might impose for themselves or else lose the import trade of our seaboard cities. So, too, if they put a tax of 10 cents a gallon on whiskey we would have to do the same, or all our distilling business would go to Canada. Mr. Hitt and the committee see this, and propose a mode of agreeing upon an identical tax system for the two countries, because without it the sort of commercial union contemplated is wholly impracticable."

That is just my own idea, but I thought it better to give you the opinion of some one living in the United States. The American Government would never consent to it. Do not hon. gentlemen opposite know that? What is this thing brought into this House at the present time? In the opening of my speech I stated that it was not foreshadowed in any way at the last election, it was not a matter brought before the people, but it is sprung upon the House at the present time, it has not been discussed by the country or by the press, it has changed its name like the chameleon changes its hue and it is presented to the House in the most beautiful form possible by hon. gentlemen opposite. But it is the same thing, only it will not take with our neighbors over the border—they say they will have none of it. Can it be possible that the hon. gentlemen leading the Opposition in this House have so little respect for the opinion of this House, have so little respect for the opinion of Canada that they will merely for the sake of making a point against the Government of the day, bring down a scheme which they know in their hearts will never be accepted by the people of the United States, even if the people of Canada were to go upon their knees and ask them to take it. If they were to catch the ears of the people of Canada and catch their votes, so as to be placed on this side of the House, they would then offer this scheme to the United States, which would be repudiated and refused at once, and then those hon. gentlemen would turn around to the people and say: We have done all we could, we found the country in a destitute state and we applied an heroic remedy, but when we went to the United States they would have nothing to say to us, we can do no more for you, we are in office now, the scheme has acted admirably, like a perfect charm. Is that the idea of hon. gentlemen opposite? Do they think they can so befooled the people with this scheme, do they propose to act like the ostrich, hide their intelligence in the sand, that the people might fall down and worship it not knowing what it is? What is this thing? Is it not one thing or another? They say it is not annexation, that it is not commercial union, and the Americans say: We will have none of it; yet the hon. gentlemen opposite have night after night risen and stated that this thing, which would not be accepted by the United States, was the only thing that would save this country from ruin. What is the remedy? If our country is not progressing satisfactorily, as I think it is progressing, what remedy should be applied? In my opening remarks I showed what the country was in 1840 and in 1850, that in 1840 it was comparatively a wilderness and in 1850 was without a single railway or telegraph line. From 1854 to 1888 it made enormous strides, railways being carried into every portion of the Dominion, telegraph lines into every part of the country, the whole Dominion being rapidly developed. If this country can be benefited, if it is suffering in any way, if its trade is languishing, what must we do to improve it? Can we on this side of the House find no better remedy than the heroic remedy prescribed by the doctors on the Opposition side? I think we can. I think it is the duty of the Government to do everything in its power to open up and develop the North-West and encourage the immigration of a proper class of immigrants, not the rakings and scrapings of the towns and cities, but farmers and agricultural immigrants generally, not only from England, Scotland and Ireland, but from Germany, Norway, France, Sweden and other continental countries; to let our country be known, not according to the extract I have read you as a perfect Siberia, a land of frost and snow, of great frozen lakes, mountains and avalanches, but as the smiling, peaceful, happy land it is. Let the world know Canada as it really is, and let its fertility be known. The Dominion is better known in England from the exhibition there two years ago than it was half a century before. Then we should strive to fill up our country, to protect our manufacturing interests, to protect them to a moderate extent, not to such an extent as will make a monopoly of any one single manufacture, to protect them to a moderate and fair extent, and whenever protection goes beyond that it is injurious to the country. Then we should develop our mines. There is no country in the world, as we have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by the advocates of commercial union, that possesses greater riches in the shape of mineral wealth than our own country. I think everything should be done to develop those mines. There is another question that has been raised, and it will do no harm to mention it, as it has been brought to my notice by some of our farmers, and that is this: They tell me that a great part of the swamp lands in Scotland have been reclaimed by loans of money made by the Government at low rates. The Ontario Government have been doing something in this direction, but of course they cannot do everything. If the Dominion Government can see their way to loaning money for improving swamp lands, it might be a step in the right direction. A large area of such lands has already been reclaimed in Ontario, and these lands have turned out the very best on account of the depth of the alluvial deposits. Then we should seek to develop our trade with foreign countries. An hon. gentleman who created a great deal of amusement, a member from Prince Edward Island, said the National Policy had ruined the shipping interests in the Maritime Provinces. He was evidently a strong advocate of annexing Canada to the United States, at all events commercially, forgetting all the time that the United States is a much more highly protected country than Canada, and that protection was said to have ruined the shipbuilding interests of the United States. So in order to cure a burat finger he puts it in the fire. We should endeavor not to decrease but to increase our shipping, and to do that by opening up new avenues of trade with other countries of the world. I have not the slightest doubt but that if our resources were known to people in other countries, trade could be established in a great many articles that we produce, and they do not. It is the duty of the Government to see that everything within reason that can be done should be done in order to spread and develop a foreign trade with not only our own colonies all over the world, but with foreign countries. Then there is another thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is if we are going to become a great people we must develop a nationality. It must not be Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, or Quebec, it must be Canadian. People who come to this country should be taught just as in the United States that they come to a country where the people are a united people. The sooner that the different Provinces give over looking from a provincial point of view and take the broad ground of being Canadian the better it will be for the country at large. It seems to me that from the smallest institution that we have in the country, like a municipal council in a town or village or township, up to the Dominion Parliament that our people are very much imbued with one idea and that is a selfish one. They want something for their own particular locality and they will move heaven and earth to get it. No matter what Government is in power I suppose the same influence will be brought to bear. I think the sooner that every province makes up its mind that it has got to bear and forbear, and to give and take, the better it will be for the whole Dominion. We never will have a united people unless they sink their provincialisms and become Canadians at heart. I am a Canadian by birth, but I never thought I was less a British subject. My parents, when they came to this country did not think they were leaving their own country but that they were simply going to a greater Britain. I wish to carry out those principles, and to be as good an Englishman as my father, and to be as good a Scotchman as my mother—I suppose that would be considered an “Irishism”—and Mr. Speaker, I shall never consent by my vote to do anything that will in any way hazard our connection with the mother country. If the people of my constituency differ from me then I shall be very happy to retire and let them send another representative here. I shall not represent any constituency that will approve of shaking off our connection with the mother land. I am as much a lover of Canada as the hon. gentleman who preceded me, but there is just this difference, I am a British subject and I hope always to be a British subject.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. So is he.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He says he is a Canadian before being a British subject, and if the interests would conflict he would do what he thought the better for Canada. I am not prepared to go that far, although I do not think it is necessary. I have told you why I did not consider the country was in such a position that any such risk should be run. If there are moneys spent by our Government extravagantly let us control it, if there are things that can be pruned down with a pruning knife let them be pruned down if that is an heroic remedy, but above all, do not humiliate my country, do not ask our people to go on their knees and ask for something we have been willing to accept from the United States for years back.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. No.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They know in their hearts we are just as willing to trade with the United States as they are, but we are not prepared to go the same length and risk so much as they want us to risk.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How far will you go?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will go as far as I possible can without discriminating against the mother country. I will go just as far as we can go without that, and that is the length the Conservative party will go. Just as far as the United States will meet us we are prepared to meet them half way, but we will not discriminate against English goods in favor of the goods of a foreign country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You are doing it now.

Mr. HUDSPETH. No, we are not doing it now, and that is not a fair argument. We are putting a duty on the United States goods and the English goods for the purpose of revenue. They know that perfectly well and I am not going to allow that language to be put in the Hansard without it being contradicted; because we are not discriminating against England. We are quite willing, for if the United States Government will send commissioners, I am sure our Government would send commissioners too, to make a treaty just as wide as it can be made, provided it can be done in such a way that we do not tax the goods of England and admit goods of the United States free. In other points I agree with my friend the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and if I were an American citizen I would agree with every word that gentleman stated. It is one of the best speeches I have listened to in this House, a calm, dispassionate, argumentative speech, but, unfortunately, I am not an American citizen and I hope I never will be. I have said all I have to say on this subject. I am neither a poet nor a orator, and I cannot treat you to anything very extraordinary, but I have simply stated from my own standpoint and perfect knowledge of the country I was born and brought up in, the facts as I learned them from farmers and others. I have tried to give you those facts instead of quoting a lot of figures I knew nothing about. I am much obliged to you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, for the patient hearing you have given my humble and imperfect remarks. I do not think that I often trouble the House, for I am better pleased to listen to those from whom I can learn wisdom than to give any ideas of my own. This was an important question, and one which I could not sit and silently vote for on account of the reasons I have given. I have tried to put my reasons fairly and squarely before the House, and they will go before my country and constituents, and, as I said before, I am perfectly prepared to stand and fall by them. If every man in my constituency was of a different opinion I should never come to any other conclusion than that I shall do everything in my power to strengthen the bonds that bind us to the mother land, and I shall do nothing to weaken, or lessen, or in any respect whatever loosen those ties of affection for our mother country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not, of course, rise to say anything more on this subject but I rise to make a personal explanation with reference to some statements made by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) yesterday. I have notified him that I intended to do so, and of course if there is any objection to be taken to my making a personal explanation I can be placed in order if you object to my doing so. That gentleman, in the course of his speech, made statements in reference to myself which were not founded. In fact the statements made by him in one part of his speech are contradicted by him in other parts of his speech. I do not intend to trouble the House with any explanation in reference to that for I can afford to let it pass. But, Sir, he introduced into the discussion the names of some men who are deemed respectable and trustworthy men and he made a statement that those gentlemen of respectability whose words would be taken, and stated that what I said with reference to them was not accurate. The language of the hon. gentleman was this:

“Now, let me take the hon. gentleman again into my confidence for a few minutes. It is just as well that I should deal with him now. The hon. gentleman took up the Depression Committee report in 1876, and he says, ‘Why, Mr. Gurney is against the National Policy—he is in favor of unrestricted free trade,’ and all that sort of thing. He took Mr. Massey, Mr. Goldie, Mr. Rosamond, and all those gentlemen. Now, let me tell the hon. gentleman that I took the trouble of telegraphing to all these gentlemen to know if what was said of them was correct. I have all their answers, and they are in the negative.”

He made this statement that he telegraphed those gentlemen what I had said in reference to that, and that he had telegrams to say that what I had said was not true, or as he puts it “in the negative.” Now, Sir, there are two points in this. I think the first point is to be found in the telegrams themselves, and that the hon. gentleman was mistaken when he said that he telegraphed what I had said. I think that is very evident, because I see that in the telegram he received from Mr. Goldie, one of the parties mentioned, Mr. Goldie telegraphed this :

Now, I will read all I said with reference to Mr. Goldie, and you will observe that I made no statements that Mr. Goldie was in favor of commercial union, or that he did not consider the country prosperous under the present policy. We are at a disadvantage in not having the telegram which the hon. gentleman sent to these gentlemen. He was asked to say what he had sent, but he did not say it, and I can only imagine what the telegram was from what he received. This is what I said with reference to Mr. Goldie :

"Now, then, I propose to give you the testimony of James Goldie, one of the largest flour manufacturers we have in the country, a gentleman who became a supporter of the National Policy, and who opposed my hon. friend from South Wellington, I think, on three different occasions ; but nevertheless he is one of the largest flour manufacturers in this country, and he was examined in reference to it ; and what is his statement when he is asked whether he, as a manufacturer, would be afraid of reciprocal free trade with the United States and of holding his own with them ?" He was asked :

"If you had free trade with the United States, would you not be able to get wheat in this country from which you could make as good flour as the United States ?"

"He says :

"I would undertake to compete with all the world if we had the United States market to send it to."

"Then he was asked :

"Q. What effect would reciprocity in wheat and flour with the United States have ? A. I would not like to say."

"Q. You think that would be the best thing which could be had ? A. Of course we would not ask any favors."

"Q. At the time you had reciprocity did you not manufacture very largely for the United States ? A. Yes, very largely. And since that, even since paying the duty, I had a large trade—10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 barrels a year."

"It is absurd to state that a manufacturer like James Goldie, who sold 15,000 or 20,000 barrels a year in spite of the duty, could not hold his own under free trade with the United States, with their bars down as well as ours."

Now, Sir, I have read you all I said with reference to Mr. James Goldie. I was reading from the report of the Committee on the trade depression, as the hon. gentleman knows, because he mentioned that in his speech. Now, I will just read what I said in leading up to that :

"Now, I do not wish to read a great deal from the books, but I wish to read something which I think is rather valuable. If you remember, we had a committee on trade depression in the year 1876, when trade was very bad in Canada. There was a committee appointed by the House which took evidence to ascertain what was the cause of the depression in trade and whether any remedy could be applied. Some of the first men of the country were summoned before that committee and examined with reference to the condition of business, and the difficulties in its way. I have not time to read all the evidence ; but there was one question put to all these gentlemen, as to whether reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States would remove the difficulties they were laboring under, the answers to which will be found interesting. Many of those gentlemen were advocates of the National Policy, and were seeking to impress upon the committee the necessity of imposing higher duties, which the right hon. the leader of the Government proceeded to do as soon as he obtained power in 1878."

Those were the remarks I made preliminary to what I read. There could be no mistaking what I read. Everyone observed it ; the hon. member for Lincoln himself observed it, because he stated that I was reading from that report. He then telegraphed to those different men to ask them whether it was correct, and he said he had their answers, and they were in the negative. Now, the public documents are here ; they are parts of the public property of the country ; and it is not a question of veracity between Mr. Goldie, Mr. Massey, Mr. Rosamond and others and myself ; it is a question of veracity between these gentlemen and the public documents of this country, which hon. gentlemen have in their hands ; and the position the hon. gentleman has got those gentlemen in is this, that he has —

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should not argue. It is quite within his right to make a statement, but I think to argue it is going a little too far.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, if I should be hampered too much, I shall have to ask some one to move an adjournment, but I do not wish to detain the House ; but when the hon. gentleman says he has telegrams from gentlemen of standing in the country stating that what I said with reference to them is not true, I cannot afford to let that pass.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not propose to check the hon. gentleman in making his explanation at all. It is quite within his right.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman says he telegraphed to Mr. Massey, among others, and that he has a telegram from Mr. Massey saying that what I stated was not correct. The hon. gentleman says in reference to that telegram :

"I also telegraphed Mr. Massey of Toronto. The reply I got was : I certainly do not favor unrestricted reciprocity to National Policy."

Well, what did I say with reference to Mr. Massey ?

"The Massey Manufacturing Company were not able to come here before the committee, but they sent a letter. They are known to be one of the largest firms we have in Canada, and they sent the following letter :—

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to a communication received this day from the Clerk of Commons, would say : We are engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements and farm machinery. Our average trade is about $100,000 per annum, and this season we are increasing the business about 20 per cent., and with very fair prospects. During the past season we did a foreign trade in Germany to the extent of some $3,000 or $10,000, and we anticipate a continuation of that trade. We may also add that the existing tariff is satisfactory to us, and is sufficient protection ; perhaps even a little less would also be. A still further advance in the tariff would certainly prove adverse to our interests."

That is all I said with reference to the Massey firm. I simply read their letter. The hon. gentleman says he telegraphed to them among others to ask if what I said was correct, and that he had their answer, and it was in the negative. Their answer is :

"I certainly do not favor unrestricted reciprocity to National Policy." Who said they did ? Certainly it was not I. The hon. gentleman tells us that he telegraphed to those gentlemen stating what I had said, and asking for an answer, and that they had virtually stated that what I said was not true. Then he said he telegraphed to Mr. Gurney, and he read a letter from Mr. Gurney :

"This is an important letter coming from one's own town. I have here a letter from Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, who has sent it to me unsolicited. It reads as follows :—

"I am informed this morning that I have been quoted as a manufacturer in favor of reciprocity with the United States. To this I would give a most unequivocal denial. Were I called upon to say whether my individual business could compete with United States manufacturers, I should probably declare my belief that it could, but that is not the question, but would it be wise to readjust my whole business, involving the sacrifice of two-thirds of my plant, on the basis of a treaty with such neighbors as we have on our southern border, to which I reply it would be the greatest blunder ever advocated by a business man, and what applies to the individual is equally applicable to the whole manufacturing and mercantile community. I write this with some haste, as I leave immediately."

"That is the letter sent to me by Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, without his being solicited for it or even spoken to."

There Mr. Gurney states that he had been informed that I had stated certain things. The hon. gentleman referred to that after recess, when he said :

"I read a letter from Mr. Gurney, of Hamilton, a gentleman whom I have never met, but who, having listened to the hon. member for South Brant in this House, for he had occupied a seat in the gallery during a part of the hon. gentleman's speech, voluntarily wrote me this letter in which he says that the statement of the hon. member for South Brant with reference to him was not correct."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did he say that in his letter.

Mr. RYKERT. You heard the letter read.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did he say that I made a statement that was not correct.

"Mr. RYKERT. He said he understood you had said so, and it was not correct."

Now, I have read the letter Mr. Gurney wrote, and I think you will admit that he does not there state that what I had said with reference to him was not correct. Mr. Gurney could not do it, none of those gentlemen could do it, because I read from the public documents; and it would not be a question of veracity as between me and those gentlemen, but it would be a question of veracity as between those gentlemen themselves and the public documents. The hon. gentleman quoted Mr. Rosamond as one to whom he had telegraphed in reference to this matter. He said:

"I have also a telegram from Mr. Rosamond, of Almonte, another gentleman quoted by the hon. member:

"Paterson's statement altogether incorrect. Am as much in favor of National Policy as I ever was. Totally opposed to any agreement with the United States that would interfere with Canada's right to regulate her own tariff."

I would like to know what telegram was sent to Mr. Rosamond so as to bring a reply such as that. The hon. gentleman is bound in honor to produce that telegram in order to verify to the House this statement that he had telegraphed this gentleman what I said and that he replied my statement was not correct. I will here read what I said in reference to Mr. Rosamond.

"B. Rosamond, woollen cloth factory, representing the tweed industry, the strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and their candidate in the election—let me read what Mr. Rosamond says with reference to our woollen cloth industry, on page 208:

"Q. Is the present rate of duty satisfactory to you? A. Yes, under ordinary circumstances it would be. We are in an exceptional position, being alongside of a country which has a high tariff against us; but, under ordinary circumstances it would be satisfactory. The duty is certainly high enough; if we had a country alongside of us which was reasonable, as our people are disposed to be, we would have no difficulty."

"Q. You would be content to have reciprocity with the United States? A. Yes, I believe it would be for the benefit of everybody."

"That is the testimony of Mr. Rosamond, of the woollen mills. I am afraid I have wearied the House with these quotations, but I thought it would be worth while to place the views of this gentleman upon record in order to show that he and others, who were contending against the Americans when gold was 112 and when there was only a 17½ cents tariff here, were willing and able, under those circumstances, before they had acquired the strength they have now after many years' prosperity, they were willing then and anxious, 'they were ready to hold up both hands,' as some of them expressed it, for reciprocal free trade with the United States."

Those were my closing remarks. I state that those gentlemen, at that time, declared they were ready to have reciprocal free trade with the United States; and evidently the hon. member for Lincoln, judging by the telegrams which he received from these gentlemen, telegraphed them—he can set himself right by producing the messages he sent—not what I said, but that I said these gentlemen were in favor of commercial reciprocity or commercial union, or something of that kind, and in this way got the answers from them which he read. He placed those replies before the House, thinking he would thus weaken the statement I had just made. I was called to order when I interrupted the hon. gentleman, but when a direct misstatement, a positive misstatement, was made, when a statement which, it seems to me, the hon. gentleman must have known was a misstatement, was made by him, I conceived it to be my duty to do as I did, to nail the misstatement at the time, so that when the hon. gentleman's speech went to the country, the denial would go with it. The hon. gentleman did not mend matters after dinner for Mr. Rosamond, because evidently he had taken a little alarm at the questions put to him in the afternoon, and during recess sent another telegram:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman's object is to put himself right; he has no right to put anybody else wrong.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) This is what the hon. gentleman said after recess:

"Since my observations, this afternoon, I caused a telegram to be sent to Mr. Rosamond, to which the hon. gentleman will probably not take any exception. Why did the hon. gentleman quote Mr. Rosamond and Mr. Gurney and all those manufacturers, if not to show that they were in favor of the resolution; if not to show that they were opposed to ordinary reciprocity, but were in favor of this resolution. This telegram was sent to Mr. Rosamond:"

"When you stated, in 1876, before the Depression Committee that reciprocity would be of benefit to everybody, did you mean unrestricted reciprocity or a renewal of the old reciprocity treaty?"

"The answer is:

"The old reciprocity treaty, certainly."

That, we are told, is the telegram the hon. gentleman received. Of course it is not signed here, and I have to take the hon. member's word that he received that telegram. Let us see if what it contains is what Mr. Rosamond did really say. I have read already the question put to him:

"Q. You will be content to have reciprocity with the United States? A. Yes, I believe it would be for the benefit of everybody."

But there were further questions put to Mr. Rosamond bearing upon this last question which the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) put to him by telegram:

"Q. In what way would reciprocity prevent the competition from English goods of which you complain? A. It would not prevent it. That has always been a difficulty, but so long as the country was prosperous we did not feel very much inconvenienced by it."

If that was the old reciprocity treaty, what had it to do with English goods?

"Mr. Platt asked: You would have a larger field if you had reciprocity with the United States? A. Yes."

And this is the gentleman whom the hon. member gets to telegraph here that when he gave that evidence it was the old Reciprocity Treaty he meant, although the answers I have read show that he was questioned with reference to the effect it would have on his own business. The hon. member has brought these gentlemen to disprove statements which I have made, but they have utterly failed, and all he succeeded in doing was to show that he must have sent telegrams to them which did not give, with accuracy, the purport of my remarks. He has endeavored to get these gentlemen to make a public denial of their own statements, which are set down in the public records of the country, but they are not so much to blame, as they have evidently been misled by the telegrams sent them by the hon. member. I desired to say this much, and I repeat I would not have taken the trouble that I have, had it been a simple question of veracity between the hon. gentleman and myself, but when he assumes to bring forward gentlemen like Mr. Massey, Mr. Rosamond, Mr. Gurney and others, to say that what I stated was not correct, I thought it due to myself to make the explanations I have made.

Mr. RYKERT. I claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while I reply to the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has said that I refused to produce the telegrams that I sent. But I did not refuse to do so. I had not the telegrams that I sent, and therefore could not produce them, but I told the hon. gentleman the contents of the telegrams, namely, that the hon. gentleman had argued that these people were in favor of commercial union or commercial reciprocity. That was the purport and the contents of the telegrams which I sent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then you said what was not correct.

Mr. RYKERT. I was induced to send those telegrams in consequence of a letter which I had received from Mr. Gurney, a gentleman whom I never knew, and who sent me this letter unsolicited. I read the letter to this House, and it was as follows:—

"I am informed this morning that I have been quoted as a manufacturer in favor of reciprocity with the United States. To this I give the most emphatic and unequivocal denial."

In consequence of the receipt of that letter, I thought I would telegraph to the other gentlemen. I was also told that Mr. Gurney had been in the gallery. Whether he was there the whole time or not I cannot possibly say. But I pointed that out in my speech last night, and also that the hon. member for South Brant had argued that those gentlemen were in favor of reciprocity still. Otherwise why did he quote them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I did not argue that.

Mr. RYKERT. Then why did the hon. gentleman quote them?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have read you why.

Mr. RYKERT. And that was the very reason why I referred to the matter. If the hon. gentleman did not argue that these gentlemen were in favor of reciprocity now, what object had he in quoting them? His quotations had no meaning whatever. The hon. gentleman read the report of depression. What is the evidence he brings? A testimony for what purpose? They were in favor of the resolutions which are now before the House. If it was not for that purpose, for what reason was it? In consequence of that, I telegraphed to those gentlemen and I got the answer. The hon. gentleman says I suppressed the telegram, I will give him the authority to get the telegrams if he likes?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You said you telegraphed what I said.

Mr. RYKERT. There was no use in his using these at all, unless it was to show that they were in favor of this resolution. He calls my veracity in question. I have told the House what I said. I put the worst possible feature upon it. I told them that Mr. Paterson had led the House to believe that they were in favor of this resolution, and I asked, are you in favor of it or are you not? Was I right or was I wrong?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am glad that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has introduced this resolution. It is only a continuation of the policy of the Liberal party for many many years. The Liberal party has always advocated the greatest freedom that can be obtained for trade and commerce. This is only a continuance of the doctrines that have been proclaimed by them ever since the formation of the Liberal party, and, as one who believes in Liberal principles and in freedom of trade and commerce, I naturally hail this resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford with a great deal of pleasure. The amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is quite antagonistic, as I would expect it would be, to the resolution of the member for South Oxford. It proposes a very different basis from that which is laid down by the hon. member for South Oxford, and now we have before the country two distinct issues. We have the old and liberal platform of the Liberal party as enunciated in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, and we have the contracted trade resolution contained in the amendment of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There are two distinct issues before the people. We appeal to the people on these issues, and we ask the people to say whether they are prepared to have greater freedom of trade, to open up negotiations for a larger market for their produce, or whether they are not. Since this discussion commenced, since the discussion of the principle and the details of the resolution have been discussed, we have lost a valued member of this House. The late member for Missisquoi has passed away. He was a man who stood high in the feelings of the members of this House, who stood high in the opinions of his friends, and who was not very much opposed by those on the other side. He has passed away, but, I think, before his death the hon. member for South Oxford had introduced this resolution. He died, the writ was issued by the Speaker, and an election was held in the constituency of Missisquo, where it was said that this distinguished man, this able man, Mr. Claves, by his personal popularity, had been able to wrest a constituency which has been almost always during its history a Tory constituency. At that time there were three candidates in the field, two of them on the Tory side, while Mr. Claves was the candidate of the Liberal party. Now, an election has been held in the constituency to-day, and the candidate favoring unrestricted reciprocity has been returned by a majority of 216. The people, on the first occasion on which they have had the opportunity, have pronounced in no uncertain way in regard to the measure that we now have before the House. I understand that, during the campaign, this was the only measure discussed before the people in that constituency, that it was the question upon which Mr. Meigs, the candidate of the Liberal party, took issue with Mr. Baker, who opposed this measure, who favored the shutting up and closing of our markets, and allowing no exist to the producers of this country, and who was opposed to greater freedom of trade such as it proposed by the resolution now before the House. I will now, for a few moments, allude to some of the speeches delivered on the other side of the House, and I wish to do so in such a manner as not to give offence to any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. I know they are a very thin-skinned set of individuals, and I want to conduct this discussion in a proper manner, in a business-like manner, in a spirit of fair play. The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) told us that, during the time that Mr. Mackenzie was in power, there was scarcely an industry in Montreal existing except the soup kitchen, that the country was being ruined and going to the dogs, that there were no manufactures, that all the furnaces were closed and all the blasts had gone out. Is it not rather singular that, when that hon. gentleman made that statement in this House as a responsible representative of the people, we find that, in the year 1878, there was an export of manufactured goods of something like $2,000,000 more than there was in 1887? He speaks of this great policy that was initiated after the defeat of Mr. Mackenzie, and he says that laborers were idle, that people were unemployed, notwithstanding that they were enabled to export to foreign countries $5,730,000, whereas last year we only exported a little over $3,000,000. What can be thought, in a deliberative assembly such as this of an hon. gentleman rising in this House, and making such a statement, when all the facts and all the history are against him? At that time the country was flourishing, the exports and the imports were large, and the price paid for grain in this country is an indication that we were then flourishing. The only industry that was struggling at that time was that of the Tory politicians who were then sitting on this side of the House, and they never lost an opportunity to decry the prosperity of this country at that time. Born as I was in Canada, and professing to be loyal to Canada and to the mother country, I have sat here many a time and hung my head to think that there could be men found in this country, representing the people of Canada, and giving utterances to sentiments so unworthy of them, and so much at variance with the truth at that time. The hon. gentleman spoke about Ireland and said that free trade had been the ruin of Ireland. Does he not know, has he not studied the history of Ireland sufficiently to know, that that history proclaims that it was the condition of Ireland that converted Sir Robert Peel from the doctrine of protection to the doctrine of free trade, and induced him to open the ports of Ireland and to give to the struggling people of that country relief by getting in foreign grain? The hon. gentleman must know, if he had given any attention to the history of Ireland, that this was the condition of affairs, and that this was the reason why this measure of relief was afforded to the Irish people. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) state to-day that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) occupies such a high place in the affections of the people he represents. Until I heard that statement, I really thought that, politically speaking, the sands of that hon. gentleman's hour-glass were giving out; but I am glad to have it on the authority of the hon. member for Welland, that that gentleman enjoys the confidence of his people, and that, by means of a Franchise Act, and by means of a Gerrymander Act he is able to boast in this House of his majority in his constituency. The hon. member for Lincoln did something which I consider he should not have done.

Mr. RYKERT. Does the hon. gentleman refer to me as being gerrymandered?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Certainly I do.

Mr. RYKERT. How?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will explain it to you.

Mr. RYKERT. You had better. I had a majority of 500.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, that is but a detail. Now, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Fergusson) objected to Canada having her middlemen in New York instead of Montreal, Quebec and Toronto. Why, that sentiment finds an echo in the bosom of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House. That is what we contend for, and it is the policy of this Government that has driven our exportation to New York instead of to England; it is the discriminating tendency of the policy of this Government that has driven our trade from England to the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hon. gentlemen laugh, but they have not studied the Trade and Navigation Returns, because if they had they would set to work and endeavor to devise something that would show to this country in louder terms than their words, the genuineness of their allegiance to Britain, by not submitting a policy that was discriminating against the mother country and in favor of the United States. In 1878 we exported of farm produce to the United States $25,244,893; in 1887 we exported to the United States $37,660,199, an increase to the United States in that period of $12,415,301. Now, look at the difference between the exports of the United States and those to Britain, the mother land, the land that we boast of, from which we are proud of having descended, on this side of the House, at least—and we show our loyalty by protesting whenever an injustice is done to the mother land, and we endeavor to secure an amendment to their policy so that the mother country may not be discriminated against. Now, in 1878, we exported to the mother country $45,941,539; in 1878, under the policy of the hon. gentlemen, under the policy of these loyal gentlemen, we exported to Great Britain, $44,571,846, a decrease of exports in that period, of $1,329,692. Now, Sir, I gladly welcome the hon. member for Welland to this side of the House in that sentiment. I gladly take him by the hand in wishing that this policy may be changed so that our middlemen may not go to New York, driven there by a policy which discriminates against the mother country. I am sorry the hon. member for Welland is not in his seat. He could hardly go with us in every policy of our party, but he goes with us that far. But then he had to have a fling at gentlemen on this side of the House, about having, at some period of their public career, said something in favor of Dakota. Well, now, that hon. gentleman comes here and boasts of his loyalty, and he deprecates anything being said indicating that the prosperity of Dakota is greater than the prosperity of Canada. Now, I do not wish to do the hon. gentleman any injustice, nor would I do any hon. gentleman in this House an injustice if I knew it. I will, therefore, quote what he said in the matter in a speech which he delivered in this House in 1884. The hon. gentleman at that time was speaking in reference to a loan for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and here is what he said:

"We find, Sir, in the State of Kansas—with its miasmatic fevers and the pestilence that follows, without a solitary drop of water that is fit to drink, without a solitary bit of material for the construction of buildings, in that State, which has, I am told, been lauded highly by hon. gentlemen of the Opposition in days gone by—in that State, where people have to live in dug-outs, the population has increased from 417,659 in 1870, to 1,080,000 in 1880."

That is the hon. gentleman who would not say a word in favor of Dakota, and that is the hon. gentleman who lectures us on this side of the House for having said, at any time, that the settlement of those new States was more rapid than that of our own country. There is a reason for this. The land regulations in those new States were much more liberal than the regulations made by hon. gentlemen opposite; there is no doubt about that. Our country is a better country than theirs, our land is better and more fertile than theirs, and if it were not for the stupidity—I use the word in a political sense—of our Government, there would not be very much difference between those States and our own country, indeed I believe we would have had the larger settlement. I can speak from personal knowledge. I can give the names of a number of people who went to our own Canadian North-West to buy land, where they might make homes for themselves, and I know that by the land regulations of this Government they were deprived of that privilege, as I will show later on. Now, the hon. member for Welland on the same occasion said:

"Yet with all these drawbacks, the population of Dakota has increased from 14,181 in 1870, to no less than 135,137 in 1880. Why, it has almost multiplied its population by ten in the short period of ten years."

Now, I think that is all I will read from the speech of the hon. member for Welland. He boasted of the success of the Government policy in the last election. Well, I declare that if I were sitting on that side of the House, that is the very last thing I would boast of. When the Government went to the people, did they go on the same basis or appeal to the same electorate that they did before? No. They carried an Act through this House that was unjust in almost every provision of it. They did that, I fully believe, with the purpose of strengthening themselves in power. They did not take a bold British course on that occasion. I do not know what course you might choose to term it, but I say it was a course unworthy of a great party, unworthy of the Conservative party; for the Conservative party is a great party, there are many great and good men in that party, and I am surprised that there are so many of these good men who would lend themselves to such an infamous measure as the Franchise Act. Now, I will give a little attention to the hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth). He made a very calm and moderate speech, and I consider, for a Tory, he made a pretty truthful speech. I do not know but that that speech does him a great deal of credit. To those of us who have sat on this side of the House for some time, it is somewhat refreshing to see an hon. gentleman get up and speak plainly and honestly as the hon. member for South Victoria has done. He says—I do not like the sentiment, but it is the Tory sentiment, nevertheless—that education and accomplishments are not appreciated in this country, and the people who possess them go to the United States. The hon. gentleman gave instances from his own riding, and he tells us that he would not do anything that would weaken the bond that binds us to the mother country, and yet, he makes that utterance which I believe is as severe a stab against the people of Canada as can possibly be pronounced. He tells us that Scotchmen go to London and Canadians go to the United States. There is the difference. He says that Scotchmen only continue in the mother country while our people go and live under a hostile flag and in a foreign land. If our people leave Toronto and go to reside in Montreal, Halifax, Quebec, Winnipeg, the North-West Territories or Victoria, then we should be glad of it, but the hon. gentleman was honest enough to admit that there is an exodus going on and that the prices of farm lands and other lands have not improved as they should have improved. I have here a statement in regard to the assessed value of the town of Lindsay down to 1886, prepared by the treasurer. While hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the success of the National Policy, we have only to take the assessed value of property to find out how hollow are the claims put forward on behalf of that policy. The people know it, and hon. members in this House, if they would honestly admit it, know that the National Policy has proved a failure as a means of relieving our depression, that it has no power to build up industries, and if we are going to become great, this policy must be changed or otherwise the country must continue to suffer. I will now take the assessed value of the town of Lindsay: it is a beautiful town, it is a lively town, it has been a progressive town, but its prosperity has diminished within the past few years. In 1873, at the time hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, the assessed value of the town was $362,971. In 1878 what was the assessed value? This was the time when soup kitchens were abroad in the land, when all the people had gone to the States, when there was no one at home, according to the loyal utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. The assessed value of the town in that year was $1,403,217. Since then we have had five years of the National Policy. In 1881 the average value was $1,397,731; 1883, $1,379,119; 1886, $1,435,462. During the five years when Mr. Mackenzie was in power, when there were soup kitchens in the land according to hon. gentlemen opposite, the increase in the assessment of Lindsay was 65 per cent. while during the last five years, when we have had the full fruition of the National Policy, the increase has only been three per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that this policy has done a great deal to build up the country, but the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth) was honest enough to tell us that the progress of the town in which he lived, although it is a beautiful town, is not what he would like to see it, and it is not what I would like to see also. From 1873 to 1878 Lindsay sprang up with remarkable rapidity. It appeared to receive a stimulus from the change of Government in 1873 which appears to have been taken away since 1878. The town has stood almost still during the last few years, the increase during the last five years of the National Policy being only 3 per cent. while during the five years of the Mackenzie régime the increase was 65 per cent. It was the hon. member for South Victoria who told us about the soup kitchens. I think when we remember the remarkable progress made by this town while the Mackenzie Government was in power, it comes with bad grace from the mouth of the hon. gentleman, who otherwise spoke so honestly, but he allowed his partisan feelings to carry him away in this matter. He said we must expect an exodus, and we have had an exodus. I will occupy the time of the House for a few moments in discussing the exodus. We were told that so soon as we had completed the Canadian Pacific Railway, the people would flow into Manitoba and the North-West and that country would soon become the home of millions of people. Well, we on this side of the House, sincerely desiring to see that state of things brought about, were willing to do everything in our power to promote such a desirable end. Last year the Government took a census of Manitoba, and what do we find? In Manitoba there are about 108,640 people, in the North-West Territories 48,362, deducting 20,117 Indians leaves the white population of the North-West Territories 28,192. Ten years of Tory administration of North-West affairs has brought about this result. Will any hon. gentleman tell me that, when we consider the fertility of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, the desirable climate there, that there has not been bungling in our North-West policy, that we have not adopted a suicidal policy, a policy that has tended to retard settlement, and at present population is not going in there as we would like to see it. As to the exodus, we know, everybody knows; we do not need to be told that we are disloyal because we know that people are leaving that country. The hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth) may possibly be branded as disloyal because he says people have left this country. If everybody is to be branded for saying that people have left this country, what will be thought of the Premier in 1878? I will read what he said. Speaking of the United States, he says:

"Yet with all their depression, with all their bad trade, and with all their strikes, the people of that country are successfully competing in the English markets, and not only so, but in all the markets to which England has access, beating England out of the field despite those disasters."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who said that?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Sir John Macdonald in 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Impossible.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, he is the gentleman who would not decry the country, he is the gentleman that would not talk of blue ruin, yet he says again:

"True they have suffered as this country has suffered. But there is this difference. We have no manufactures here. We have no work people, our work people have gone off to the United States. They are to be found employed in the Western States, in Pittsburg and in fact in every place where manufactures are going on. These Canadian artisans are adding to the strength, to the power, and to the wealth of a foreign nation instead of adding to ours. Our work people in this country on the other hand are suffering for want of employment. Have not their cries risen to Heaven?"

He was pious then.

"Has not the hon. the Premier been surrounded and besieged even in his own department and on his way to his daily duties by suffering artisans who keep crying out: We are not beggars, we only want an opportunity of helping to support ourselves and our families."

That is the language of the Premier of this country. He complains that we had no manufacturers in this country while that year we exported two million dollars worth more of manufactured goods than we did last year. It is a well known fact that there has been a great deal of money spent in trying to encourage emigration to this country and it is also a very well known fact that that money might as well, for all practical purposes, have been thrown away. The only object it served was to keep camp followers of the Government in situations and to keep languishing industries of that character from starvation. It is told us on the highest authority of fiscal matters in this country, and by the highest authority on fiscal matters in this House, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that of every four emigrants they have being brought into this country, three have left it again and only stayed here for a short time, and having got the advantage of the trip across the ocean they cleared out of the country. This policy gave employment to, I do not know how many cormorants, and it enabled the Government to subsidise a great many journalists. But it did good in that respect, because those journalists told how great and how good and how honest the Government was which brought emigrants across the ocean, who came and stayed in Canada over night and then skipped to the United States. The American consul at Toronto a short time ago reports that he gave certificates to 517 families in the district of Toronto last year who went to the States, and he further reports that those people took capital out of the country to the extent of $1,500,000. The American consul at Ottawa reports that during last year 600 families have left the Ottawa district and settled in the States, probably taking another $1,570,000 capital with them. I made somewhat of an investigation of the exodus and of the number of people going from the country I have the honor to represent some years ago. I made this enquiry from public men and I received the following replies; on 9th April, 1886.

"Markdale—Exodus to United States in past six years from this section—80 families, 220 persons.

" W. M. BROWN."

"Flesherton—Exodus from this section—55 families, 200 persons.

" JOHN GORDON,
" THORPE WRIGHT,
" J. HERD,
" W. M. STRAIN."

" 200 have gone from Glenelg and settled in the States since 1879.

" J. H. HUNTER."

Mr. Hunter is a gentleman who has lived long in that riding.

" Over 30 families have left Normanby and settled in the States since 1879.

" W. H. RYAN."

Mr. Ryan is township treasurer and has been a public officer for a great many years.

" 72 families have left Bentinck and settled in the States since 1879.

" D. McNICHOL."

Mr. McNichol has been reeve of the township and warden of the county for a number of years, and is a worthy and reliable authority.

" Over 40 families have left Egremont and settled in the States since 1879.

" J. MURDOCK."

Mr. Murdoch was reeve of the township and warden of the county. Those, Sir, are reliable figures as far as my own personal knowledge goes and they are to be depended upon. I shall mention to you some cases which came under my own notice as to why our people did not settle in the North-West. I shall mention the case of Mr. Adams. He was an old settler down there and had a flour mill and a saw mill; he had an idea that he would settle in the North-West and he went there and he spent nearly a month there, but when he found land that would please him to settle upon, and when he went to the office to take up that land he found it was owned by some corporation, some colonisation company, some railway company, or some other speculator and he could not get it to settle on. After staying there a month he went across the line and settled in Dakota. I know the case of Mr. Hillis, a large farmer who lived in Normanby and who told me exactly the same story. He went there and he found the influence of monopoly so strong, he found those charges against the land regulations so true, that he had to go across and settle in Dakota. Mr. Fussey told me last year the very same thing. He went to Manitoba but he found it was so much under the power of monopolies, and of corporations, and colonisation companies, that he also went over. Mr. Grant, of Bentinck, also told me the same story, and he left and went to the States. In those four families there are about 40 persons, with a large amount of capital, who were induced to leave our own country of Canada and settle in Dakota. I shall now speak for a few minutes on the resolution before the House, and I would call the attention of the House to a resolution placed before Parliament when the fiscal policy was changed in 1878. There was a resolution introduced into this House at that time, and it is known as the "National Policy resolution." I will read it for the benefit of the House. It was introduced by Sir John Macdonald, the present Premier, and reads:

"That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

Now, gentlemen, you have none of this "blue ruin" in the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford that you have in this resolution. From one end of the country it was a wail to the other, and do you know that the Conservative party in this House at that time took up this wail? They were willing to vote for this resolution, and they formally declared from their seats in Parliament that there was distress, and that people were leaving the country, when there was not one out of every twenty-five as many going to the States as there are going now. The Conservative members were prepared to vote for that which they knew to be almost if not entirely untrue, and this they did with a view of finally getting reciprocity of trade. If there are any of these gentlemen in the House now, to be honest they would have to support the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, because in the resolution they submitted at that time they indicated that that was the object. It was a sharp remedy, they stated, to compel the Americans to give us reciprocity, and that was one of the reasons they held out to those who doubted the wisdom of the course they were taking in order to get a larger support for it than they would otherwise have got. They did not state that they were going to increase the taxation of the people thirteen or fourteen million dollars. When asked by a prominent supporter in St. John if they intended to increase the taxes, the Premier replied that they did not, that they only intended to readjust them. They have not fulfilled the pledges they made in this resolution; but instead of readjusting, they have added to the burdens of the people of this country something like $14,000,000 on the annual expenditure. The Liberal party in this House at that time stood up for the people, as they always stand up for the people. They were not prepared to see the people burdened with any more taxes than they could bear. The Liberal party took the stand then that they are taking now, that the people had enough burdens to bear, and it would not be consistent with the policy of the Liberal party to put any more burdens upon them. Mr. Mackenzie fell while he was fighting for the people of this country, and many of his supporters fell with him. But the day has come, and it would have come before this if it had not been for the Gerrymander and the Franchise Acts. The people would have supported the men who then stood by them, and we would have had a large majority in this House. These gentlemen at that time professed great loyalty; they were ready almost to die for their country; they were sorry to see the struggling industries of this country sinking to ruin and the country going to the dogs. Although Mr. Mackenzie had not added to the burdens of the people, he had two or three Provinces to govern more than his opponents had, and he governed them better than they did; he stilled the tumults that went on in British Columbia, and Quebec and Manitoba; he extinguished the Indian titles in the North-West, and while he stood fighting for the people in the tumult raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, in a moment of forgetfulness the people turned him out of power. Then the other party came in, and the famine in the old country increased the prices of grain, and they said: "We go for a Government that gives us better prices." In a couple of years prices fell, and they said: "What has the Government to do with the prices of grain?" In Mr. Mackenzie's time, when hon. gentlemen told us that the people were leaving the country, the farmers never got less than a dollar a bushel for their wheat. What are they getting to-day? Let the farmers in the House and the country answer. Well, that resolution was defeated in this House, and it ought to be defeated in any British assembly; because the tone of that resolution was not of a character to elevate Canada in the eyes of the world. Imagine the hon. member for South Oxford putting a resolution of that kind on the journals of this House. Why, the hon. member for South Oxford is too loyal to do any thing of that kind; he would not submit to it, and if he did he would find that those who sit behind him would not support him. There were 77 members in this House, however, who voted for it. I say it to the shame of Canada; I say it to the lasting disgrace of the 77 members who voted for the resolution; and it was an infamous resolution to introduce into this House. Now I will show you the patriotism of those who voted for it. They were men who complained that the country was going to ruin, that the hum of industry was not heard in the land, and that we had nothing but soup-kitchens then. We will see how these patriots fared afterwards. Out of the 77, 11 of them have since become Cabinet Ministers, 9 have become senators, 8 have become judges, 22 have got public offices, and 8 are private members of the House. I do not know what offices they have got; but I notice some of them have offices. Among private members there is Mr. Haggart, of North Lanark, who has got an office of prominence and great value; I believe it was the only office the Premier had to give him; that is he made a director of the Empire newspaper. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirpatrick), was one of those who became Speaker in this House, but he has had to retire since, and he is now a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I believe, is standing counsel for the Government in all their losses. There are three or four others. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Ferguson), made a very interesting speech on one occasion on silica and white clay after he had come from a trip through the North-West, where he had been driving over the country on a buckboard. There is no doubt that he has not served the country so well without being rewarded. There are only 12 of those 77 that have been unprovided for; I believe they are all farmers, and I hope in the interest of the farming community the hon. the Minister of Public Works will see that some position is found for them in the Department of Agriculture. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture is here, and I call on him to see that these patriots who voted for this resolution shall be rewarded before they die.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps they have got their timber limits.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, yes. Well, he knows. Mr. Baby was made a Minister of the Crown with a salary of $7,000 a year. Mr. Bowell, the member for North Hastings, became a Cabinet Minister; I believe it was necessary to get a good many deputations down here before he succeeded. Mr. Caron became a Cabinet Minister, and he was awarded knighthood also by Her Majesty on account of his distinguished services in the North-West or somewhere else.

Mr. TAYLOR. What has that to do with reciprocity?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will explain that further on, when I take up that barley question with you. Mr. Costigan became a Cabinet Minister. Sir Hector Langevin also became a Cabinet Minister; Sir John A. Macdonald became a Cabinet Minister; Mr. Masson became a Cabinet Minister; Mr. Mousseau became a Cabinet Minister; Mr. Pope became a Cabinet Minister; another Pope became a Cabinet Minister; Sir Charles Tupper became a Cabinet Minister and High Commissioner; Mr. Bolduc became a Senator; Mr. Gibbs was defeated by the people and became a Senator; Mr. Macdonald became a Senator; Mr. MacKay gave up his seat to the present Postmaster General and became a Senator; Mr. McCallum became a Senator; Mr. Masson was defeated and became a Senator; Mr. Plumb was defeated and afterwards became a Senator; Mr. Robitaille was made Lieutenant Governor and afterward Senator; Mr. Schultz was defeated and he became a Senator—more of these patriots. Mr. Baby became a judge; Mr. Brooks became a judge; Mr. Cimon was made a judge; Mr. Gill was made a judge; Mr. McDougall became a judge;—he gave up his seat to Sir Hector Langevin. Mr. Mousseau was made a judge; Mr. Palmer was made a judge; Mr. Ryan was made a judge. Then let us see who were appointed to public offices. Mr. Blanchet received a public office; Mr. Colby received a public office; Mr. Dewdney received a public office; Mr. Currier received a public office; Mr. Farrow received a public office; Mr. Fraser received a public office; Mr. Méthot received a public office; Mr. Orton received a public office; Mr. Robinson was made Lieutenant Governor of Ontario; Mr. Rouleau was made Deputy Clerk in the House; Mr. Stephenson was made Inspector of Colonisation Companies; Mr. Ouimet was made Speaker. Yes, Ouimet, the Riellite, was made Speaker; he who voted like myself, regretting the execution of Riel, and who, like myself, was branded as a renegade, and a coward, and a traitor, and a knave, and a fool, was made Speaker, I suppose, because of the persecution he had suffered. There were altogether 20 of them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have permitted a very long digression, and the hon. gentleman has diverged sufficiently far from the subject matter before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am very glad you stopped me, Sir, for I have finished on that point. We will look and see what the National Policy has done. We will take up the exports and imports of the Dominion for the last two years, and see what the National Policy has done. I have examined the blue books very carefully, and, as one born in Canada, I must say they do not give me as much encouragement as I would like to derive from them. The hon. member for East Huron quoted from the blue books of the Customs Department, and I was astonished to see the spectacled gentleman from Hamilton getting up and declaring that the blue books of the Department of Customs were not reliable, but that he will quote from a report which was reliable—the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States. These are the loyal people who will not take their own blue books; these are the honest representatives of the people who deny their own blue books. Take the summary statement of our exports for the year 1877, the year when everything was going to the dogs. Our exports then were as follows:—

|---------------------------|---------------------|
| Products of the mine..... | $ 3,787,802 |
| Fisheries..... | 5,501,221 |
| Forests..... | 20,542,635 |
| Animals..... | 14,645,168 |
| Agriculture..... | 26,308,689 |
| Manufactures..... | 5,767,747 |
| Miscellaneous..... | 543,548 |
| Total..... | $77,096,810 |

Now, in 1887, when we had the National Policy in full vigor, what do the returns show? They show our exports as follows:—

|---------------------------|---------------------|
| Products of the mine..... | $ 3,805,959 |
| Fisheries..... | 6,875,810 |
| Forests..... | 20,484,746 |
| Animals..... | 24,246,937 |
| Agriculture..... | 18,826,235 |
| Manufactures..... | 3,079,972 |
| Miscellaneous..... | 644,361 |
| Total .. | $77,964,020 |

So that our exports of manufactures in the year of grace 1887, tell it not aloud, ye boasters of the success of your vaunted National Policy, were actually less than in 1877. Of these exports, we sent to Great Britain $4,457,312 and to the United States $34,658,275. Hon. gentlemen will see that in 1877, when we had no manufacturing industries at all, according to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, we exported of manufactured goods to the old country and to the United States $5,767,747, while in 1887, we only exported $3,079,972 worth, or a falling off of a little over $2,000,000. But these hon. gentlemen will say there is more used at home, and that the farmers are better off and can buy more now. They can get 70 cents for their wheat now, but they got $1.50 then. What is the use of talking nonsense like that to the farmers or to other people? But then hon. gentlemen opposite will say that we are importing more raw material which enter into manufactures and that we have large manufacturing industries? Let us see if that is the case. Take the imports of wool for 1875 and 1878 and for 1884 and 1885. We find that in 1875 we imported of raw wool, 7,947,870 lbs. and in 1878 6,230,084 lbs. or a total of 14,170,693. In 1884, on the other hand, we imported 6,182,421 lbs. and in 1885, 7,759,554, or a total of 13,941,975 lbs., showing a falling off in 1884 and 1885 of 1,000,000 lbs. as compared with 1875 and 1878, when, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, they had nothing in Montreal but soup kitchens. I want to show you how the balance of trade has been against England. I want to show you how all those loyal people who say we are rebels and annexationists sit quietly in the House and allow this thing to continue without raising their loyal voices on behalf of old England, although they say they are prepared to shed every drop of their blood sooner than weaken the bonds that bind them to the mother land. Of goods in 1875 we imported as follows:—

|-------------------------------------|--------------|
| From Great Britain, dutiable.. .. . | $14,239,519 |
| From United States do | 22,023,665 |
| Free goods from Great Britain..... | 11,167,963 |
| Free goods from United States..... | 28,779,234 |

Or a total from Great Britain of $60,000,000, and from the United States of $50,000,000. In 1885 how did it stand? We imported from Great Britain $41,000,000, and from the United States $47,000,000. In 1886, we imported $41,407,777 from Great Britain, and $47,151,201 from the United States. In 1887, we imported $40,601,199 from Great Britain and $44,858,039 from the United States. I want hon. gentlemen to pay attention to this. In 1886, we imported from Great Britain over $41,000,000, on which we collected a duty amounting to $7,616,249, and on the larger amount which we imported from the United States of $47,000,000, we only charged a duty of $6,624,100. In 1887, we imported from Great Britain $40,601,199, on which we charged a duty of $7,817,357, and we imported from the United States $44,858,039, on which we only charged a duty of $6,769,384. The United States is the only market for a great deal of the products of the farmers. There is no interest in this country which is equal to the farming interest for its vast proportions, which gives employment to a greater number of people, which gives a home to a greater number of people, and, if the farming industry is not prosperous, if the farmers of Canada are not doing well, no other branch of industry is doing well; but, if the farmers are doing well, every other industry must do well; the manufacturing industry must thrive if the farming interest thrives, and that, I suppose, is the reason why we imported such a comparatively small quantity of manufacturing goods last year, because the farming interest was not prospering as we would like to see it. Now, take the exports of our farming products and what do we find? Last year we exported to Great Britain 329 horses, and to the United States 18,225 horses. Of horned cattle, we exported to Great Britain 63,622, and to the United States 45,765. We exported to Great Britain 68,543 sheep and to the United States 363,046. We exported cheese to Great Britain amounting to 73,185,717 lbs., and to the United States 304,318 lbs. I may say for the benefit of hon. members on the other side, that this is one industry which is not affected by the National Policy, and it has therefore grown to be a great industry in this country; and probably if they had left other industries alone, as they have the cheese industry, they would probably have flourished in the same way. Last year we exported butter to Great Britain to the amount of 4,076,365 lbs., and to the United States to the amount of 100,895 lbs. The United States is the best market for our eggs. Last year we exported to the United States 12,907,956 dozen of eggs, of the value of $1,821,364. I see that, under the National Policy, there was a provision made, which was considered to be a very wise provision by the promoters of the National Policy, in regard to some of the articles which were the produce of the farm, that, as soon as the United States remitted the duty on those articles, the Government here took the power to remit the duty on them when they were imported into this country. I see that the United States have removed the duty on several of these articles, and that this Government have failed to carry out the understanding which they agreed to by this Act of Parliament, and have refused to do it unless every article which is enumerated in that Act is put on the free list by the United States; and, by what I see in the Free Press of the city, it is rumoured in Washington that they are going to retaliate, and that, if this Government do not keep faith according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament which was passed here, retaliation will be adopted against the people of Canada. If the United States retaliate, and put a duty on eggs, what would become of our egg business? And the same may be said of other articles which are the produce of the farm. It is to be hoped that the Government will look into this matter, and see that the faith to which they are pledged by an Act of Parliament is kept with the United States and with this Parliament. I see that there is one industry which has grown amazingly under the National Policy. It was very insignificant when Mr. Mackenzie was in power, but it has grown wonderfully since,—I refer to the importation of rags. I find that in 1877, we only imported $92,179 worth of rags, but, under the benign influence of the National Policy and the development of the country and of manufactures which has taken place, last year we imported $193,029 worth of rags. That I suppose is an indication of the revival of the industries of the country. You would almost imagine that, since the National Policy was brought about, nothing was brought into this country, because they promoted it under a promise that nothing should be brought into competition either with our farmers or with our manufacturers. While they told our farmers that they were going to protect them, and particularly in the article of wool, still they have allowed wool to come into the country to as great an extent as ever, and, although they have taxed many things which our farmers bring into the country from the other side, they have not prevented the importation of wool. For these and other reasons, I favor the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. I believe it will be in the best interests of this country if that resolution passes this House and becomes effective with the United States, if we can get a larger market for our farmers, for our manufacturers, and for every other class of people. I do not believe that it is going to injure any of the industries of this country, but I do believe that it will make our farmers so much richer, and that they will therefore consume so much more of the manufactured articles of the country than they do now. I do not believe that it is in the interest of this country to keep up manufacturing industries at a high tariff for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of the manufacturers, by enabling them to charge higher prices than the consumer ought to pay. I am in favor of the manufacturers, I would like to see them prosper, but I believe there are many in this country which if they do not get more protection, must evidently go to the wall. Now, about the slaughter market. They used to tell us how the manufactured goods of this country had to enter into competition with the American goods that were sold here at slaughter prices, and they told us that this would be all done away with under the National Policy. Well, now, last year we bought of manufactured goods from abroad $9,914,824, and in the year 1887, the total importation of manufactured goods reached $15,606,944, or a slaughter market established to the tune of $4,000,000 more than we had then. Our imports do not indicate that we are improving, or that the country is growing as rapidly as it should. The total imports in 1877 were $99,000,000; in 1878, $93,000,000; in 1885, $23,000,000; in 1887, $112,000,000. So that our importations are not as great now as they were 10 years ago. That is not a satisfactory state of things for this country. Now, Sir, I am very glad that we have a clear and distinct issue before the people. The Liberal party takes its stand upon this question, as it did at its organisation, for greater liberty and greater freedom of every description so long as it conduces to the well-being of the country. We believe in giving a larger market to our farmers, and to our manufacturers, and to all other classes of the people, and we do not believe in under-rating the power, and the ability, and the worth of the Canadian people. We hear hon. gentlemen opposite telling us that they are afraid of the United States people, that our own people are powerless to keep pace in the race of progress with the United States. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, sitting here as a native Canadian, that I believe, as a true Briton, and I feel that I am a British subject in every sense of the word, and I hurl back to the hon. gentlemen their epithet and the insult that they apply to the native-born Canadians in this country, when they tell us that man for man, in a fair field and without any favor, the people of Canada are not the peers of any people on the face of God's footstool. I have listened with a considerable amount of indignation at the statement, at the disloyal utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, towards the people of Canada, to see them stand up in this House and tell us that the Canadians, the English, the Irish, the Scotch, the Germans, and the French, who have settled in this country, are not able to compete with the Americans in a fair field. Why, I do not think that anything more disloyal can be said by hon. gentleman on the other side, and I hope that they will have sufficient respect for my feelings, if not for themselves, not to repeat it again in this House. Well, what are we going to do if this resolution should carry and unrestricted reciprocity become a fact between the United States and Canada? What would happen? We would lose revenue, but that can be easily made up. We have statesmen on this side of the House who can grapple with that question.

Mr. HESSON. How?

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will show you when we get a chance. It is a very simple problem, but it would be a very difficult problem for the hon. gentlemen in power, because they do not understand the principles of economy, they never practise economy, it is foreign to their nature. They have accumulated such a debt, and the expenditure of this country has advanced so rapidly, that it would be almost impossible for this country to retrieve itself unless a check is put on. Well, you might save nearly half a million by knocking out that cruel and unjust Franchise Act. You might strike off the Superannuation Fund.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We heard all this before.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, but you must have line upon line, and precept upon precept. You don't like to hear it, because I believe there is a little honesty about you if you only had courage enough to assert it, and I believe you would, but the party will not allow you. I think, perhaps, we could dispense with the Senate; I think that there might be more life infused into those dry bones at a less price than we have to pay. Now, there was another matter which cost this country good deal, and I told the Government at the time that it was an improper expense. I refer to the expense for the Liquor License Act. It was brought in by the Premier himself, and I think that the Premier after he introduced it, very soon began to see that there was something shaky about it, and he did not like to injure his reputation by continuing to father the measure, and so he transferred it to his standing counsel, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and it became known as the McCarthy Act. It passed this House, and it cost this country over $300,000. What for? So that they could get their heels on the neck of the liquor interest in this country, so that they could make them turn in and vote for the Government. Well, there are many things just like that, that we all know could be done away with, and yet the public interest of this country would not suffer at all, and the service of the country would be just as efficiently performed. Now, there is another matter I would like to refer to before I sit down. I think it was the Minister of Marine who stated that this country pronounced unmistakably in favor of the Government at the last election. You would imagine, when you heard that statement, that the people almost unanimously pronounced in favor of the Government, and you would think that the representation in the House would bear some comparison with the vote that was polled. Now, I took the trouble the other day to compute the number of votes that were polled in those elections, 1898, and I just want to show the Minister of Marine, when he makes that statement in future, that he should consider how it has been brought about, and how it is that the Government in this House have so large a majority. The total Tory vote polled at the last election was 332,481, the total Liberal vote was 326,967, the total majority in the 1898 elections being 5,518. A change of 2,700 votes would give the Liberal party a majority, and while hon. gentlemen talk of British fair play and British loyalty and denounce us as being disloyal, they are willing to sit in this House in proportion of about 130 or 137 to 75 members, when they have polled scarcely any more votes than the Liberal party in this country. The Liberal party to-day with a fair field would wipe out this Government, so that it would never recover, and it would be the best thing that ever happened to Canada. A change of 15 votes in each of those constituencies would humble hon. gentlemen who now boast of their strength and would place the Liberals in power, if the representation was just. The representation is not just, it is far from being fair, manly and British, and this country has a right to expect that there should be fair play between parties. If there is not fair play between political parties, where should we expect fair play to be found? It is the duty of the Government and the Opposition to show an example of fair play and manly square dealing. I should think hon. gentlemen opposite would blush for shame when they came here with only a very small majority, and yet possessed such a large proportionate number of members, and that at the same time boast that the country has pronounced so strongly in their favor. I do not believe the country is much in their favor, and I am quite sure if we could get a fair and unbiased expression of their opinion with the ridings unchanged we would carry the country. When Mr. Mackenzie went out to the country he did not carve up the constituencies, but he went to the constituencies on the same bases as he had been elected on—he was manly enough to do that; and if we are going to make of Canada a nation of which we and our children should feel proud we should do nothing to bring the blush of shame to the face of any Canadian or British subject, or allow any blot to remain that was unfair, ungenerous and un-British in any particular. I have reason to expect that this resolution will carry. I expect that fifteen of those patriots who voted for the National Policy will every one vote for reciprocity, and I expect those few hon. members who are not in the Ministry will vote for the resolution. I expect that the Minister of Finance will vote for it. The Minister of Finance was in favor of reciprocity then, and he said:

"We believe that reciprocity, which has been advocated by all parties and classes in the country, is clearly identified with the policy we have pursued and that we propose to pursue."

Again he said:

"When capital is driven away, the people of Canada go after that capital, and where employment is furnished them; and this is what the hon. gentleman's policy has resulted in."

The exodus is now going on; I have shown that to be the case. The hon. gentleman said further:

"Now I say if you want to knit this whole country together from end to end, you must knit it together commercially."

He further said:

"Now, there is another reason why we should have a different tariff with the United States. I have said before that, as far as England is concerned, while we are most anxious to preserve her institutions and adopt her policy, as far as they are adapted to our own country, we feel as Canadians that we must look at the position in which we stand in relation to the fiscal policy of the great nation alongside of us."

The hon. gentleman could not be content unless he had a little wail. The hon. gentleman spoke of good crops, but he complained that prices were very low, only $1.50 a bushel for wheat. The hon. gentleman also said:

"Well, Sir, what has the hon. gentleman to propose in the present disastrous state of affairs? What has he to propose in view of the suffering industries of this country? What has the hon. gentleman to propose by which the present depressed state of things in this country may be changed or the people inspired with the slightest hope for the better. He has nothing. If I were Bengough, if I had the power to caricature as he has, I would portray the hon. gentleman as General Distress giving to the people the word of command 'starve.'"

That was said by the present Finance Minister in this House, by the hon. gentleman who now has charge to a very large extent of the destinies of this country, and who pretends to be loyal, and who will come before us in this House and try and make us out annexationists because we tell the country the exact position of affairs. There is not an hon. member in this House or a man outside of it supporting the Liberal party who has not always promoted everything calculated to promote the welfare of Canada. In everything we have said we have been actuated by a sincere desire to remedy the trouble that exists and point out if possible where the remedy is to be found, and we believe that the remedy we propose will go largely to bring about that prosperity which we all desire to see prevailing in this country, and we believe that a policy of greater freedom of trade introduced in this resolution will bring about that very much desired result. I hope that Canada may become great. She has great resources, she has illimitable mines, she has vast agricultural resources, she has great fishing industries, she has all those sources of wealth, and if she only had an enlightened liberal policy controlling the trade of the country we might expect to see Canada flourish to a very much greater degree than she is doing at the present time.

Mr. HICKEY. I cannot allow this debate to close without making a few remarks giving my opinions regarding the motives which I think have inspired this resolution and the consequences which I think are involved in it. I have been much pleased with the gentleman from the South Riding of Grey (Mr. Landerkin) who has just taken his seat, for the pleasant way in which he has addressed the House and especially the way in which he has closed hedging himself by the statement that he is a loyal man as he would wish also to hedge his party with the cloak of loyalty towards our land. That must be gratifying to every person in this country. This resolution has, I think, one single virtue and that virtue is this, that it seems to be the camping ground of the Grit party. It is the camping ground in which they say they will follow their leader and in which they have planted their stakes just now. But it will soon be like many other camping grounds which they have occupied. It will soon be deserted like the camping ground of commercial union which was vacated lately by the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), and that they will take down their tents like the Arabs and silently steal away. Now the gentlemen opposite must be perfectly well aware that the success of this agitation, and that the result of the full development of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity will be annexation. It is just as sure as that the child is father of the man, that annexation must be the development of this "fad" which they are agitating throughout the country to-day. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in this debate assumed that "commercial union" was "unrestricted reciprocity," and when he was corrected by his leader he was willing to adopt either term. We can show I think from the literature expounded and put forth in the country on this subject that "commercial union" and "unrestricted reciprocity" are one and the same thing. Why they want to deny that is a queer thing to me. I think I will be able to show that the people outside of this House, whether they be the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite or not, look upon this movement as commercial union. Commercial union is undoubtedly the essence of this matter, and hon. gentlemen will find that it will be so interpreted in the country. While I felt pleasure in complimenting my old friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) at the close of this debate, I believe that there are possibly members in this House, and I believe there are a respectable few, at least, of the Reform party in the country who will not be found following those gentlemen in this uncalled for agitation. I think they can justly calculate upon the great majority of the Grit people of this country following them; but they will find, at least, that there are a few people who will not follow the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the gloomy wail he sent up about this country. He and his party have played the doggish game of grasping at the shadow for the bone. We expected that after ten years of the National Policy those gentlemen would have learned from experience, at least, that the people of this country were not disposed to be led away by any such side issue. They should have, at least, learned that the Canadian people were determined to keep this country as their inheritance, and as they have inherited it from their loyal ancestors so they are determined to hand it down untarnished.

"A heritage it seems to me,
Worthy being loyal—
To hold in fee."

Their policy reminds me of one of Victor Hugo's characters who was constantly mistaking a weather-cock for the flag of his country; and that is the fact with those gentlemen. That this is an important main question no one will deny, because it involves the life, welfare and end of this country, and it has been said that the end of any nation is its perfection; but how in the world can it be perfection if we take a step by which we lose our identity in the first place, and merely give our future to add to the great country that those gentlemen propose to annex us to. They have counted without their host, because the people of this country have no sympathy with the movement they are engaged in. If this policy were carried out to its legitimate end anyone who exercises a little logic in this matter will see that Canadian nationality by this reciprocal union proposal would be wiped out altogether. That would undoubtedly be the case although gentlemen on the opposite side pretend to say that it will not. I am led to believe that those gentlemen can scarcely be sincere in their professions of abiding loyalty to Canada. They have merely sugar coated the pill of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union; but, Sir, the "sugar coating" is too thin, and within it is the nauseate drug which will not be acceptable to the people of Canada. I think, Sir, we must admit that it is the resignation of our hope and faith in Canada, that it is an acknowledgment of our inability to look after our own country, when we go as is proposed in this resolution to seek help from a foreign country. Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that we owe respect at least to the leader of this "fad." Mr. Wiman, unlike hon. gentlemen opposite, does not seek to detract from this country, but, on the contrary, Mr. Wiman has endeavored at all times to speak in glowing terms of our wealth, progress, prosperity and hopes. He has represented Canada as something worth annexing to the States, while those gentlemen opposite have represented Canada as being too poor almost to give away. They must not wonder if we in this House have to tax them for speaking lightly of Canada, and that we speak of them as being disloyal, because we can only judge them by their language, and their language sounds traitorous and is disloyal in tone. We must suppose, therefore, that it comes from the heart as it does from the tongue. They tell us that this close union with the United States would not injure our relations with Great Britain, and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us that it would be a great blessing if we could unite ourselves with the States and make a great Anglo-Saxon union in this western world, where Great Britain would find a resting place in her old age and a place of safeguard. Bah! upon such a sickly wail. I can tell the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that while his spirit and soul may be hovering over the State of Michigan, it is not meet that his body and breeches are the part reserved for this Chamber. This may not sound very pleasant to the hon. gentleman, but I want to declare that Great Britain does not ask any wails from men whose patriotism is of the same kind as his. I would remind him in the words of Henry Ward Beecher:

"That England is the finest country in the world and take her up one side and down the other she has more generosity, more liberty and more freedom than any country in the world."

If the hon. gentleman does not like to hear this I like to say it. Now, Sir, free trade with the United States means of necessity that we must separate our existence from Great Britain with whom we have gone hand in hand in the steady march of prosperity and strength, and if hon. gentlemen opposite think that our union with a foreign country would be taken in a quiet way by the people of Great Britain they at least do not know what the sentiment between the two countries is. If there is anything in this union at all the essence of it is that money again is the consideration, that the thirty pieces of silver is to be considered and that if we are to sell this country it is for a money consideration only. If that is ever done one result of it will be to separate the sentiment and feeling which exists between this country and Great Britain, and at the end leave us to be swallowed up by the United States. A great deal has been said about the progress of Canada and it has been stated that we have not progressed as well as we ought. We need only look and scan the scenes around us to be satisfied that our march to prosperity has been onward and upward and that our achievements in the past will be a sufficient index for our prosperity in the future. Our population we have been told has been leaving us on account of the National Policy, but the gentleman who undertook to explain this exodus goes back to years before the National Policy and tells us that 2,000,000 of people have left Canada. If he prosecuted his enquiries further he would find at least that 7,500,000 people have left the United States, and he had better hunt them up and find where they are. It is true we have had an exodus from this country, some have left us and some more could very well go for the good of the country. Some are remaining here to sow the seeds of discord and foment, the spirit of discontent among our people, and if they left too, I think Canada would be happier and better, because no human mind can comprehend the destructive results that must follow an agitation of this kind at this period of our country's growth. It tells the world that the Canadian people are still adrift, that they are not satisfied with their country, that they know not whether they are drifting, and are willing to take up any fad and leave their loyal homes to go to a country that has been inimical in every way it could in its trade relations with Canada. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House have said that the annexation sentiment has been increasing in this country. If it has, who have been the fathers of that sentiment? These very gentlemen are the preachers of annexation. We do not find any annexation sentiment being taught in the Conservative ranks of this country; but these gentlemen get up here, with all the audacity that is peculiar to their politics, and tell us that this sentiment is increasing. They are the authors of it, and they must feel the opprobrium that is attached to it. They tell us in as many words that our country is poor. When they wish to hurl a dart at the Government they say the country is going to the dogs, and that it is poor; but if they once lose sight of the Government, they can dilate on Canada's wealth and on the great future it is likely to have. I say this is just the time when Canadian hearts ought to be strong and cheerful, because the sinews of this country have just become developed; the foundations of this nation have just become solidified; we have expended our wealth, we have sown the seeds of prosperity, and are just about to reap the results, and built up a nation that will be second to none in this world. For these reasons, I think that if these gentlemen would sound a word or two that would be consistent with the real position of the country, instead of decrying it, they would do much better. But they say our policy has ruined this country. Well, if the National Policy has ruined this country, what in the name of common sense do they expect to give us when they get us connected with a nation where a National Policy exists in its perfection? If there is one fault that I have found with the National Policy, it has been that it was too limited; it did not go far enough, the protection was not great enough. So you see the utterly nonsensical position these gentlemen occupy, with not a bit of regard to logic or the interests of this country. If there is any evil in this country, it must be in their own bosoms. The hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) had a good deal to say against the Government for the evil way in which they are conducting the affairs of this country and bribing one Province after another. Hon. gentlemen who have read the newspapers must be sure of this fact that that hon. gentleman with his silvery tongue and his insincerity, or I should say, his big hopes in himself and his party, bribed the people of Prince Edward Island by telling them that his party were going into power and the Tories were going out, and that they would then get all they would ask for. Instead of our party being the bribers, that gentleman with all his smooth ways was the arch briber. But before I forget it, I want to give some outside opinions as to what these gentlemen are fighting for, and to show them that the people of the United States regard it in the light of commercial union and annexation. In the first place, what does Mr. Wiman say in reply to Mr. Edgar about unrestricted reciprocity? He says:

"Almost everything that commercial union in its fullest sense could accomplish would be achieved by this plan."

That is Mr. Wiman's view of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. In opening this debate the hon.

member for South Oxford was very irritable over the idea that commercial union could be tacked on to his resolution of unrestricted reciprocity. That resolution contains a very nice word, reciprocity in trade. We all believe in reciprocity in trade with the United States so far as it is consistent with the interests of Canada, and no further. Here is what the Boston Advertiser says on this subject :

"The members of the Opposition party in Canada have come out without reservation in favor of free trade between Canada and the United States. Sir Richard Cartwright, who is the recognised leader of the minority in Parliament, has made a set speech, in which he has declared expressly, with the unanimous approval of his party, in favor of a commercial union with the United States. He goes to the extent of saying that if it is necessary, in order to accomplish this result, Canada must adopt the tariff which the United States imposes upon English goods or shut out English manufactures from Canadian markets in preference to allowing the existing condition of things to go on, which impoverishes Canada and makes it a political tributary of Great Britain, while it should naturally be a commercial ally of the United States. The Montreal Herald, the leading Liberal paper in that city, declares in favor of breaking down all tariff barriers along our border, and defiantly declares its independence of the complaints of British manufacturers. * * As Sir Richard Cartwright pointed out, the right to enter our markets free is the only commercial privilege which can make Canada prosperous, and without it she can never be so."

Do hon. gentlemen wonder now why we think they are disloyal in the sentiments they are propounding from day to day in this House? Senator Frye, who has been a warm friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, gives his opinion on the subject :—

"Senator Frye, who has given this subject more careful study than any other member of our Congress, has expressed it as his opinion that it is simply a question of time when at least the Maritime Provinces of Canada will be forced to ally themselves to the United States on whatever basis they can obtain, with this provision of a free market thrown in. He believes Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, at least, will be forced by the necessities of the case to demand of Great Britain a peaceful separation from Canada on condition that they may be annexed to this country. It may be that this result may not happen directly, but the whole tendency of public discussion in those Provinces looks in that direction, and while it would be a severe blow at English Imperial pride to give up these Provinces to this country, and to sacrifice the splendid harbor of Halifax, which for more than a century has been the headquarters of the British naval force in this hemisphere, yet we believe that the necessities of the case are so great that a large party in Canada prefers free trade with us to any consideration of national pride."

That is the opinion of an outside critic, who stands in the position of the party with whom these people wish to unite. He looks upon the agitation as one for annexation, and these gentlemen must know that that would be the natural end of such a union. The paper goes on to say :

"It will then become a serious problem for our statesmen to consider on what basis reciprocity with Canada can be entertained. So long as we maintain our present tariff, the first preliminary must undoubtedly be the same tariff for imports into Canada as we raise on our own borders, thus throwing Canadian markets open to our manufactures, we in turn buying at will all the products of Canada in the form of grains, potatoes, fish and coal. It is easily seen that it would be impossible to maintain a political union with Great Britain under these circumstances and a commercial unity with this country."

"The unrest in Canada on these lines is sufficient reason for the anxiety which England has shown to bring out of this fishery dispute some method of opening our markets to Canadian productions. It also explains why England countenanced the unjustifiable conduct of Canadian cruisers to our fishermen. But as the United States has refused to be forced out of its proper policy thus far, the two countries are brought face to face with the more interesting problem of what step Canada will next take to meet her increasing debts, the growing discontent of her people and the unavailing statesmanship of her leaders, bringing into striking prominence the dependence of Canada upon closer relations with us for her future prosperity."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if anything could be wanting to criticism in a proper spirit, without any bias of partisanship, it could be found in the mouths of their own friends in the United States whom hon. gentlemen opposite wish to join this country. A great deal has been said about the great markets of the United States. The hon. Minister of the Interior and other hon. gentlemen on this side have abundantly shown that the markets in Canada are as good as those in the United States, and in many cases better, because they are at our own doors and subject to our own control. In this connection we have heard a good deal about horses. Now, what are the facts? Take the American trade reports and we find that the average price for horses in the United States is $73.70, while in Canada it is $113. In many of the States the average price of horses is $60, $70 and $80, much less than the average price in our Canadian market. This was in 1876. From 1876 to 1885 the exports of cattle to Great Britain amounted to $28,150,000, and the exports to the United States to $7,934,000, or three and a half times greater export to Great Britain than to the United States, and the average price of every animal exported to Great Britain was $77, while the average price of the exports to the United States was $36, so that the average price of cattle for those years was $35.97, a little less than the average price of the Canadian cattle exported to that country during these ten years. We must also bear in consideration the fact mentioned by the hon. member for South Leeds, that if we were united to the United States, we would lose the English market, because our cattle would be scheduled and could not be shipped to Great Britain at all. Besides that, we know that the market in the United States is a fickle market, while that of Great Britain is a steady market, with a constant and increasing demand for our cattle. This is shown in a striking manner by the fact that in the aggregate value of farm animals, in the United States, comparing the year 1885 to 1884, we find a decrease of over $100,000,000, while the number of animals shows an increase with the exception of sheep; yet in Canada during the same years, we find both the number and value have increased, except as regards the number, in sheep and pigs, the value having increased to the amount of $8,250,000, or about $2 per head of the population, while the decrease in the price of animals in the United States was $1.60 per head of the population. You see, therefore, that the market of Great Britain is of paramount importance to us, while that of the United States is more flickering and changeable than our own, and, therefore, not as desirable. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his strictures of the people of Canada, said that money was much cheaper in the United States than here; he said you could get money at from 6 to 7 per cent. in Michigan. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that you can borrow money anywhere in this country at 6, 6½ and 7 per cent. The hon. gentleman will have us believe that the people were laboring under a heavy mortgaged debt from which they could not possibly get any relief. But what do you find, Sir? You find that in that great country, where that hon. gentleman loves to dwell, where his souls is at peace and where his spirit seems to have its fullness—especially in that part of it known as Michigan—you find in that country, to repeat the figures given by the hon. member who moved the reply to the Speech from the Throne, and which are very pertinent to this debate, that the mortgages on farms in the United States are as follows :—

| In Ohio..... | $ 701,000,000 |
| Indiana..... | 398,000,000 |
| Illinois..... | 620,000,000 |
| Wisconsin..... | 250,000,000 |
| Michigan..... | 350,000,000 |
| Minnesota..... | 175,000,000 |
| Iowa..... | 351,000,000 |
| Nebraska..... | 140,000,000 |
| Kansas..... | 200,000,000 |
| Missouri..... | 257,000,000 |

Total farm mortgages..... $3,422,000,000

And the actual value of all farms in these ten States is about $13,931,000,000. Now the New York Times sent out a commissioner to investigate the matter, and he reports as follows :—

"The greater portion of the money represented by the faces of these mortgages has not been expended in improving farms, because the larger portion of the farms were equipped with buildings before the mortgages were laid. The money has been spent to enable the farmers to live."

Of Michigan, the commissioner says :

"In Michigan the number of mortgaged farms has recently been closely ascertained. Practically one-half of the farms of that great State which is justly famous for the production of wheat, oats, barley, corn, fruit, vegetables, lumber, iron ore and copper are mortgaged. In 1880 the assessed value of Michigan farms was $499,000,000. Their assessed value to-day is about $700,000,000, which shows an actual value of $1,400,000,000. One-half of them are mortgaged, and the older the community and the more valuable the land the more numerous are the mortgages—(so the recent investigation shows.)"

Thus $700,000,000 worth of Michigan farming land, or one-half the whole value is incumbered. Farm mortgages are always negotiated on the real value of the land. Thus the total amount of money represented by the faces of Michigan farm mortgages, is at least $350,000,000. As it is in Michigan, so it is in the ten great agricultural States which lie in the Mississippi valley. In Dakota, there is a population of 600,000, and the mortgages are $45,000,000, for which interest is paid at the rate of 10 per cent. The commissioner further says:

"I here wish to say to investors, that all talk relative to this vast sum of money ever being paid, is utter folly.

"The profit derived from American agriculture is now so small as to be unworthy of the slightest consideration. To illustrate this fact, the interest money drawn annually from the ten States listed, if they pay 7 per cent, only amounts to $239,000,000. The total value of the agricultural products of these ten States was, in 1879, $839,000,000. In 1885, the total value of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, hay, tobacco and cotton, was $754,600,000. Allowing $250,000,000 for other products of the farm, we have a total annual value of $1,000,000,000. Half the farms being mortgaged, the produce they yield is $500,000,000, $239,000,000 of this goes to pay interest, leaving $261,000,000 of produce to support 886,000 farmers and their families, or $294 to each farmer."

"Out of this sum," says the Commissioner,

"They must pay labor, taxes, supply seed, buy tools, &c. The sum is entirely inadequate. It is not possible for these mortgaged farmers as a class, ever to lift their mortgages."

And this is the country to which these hon. gentlemen point with such ecstasy, when they are chagrined over their own country and lament her miserable condition. Would they wish to reduce Canadian farmers to that low level of prosperity, to that hopeless condition of inability to extricate themselves from the burden of debt which is upon them. I think not. If they were sincere they would show up all the facts to the public. This is not Canadian literature that I have quoted or literature gathered from Canadian books, but it is a report of the views of the people themselves who have invested in lands in these States. Take this same comparison and what will we find? We find that in Canada, that is, in Ontario and Quebec, the total mortgage debt does not exceed \$200,000,000, on an estimated value of \$800,000,000. Mr. Blue gives it as \$600,000,000, but we may add 25 per cent. to that. The crop of Ontario is valued at \$121,000,000. Taking \$14,000,000 for interest, we have left \$108,000,000 to be divided among 182,000 farmers holding more than ten acres each, or \$600 a piece from agricultural products. This is 100 per cent. more than in the ten States to which the commissioner directed his attention. And yet, the hon. gentleman would cajole these farmers of Ontario to unite their fortunes with those of the depressed farmers of the United States. In 1874, we find that the default on mortgages was equal to 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. In 1879, it was 5 per cent. In 1886, it was 4 per cent. Notwithstanding the blue ruin they have been stating has overtaken the farmers, though certainly the defaults are more in 1886 than they were in 1874, still they are only 4 per cent., and, when the hon. gentleman left power, they were 7 per cent. This is a very valuable showing when you compare it with the statements which they made. Here is another report. In the course of a recent discussion in the Congress of the United States, Mr. Weaver, of Iowa, said that:

"During the summer he had traversed the country from western New York through Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska, and the best testimony he could procure showed that two-thirds of all the farm land of the United States was under mortgage. In Iowa it would be an accident if a man travelling through the State got upon a farm that was not mortgaged."

That is the testimony of the people of the United States in reference to the condition of their farmers, and these are the farmers who are held out to the people of Canada as occupying the green fields of prosperity in order to induce them to unite themselves to the people of the United States. It is well known that far off fields are green, and so these would be found if we were ever so thoughtless as to betray our trust and unite our existence with the United States instead of remaining in our present prosperous condition, a condition of which I think any man might be proud as a citizen of Canada, and which I hope will continue. We have a great country, and, if the United States were removed to the antipodes to-morrow, we could go on and flourish in spite of it. In their 4th of July orations the people of the United States are proud to say that their country is God's country; and so is this country God's country. We have all the materials of wealth, we have all the means of maintaining a prosperous nationality here, and we can as well live without the United States as they could live without us in proportion to our numbers. The products of our fields, of our mines, of our forests, and of everything we have are abundant and are handy to the industrious Canadian, who, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was very strong in stating was worth any six immigrants to this country. With all the wealth of Canada, I say we ought to look upon Canada as God's country. It is full of everything calculated to make men happy and prosperous, and I say that an unworthy compromise such as this would be—and an unworthy compromise is always looked upon as a certain avenue to national destruction—ought not to be made, because our position with Great Britain has been one of honor, faithfulness and strength, and that was never exhibited to the world more than it was during the fishery negotiations that have taken place recently in the United States. The United States Congress a short time ago passed a non-intercourse Bill, but they found that they could not put it in force against Canada without putting it in force against Great Britain and all her colonies, and they at once commenced to estimate the cost of that course. What would Canada be in such a case without such a friend, at a time of weakness such as we had in regard to this question. Investigate this matter as much as you like, and the firmer you will find our position in this matter. Let us keep our fidelity and remember that what is right is safe. If it is right to look after our interest, then the preservation of our present position is the best and the safest thing for us to do. We have the desire to promote our own prosperity. I see Canada drifting down the stream of time, with all its interests growing greater and grander as the times go by, and I believe that she will inscribe upon her banner in the future as she has in the past the motto "Dieu et mon droit."

Mr. McINTYRE. I understand that there is a general desire for the adjournment of the debate, as the hour is growing late, and, if the Government are of that opinion, I will move the adjournment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Go on.

Mr. McINTYRE. Before this debate comes to a close, I desire to say a few words in reference to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The question of unrestricted reciprocity, or of reciprocity of some kind, is one that overshadows all other considerations of that kind, with us down by the sea, and this is especially the case in the Province from which I come. We have been lectured by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in regard to the manner in which we treat this question. They say we should treat it from a national standpoint. That is all very well for hon. gentlemen from Ontario who make use of us down by the sea as their footstool. In fact, there is a gentleman in this House—I think it was the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson)—who stated that, if we obtained unrestricted reciprocity, we would be made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of the United States. Well, we had reciprocity with the United States before, and I do not think we were made hewers of wood and drawers of water at that time. In fact, with us down by the sea, we were not inclined to be made hewers of wood and drawers of water under the old Reciprocity Treaty. Our people in Prince Edward Island and in the Maritime Provinces generally, but more especially in the island from which I come, have had ample experience of the immense advantages and benefits which accrued to them under the old Reciprocity Treaty, and for that reason they have always been looking forward to the renewal of that treaty or to something even better. While that treaty was in force, our merchants, our farmers, and our fishermen were in the highest degree of prosperity. It was a time when the American vessels came down to our ports and into our rivers and took away from us all our surplus produce—in fact they took away everything we had to spare, and paid for it in cash. It was a time when all our people enjoyed the highest degree of prosperity, and consequently of contentment, because people are generally content when their pockets are lined with the needful, and not otherwise. In order to show that what I have said is true, and that I am not drawing upon my imagination, I will just illustrate by two small rows of figures. In 1854, which was the year the Reciprocity Treaty was inaugurated, but it was not a full year, our exports to the United States only amounted to $81,782; in 1865, which was the last full year of the Reciprocity Treaty, they amounted to $604,642; in other words, an increase of $523,960 in the space of twelve years, or something over 400 per cent. The contrast between that time and now is certainly very marked, so far as the Island is concerned. To-day we are hemmed in by two Chinese walls. If we send our produce to the American side we are met by an enormous tariff, but in spite of this, we have to force our products in there and take whatever we can get for them, and bring back the money in order to pay for goods imported from Ontario and Quebec; and if we bring back American goods we are met by our own Government with another Chinese wall, in the shape of an enormous protective duty. Now, Sir, it is the general feeling down in that section of the country that so far as tariffs are concerned, it is utterly impossible for us to be ever a prosperous people. Under the existing state of affairs we are forced to buy from Ontario and Quebec, which do not require any of the articles which the Island produces; therefore we are forced to go into a hostile market to obtain money in order to pay the goods we buy from Ontario and Quebec. You might just as well expect water to run up hill as to expect that there ever can be any community of sympathy or sentiment between the Western Provinces and the Eastern, so long as this condition of affairs exists. The Americans, of course, are our neighbors, they are nearest to us, they are the people with whom we have always dealt more or less, they are the people amongst whom our friends live because a large number of our friends go to the United States, and we are at all times anxious to see them besides trading with them. Again, our rates of freight to the United States are much cheaper, because they are water rates as against railway rates with the Western Provinces. In order to show the difference which exists between the old Reciprocity period and the present, I will quote some more figures. In 1887, our exports to the United States only amounted to $668,627; and as I said before, in 1865, the last year of the Reciprocity Treaty, our exports amounted to $604,642; so that in the space of 22 years, they only increased by $63,975; whereas, in the 12 years of the Reciprocity Treaty, they increased by $123,960. I think these figures speak for themselves, and more eloquently than anything I can say, or any person else. As I said before, in the last full year of the treaty, our exports amounted to $604,642, and the first year after the abrogation of the treaty they fell to $108,166. This is an enormous fall in a very short space of time, and goes to show what an advantage it would be to us to have a reciprocal trade with the United States in preference to the existing state of affairs. Whilst I am on this point, I wish to refer to a statement made by the Minister of Marine in reference to the savings bank argument that he used. He said it was an indication of our wealth that we had so much money in the savings bank at Charlottetown. Well, Sir, I thought we had heard the last of that during the late campaign, but I find it is made to do service over and over again. Now, if that is an argument that we are wealthy, it shows that we are even more wealthy than the great commercial city of the west, Toronto, because we have, in proportion to the population, double the amount of money in the savings bank at Charlottetown than they have in the city of Toronto. I think this fact proves the very reverse; it proves that if we had any remunerative business in which this money could be invested it would be placed there, for any person who receives 5 or 6 per cent. for his money would never leave it lying in the savings bank at 4 per cent. We are expected to be happy down by the sea, but when we consider the inducements which are supposed to make us happy they are really extraordinary. Take the present price of produce for example. We find people starting for market before daylight, in the fall of the year, and with mud up to the hubs of their waggon, to bring oats to market with which to purchase goods, and they receive twenty-five or twenty-six cents a bushel. They bring their potatoes to market for sixteen cents a bushel, which is the ordinary price in the fall of the year in Prince Edward Island. They were a little higher last fall on account of the American demand, and it is only when there is an American demand, or when there has been a short crop in the United States, that there is any demand at all, scarcely, for potatoes in Prince Edward Island. Then, again, so far as real estate is concerned, it is falling in value every year in consequence of the low prices of produce—in fact it is almost impossible for a man who wants to leave for the United States now, to sell his farm, except at a ruinous rate. This was not so in former years; because I remember myself that during the terrible years of the Mackenzie Administration of which we have heard so much, real estate was booming in that Province. As a natural consequence of all these things, our people are leaving the country. I do not deny that there is always a certain amount of emigration, as there always will be from a country like the Maritime Provinces, but within the three, or four, or five years, emigration has assumed alarming proportions. It is not only our young men who are leaving us, but also our young women. In every section of the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, people from Prince Edward Island are to be found. I know myself that from nearly every house which I can recall to memory, one, two, three and sometimes four, persons have left and gone to the United States. They have not gone there to come back again but to stay. Our young men go into the fishing business or the mercantile business or whatever they can get to do; and it is the same with our young women, then marry and settle down in the United States. I am very sorry that I have to make such a statement as this, because if it were in my power to do otherwise I would be very willing to do it, no matter who would be the gainers thereby, even if it was the Government. Then again in Prince Edward Island in former years we had a magnificent industry in the shape of shipbuilding. The industry of shipbuilding has entirely disappeared from the Island. In former years it gave employment to our mechanics, it assisted our farmers so far that they could sell the timber off their land, and in fact it saved many a bushel of grain when they could bring a few sticks of timber to the shipyard and obtain the necessities, while to-day they have to give away their timber altogether. In order to show the great depression that has taken place in this industry, I will read a few statistics to the House. In 1875 we built 26,041 tons of shipping, of the value of $7,621,194. In 1878 we built only 16,486 tons. As I said before, those were the years of which we have heard so much with respect to the Mackenzie Administration; but to us they were not disastrous years but years of prosperity, a return of which we anxiously look for. Then we come down to succeeding years. In 1886 shipbuilding had declined to 1,244 tons, and 1,686 tons in 1887. In 1873, the year in which we entered the Confederacy, we owned 280 vessels, equal to a tonnage of 38,918; in 1886 we owned only 225 vessels, with a tonnage of 30,658, or a decrease in fifteen years of 55 vessels and 8,260 tons. I think those figures speak for themselves. They show that ever since we entered Confederation the shipbuilding industry has been declining steadily every day. It has been stated that the reason of the decline in shipbuilding is due to the fact of the place of ships being taken by steamers; but if that were true the tonnage ought to show it, but it does not. I believe that every person conversant with the old state of affairs under the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 will believe that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, which would prove much more advantageous to us than the old Reciprocity Treaty, the value of our farms would nearly double in a year or two. Then again it would give a chance to capitalists of the United States to come down and establish fisheries amongst us as they did under the old Reciprocity Treaty. This gave encouragement to our young men to stay at home and they did so during those years. If a reciprocal treaty was in operation, which we earnestly hope will be the case, there is no doubt in my mind and no doubt in the minds of nine-tenths of the people of Prince Edward Island, but that there will be a renewal of the good old times that prevailed under the old Reciprocity Treaty, and even better times. Our farmers would find some encouragement for continuing in the business of agriculture. We have in the Island some of the finest farms to be found in the whole Dominion of Canada, and our farms are famed all over the Maritime Provinces and the Eastern States. Then again we raise large numbers of sheep, and it is a fact that the mutton of the Island is regarded as of first class quality, and a large number of sheep even under present circumstances are sent yearly to the States. Of course, I need scarcely say that we produce large quantities of potatoes, butter and eggs. We sent in 1877 to the United States horses to the value of $61,524; sheep to the value of $16,279; potatoes, 792,426 bushels, to the value of $168,366; eggs to the number of 1,668,539 dozen, to the value of $202,737. Then by the Trade and Navigation Returns I find that we are the largest exporters of eggs of any Province in the Dominion with the exception of Ontario. We also sent of mackerel 14,764 barrels, to the value of $93,936; canned mackerel, 501,320 pounds, to the value of $32,421, or a total of $126,360. All this produce has been sent to the United States and the money brought back goes to pay for goods from Ontario. If we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States I have no doubt but that these exports would be quadrupled in a very short time. Some of the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite against unrestricted reciprocity appear to me to be very frivolous, one of which is that it is going to impair our loyalty. It appears to me that this is the most silly objection that could possibly be raised. We had reciprocity before, and I do not think it impaired our loyalty to the slightest degree. I think myself that when the people are prosperous they are content, and when they are contented there is no room for disloyalty. There is no disloyalty without a cause, and in this case there would be no cause. Then, again, we are told that unrestricted reciprocity would involve direct taxation. It did not involve direct taxation before and it would not involve it now. We are told that it would cut off $7,000,000 from our revenue. It is very easy to make up that deficiency if proper methods were adopted, and there are several means which might be adopted. There has been an enormous and useless expenditure going on in this Dominion for many years, a large number of which might be cut away with benefit to the Provinces and benefit to the Dominion. If we would stop purchasing constituencies by railway subsidies there would be an immense saving effected. Of course I do not object to railway subsidies where they are really required, but when they are spent merely for the purpose of purchasing constituencies they are objectionable. Then, again, there is another enormous item of expenditure and that is with reference to newspapers. Newspaper support is purchased by means of the emigration funds. That is an enormous leakage year after year which might very easily be stopped. Then, again, if the Government would accord to us universal suffrage we might easily dispense with that expensive Franchise Act. Another objection raised by supporters of the Government is that we cannot obtain reciprocity with the United States and that it is useless to be looking for it. I think that since the abrogation of the old Reciprocity Treaty there never was a brighter prospect than there is to-day—there never was such a disposition manifested by public men in the United States for reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada. Within the last two years we have had the Butterworth Bill which goes in for a large measure of reciprocal trade, then again we have the Hitt Bill, which not long ago was recommended from the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously, and more recently still, we have the expression of Mr. Secretary Bayard, in which he says in his letter to Sir Charles Tupper of 31st May, 1887:

"I am confident we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement, and there is but one way to procure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations between the two countries."

I think, Sir, since the abrogation of the old treaty we have never had such a universal expression from the people of the United States in favor of reciprocal trade as we have had within the last year or two, and that not only by the statement of the United States, but by the large meetings which have been convened for the purpose of discussing this question, and which were nearly all unanimous in favor of more extended relations. It has been quoted in the Government papers that during the Fishery Commission certain propositions were made by the British Commissioners in the direction of reciprocal trade with the United States, and those papers say they were rejected immediately by the United States Commissioners. This is not putting the matter in a fair light, because the United States Fishery Commissioners rejected those proposals for the reasons that they were not authorised to treat in regard to trade. All they were authorised to do was to settle the matter in reference to the fisheries. I am glad, Sir, that this question has been brought so prominently to the attention of the people of this Dominion, and I trust that at no distant date we will see a triumph not so much in the interests of party as in the interests of the whole country.

Mr. FREEMAN moved the adjournment of the debate to Tuesday evening next at eight o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman means to meet to-morrow, I suppose.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does he propose to take up or to do?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With the consent of the House our intention is to go on with the question put by members, and take the Private Bills. We will have five Private Bills to consider from Ontario and if we can get through those Bills they would be sent to the Senate. Then we can take the Notices of Motion, selecting the unopposed motions. This, I think, will take us up to six o'clock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:30 a.m. (Wednesday.)

Mr. DESJARDINS moved:

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the hon. gentleman to let it stand until the present debate is concluded.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It is only a recommendation for some increases of salaries.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are read, I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter that I consider of very considerable importance to this country. It will be recollected that in 1878, when the Government was changed from that of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) to that of the right hon. gentleman opposite, some very eloquent speeches were delivered throughout this country in favor of what was claimed then to be a National Policy—not a protective policy, but a National Policy—and to which I had the honor, in all good faith, of giving what little support I could. The right hon. gentleman, at the head of the Government, carrying out in good faith what he proposed, placed on the Statute-book of 1879 the following clause in the Customs Act:—

"Any or all of the following things, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal and flour and meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked) and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada."

I see in the Free Press some very important communications from Washington upon that subject, which, with the permission of the House, I will read:

"Washington, March 27.—Much feeling has been aroused against Canada in congressional circles here owing to the neglect of the Dominion Government to place on the free list those articles of natural produce which are now admitted free into the United States. Some years ago the Canadian Parliament passed an Act authorising or directing the Dominion Executive to place on the free list certain articles of natural produce, including trees and shrubs, green fruit, coal and coke, fish, &c., whenever the United States Government agreed to admit such articles free. It was expected that by this means complete reciprocity of trade in the natural produce of the two countries would gradually be brought about. In 1883 Congress placed on the free list a number of the articles mentioned in the Canadian Act, but up to the present the Canadian authorities have refused to reciprocate or to take any steps towards bringing about a free exchange in the natural products. After the new parcel post system came in operation the nurserymen of this country were placed at a great disadvantage as compared with their Canadian competitors, as all trees and shrubs exported from Canada to this country came in duty free, while American nursery stock is dutiable when sent into Canada. Steps were lately taken to ascertain what the policy of the Canadian Government was in regard to the free exchange of natural products, and the information received is to the effect that the Dominion Government has decided that they are not called upon to put their standing offer of reciprocity in natural products into operation until each and all the articles referred to in the statute are admitted free by the United States. The course of the Canadian Government in refusing to adhere by their own engagement to place on their free list articles of natural produce now admitted free by this country, is likely to strengthen the hands of the opponents of the fisheries treaty and to lead to retaliation. A congressman from New York State announces that it is his intention to present at once in the House of Representatives a bill removing from the free to the dutiable list, for customs purposes, all articles of Canadian growth now admitted free. The bill will not include only trees, shrubs and green fruits, but oysters, fresh fish and eggs, of which immense quantities are imported into this country every year from Canada. The proposed duty on eggs, he says, will be about 4 cents per dozen and on other articles the same rates of duty now levied and collected by the Canadian Government."

"Washington, March 27.—A New York representative has prepared a bill for early presentation in the House of Representatives which places all articles now in the free list of the United States and not embraced in the free list of Canada, into the duty list at the same rates of duty now imposed by the Canadian tariff.

"These articles are principally green and dried fruits, nursery stock and seeds of all kinds, fresh fish, &c.

"Other articles which have long been on the free list will also be included for duty, such as eggs, 4 cents per dozen, fresh fish, &c.

"Great indignation exists here at the total indifference and bad faith of the Canadian Government in their disregard of Secs. 3 and 9 of the Canadian Customs Act, and the spirit and principle embodied in Sec. 10."

There is a good deal more upon the same subject here with reference to the determination on the part of the United States to propose retaliation, and I am certainly not very much surprised at it. We have heard various rumors about this matter. It is stated in these despatches that the Canadian Government have received communications from the American Government on this subject with the view of getting reciprocity in those articles in which, by the statute, this Government have declared their readiness to reciprocate. What I would like to know is this, whether any, and if so, what correspondence has passed between the two Governments in relation to this subject, and whether the Canadian Government have taken any action with the view of meeting the American Government in their endeavor to meet the statutory statements of our Government regarding reciprocity in natural products. This is a matter of the greatest importance. To my constituents it is especially of great importance. Hundreds of tons of fresh fish, during certain weeks of the winter, leave one single station, Shediac, in my county, for the markets of the United States; and if this retaliatory policy of the United States should be carried out, if there is any just ground for its being carried out, the people of this country will have good reason to find fault with the right hon. gentleman and the gentlemen behind him. They will have good ground of complaint if the Government have taken no steps to try and meet the advances of the American Government and prevent a system of retaliation growing up between the two countries. This is a matter of vital importance, not only to the constituency I represent, but to the whole of Canada. It affects almost all agricultural products, it affects flour and meal and corn and everything of that kind, and, if the American people are met at the outset of this reciprocity question by a refusal to admit these things which they have made free, I think it is a breach of faith in regard to the inducements which were held out by the hon. gentleman in 1879. I know that the policy of the Government has changed since 1879. The National Policy was adopted then as a means to an end, as a means to bring about reciprocity. That was the argument used by which myself and others were induced to support it, but now it is a policy of protection. I want to find out whether the people of this country—my constituents, for instance, in the matter of fresh fish—are to be driven into a position where they will have the tax placed upon them when they go into the United States. This is a matter of vital importance to the people of this country. I think the right hon. gentleman ought to inform the House whether negotiations had been going on in reference to it, and whether the Government have refused to meet the just claims of the United States in regard to reciprocity in those articles which they have put upon the free list. I am told that the matter has been under discussion in the Cabinet. We cannot tell, of course, what takes place there. It is one of the secret places, unless the Herald happens to get at them now and then, but generally they keep their secrets to themselves. We ought to know whether the articles which have been named, of fish, coal, fruit, eggs, and so on, which the Americans have made free, are to be made free on our side. There is a little error in the statement which has come from Washington, and that is in regard to coal. Anthracite coal has been made free in the interests of Ontario, which the right hon. gentleman represents, but the coal of our country has not been made free and the people I represent have still to submit to a tax of 60 cents a ton on all soft coal, and that is the coal which is generally used in the eastern Provinces. Now, I want the hon. gentleman to give a positive answer to my enquiry, whether advances have been made by the United States, complaining of the breach of faith which has occurred, or whether negotiations have taken place in which they have offered to extend the system of reciprocity, and whether or not any answer has been returned to them, and what the attitude of the Government is upon the question to-day?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that this is exactly the time to answer the question, but I may say that no applications have been made by the American Government upon the subject which the hon. gentleman speaks of.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to go a little further, and I want to see why the Government have not carried out the pledge which they made in section 16 of the Act of 1879, and have not put these articles on the free list which the Americans have made free?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, when the question comes up in such a form as it can be discussed, and not in the form of an enquiry, the hon. gentleman will get a full and satisfactory answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may get a full answer, but I do not think I will get a satisfactory one. I want to ask another question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to ask whether the United States Consul has not made representations as to the breach of faith of this Government in relation to section 16 of the Act of 1879?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the first place, I repudiate altogether, on behalf of the Government, the insinuation that we have been guilty of any breach of faith.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, of course; you will repudiate anything if it suits your purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has no right to use that insolent and unparliamentary language.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can tell the hon. gentleman—
Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall have to call for the protection of this House against such an unparliamentary course as the hon. gentleman is pursuing, and I have no doubt that this House will give me protection, as it would give any other member protection, against such coarse and unparliamentary language. I repudiate the statement that there has been any breach of faith on the part of the Canadian Government, and further, Mr. Speaker, I say that there have been reports made on behalf of the American seedsmen desiring that this provision should be carried out, but we have seedsmen on the Canadian side of the border also, and we have to consider their interest as well as the American interest. However, that subject, having been brought forward in the interests of the American seedsmen, is now engaging the attention of the Government, but there has been no official statement even from the Consul.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, Sir,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You cannot.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will some hon. gentleman move the adjournment?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I ought to say that the hon. gentleman knows that he came to me and asked permission to put these questions. I asked him not to make a speech and not to be too long, and it was understood that the adjournment of the debate would not be moved, and I think the House will sustain me in saying that the hon. gentleman ought to relinquish this subject now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to make an explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. You may "haw" as much as you like. I wish to correct His Honor the Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not go to the Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Excuse me. Hear what I have to say first. I did not go to the Speaker to ask permission to make these statements, but to tell him that I was going to do it, and it was in the interests of my constituents—

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the hon. gentleman asked me if he might be allowed to ask these questions in order that he might not be obliged to move the adjournment of the debate. I said, That is all right so long as you do not go too far in the way of a speech. I am sorry now that I did not enforce the rule of the House at once and stop the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, Sir,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I merely rise to put myself right in regard to what the Speaker has said.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a perfect right to set myself right, even when the Speaker himself is concerned. I went to the Speaker to state, as a matter of courtesy, that I was going to bring up this question. When the hon. gentleman says he can appeal to the House, I tell him that he can do it as soon as he likes. I am not afraid of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think the language of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was such as to warrant the remarks which have been made by the right hon. the Premier. If the Premier had answered the question at first as he did afterwards, my hon. friend would have been satisfied. All he wanted to know was what communications had been made to the Government in relation to this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We had none, and I said so.

Mr. LAURIER. The answer which the hon. gentleman gave afterwards was not that which he gave at first.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did give it.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think he gave the answer at first in such a fair manner as he did just now. I only desire to make one remark. This is not a case which requires any communications between the two Governments, as we have a standing offer upon our Statute-book that, as soon as such a thing is done by the United States, we will reciprocate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. If it is not so, I can only say that it ought to be so, and, further, that it was understood that it was so in the first instance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Looking at the wording of the section—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear anyone do so.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What I was going to say was that the hon. gentleman has induced Parliament to put upon the Statute-book a certain Act. By that Act, he declares that the Parliament of Canada are ready at any time to permit articles to come from the United States into Canada free of duty, in so far as the Americans do the same thing with regard to articles going from Canada to the United States. The words used are "any or all." Now, all the articles which are named in that Act have not been admitted free into the United States by Act of Congress, but a considerable number of them have been. I was calling the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman, in not proposing to take those articles off the dutiable list and put them on the free list, is setting at defiance an Act of Parliament that he himself asked the House to put upon the Statute-book. That is the position of things. It is not a matter of discretion with the hon. gentleman; the hon. gentleman has parted with his discretion; he has asked Parliament to tie up the Government to a certain proposition, and that proposition is that the moment the Americans put upon the free list certain articles, those same articles shall be put upon the free list by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. No such a thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has no discretion. The hon. gentleman cannot put his opinions and his views as to public policy at this moment, above the law, and that is what the hon. gentleman has just declared to the House, that it is his intention to do. Now, I say that these words are clear and distinct, that there is no discretion left to the Government, and their duty is to put those articles upon the free list that have been put upon the free list by the Congress of the United States; and if the hon. gentleman thinks that is not good policy, then he should propose to amend the law that is at this moment upon the Statute-book.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only say that the hon. gentleman has not read the clause, else he would not make that statement. It is permissive altogether, it is not obligatory. The language is explicit: "Any or all of the following things," &c.—reciting them—"may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided for by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council." It is perfectly in the discretion of the Government. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but he did not read the clause, or he would not have made that statement. It is perfectly permissive.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will point it out, although this irregular discussion is really interrupting the business of this House. I say to this House that if the hon. gentleman will look over our free list and the United States free list, he will find that there is an infinitely greater number of articles allowed to come into Canada on the free list of the United States than are allowed on the American free list from Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. That has nothing to do with it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An infinitely greater number. But I will point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that we have got the interests of our own people to look after as well as the interest of the people of the United States. And, Mr. Speaker, if time permits, and a debate comes up, we will be able to show that it would be in the highest degree improvident in us to take some single article which will be specially for the benefit of the United States, and especially injurious to an industry in Canada, and put it on the free list, while they refuse to take any of the others in which there could be anything like reciprocity or interchange between Canada and the United States; I say they take out some articles the manufacture of which they think they can crush in Canada, and keep up their tariff on all other articles, except one particular article, when they think that they have got the advantage. That is not the way which we, as a Canadian Government, think best to carry on the affairs of this country, and I have no doubt that the majority of this House, and the majority of the people of Canada, will think with us.

Mr. DAVIES. I submit that the argument that the hon. gentleman has just used is altogether wide of the mark. He stated just now that the Government, in their discretion, looking to the interest of certain seedsmen, did not see fit to comply with the plain words of an Act of Parliament. The hon. member for Bothwell pointed out to him that he had no discretion at present, that the proper construction of the Act demanded that when all or any other of these articles should be admitted free of duty by the United States, then, by Order in Council, the same article should be admitted into this country free of duty.

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman says the question is one of the construction of an Act of Parliament, and no one knows better than the First Minister, and the Minister of Justice who interrupts me, that the word "may" is the proper word to use in respect to actions to be taken by the Crown. Parliament does not use the imperative "shall,"—the Crown "shall" do this or "shall" do that. Parliament always uses the word "may," but the intention and spirit of that section is perfectly plain and perfectly clear. It was not so understood when it was passed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows well that not once, but twenty times, since that statute was passed, it has been declared in this House by responsible Ministers of the Crown, and by their supporters, that we have a statutory offer which, if the United States acted upon it, would enable their products to be admitted into this country, and ours to be admitted into theirs, just to the extent to which they acted upon our offer.

Mr. BOWELL. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES. Now, Mr. Speaker, the United States have expressed not only their desire but their determination that certain of those articles which we have specified shall be admitted free into their country, on the assumption that we would act in good faith in the offer that we put on our Statute-book. I say that while, technically, if that section was used with reference to private companies, the hon. gentleman's construction might be correct, when those words are used with reference to the Crown, and looking at the spirit of the offer, the hon. gentleman is flying directly in the face of Parliament.

Mr. THOMPSON. Since the hon. gentleman has referred to my interruption, I may explain to him and to the House in what sense my interruption was made. It was not made with reference to any construction which the hon. gentleman chooses to argue should be put on the statute at all, but it was made with reference to a statement made by him that the language of the Act was that the proclamation shall issue as soon as these articles are declared free from duty in the United States, and in that respect I am correct. My interruption was not intended to be at all offensive, but to call the hon. gentleman's attention to what I say was strictly correct:

"Any or all of the following, that is to say"—

Mentioning the things enumerated by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell):

"—may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty."

Then the hon. member, with the view of giving this Act a certain construction, says that "may" is always the word used in reference to the Crown. Precisely so; never is the word "shall" used at all, but never is the discretion of the Crown taken away by Parliament, and it is only when the matter is left discretionary and subject to the action of the Executive, that the Crown is vested with the right of bringing the Act into force, and therefore —

Mr. DAVIES. Will the hon. gentleman permit me? Does he mean to put that construction upon an offer made by one great nation to another, and to say that if the other nation accepts the offer, it is contended in a case like this, this Government can turn round and say, We will not do it, we were only fooling?

Mr. THOMPSON. I mean to say that there is no offer in the question at all. The hon. gentleman has addressed the House upon the question of the interpretation of one of our own statutes. My view of the matter is that whenever a matter is left open to the Crown to do it is left to the discretion of the Crown, and on the advice of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and that is the reason why the word "may" is always used instead of "shall," to imply that the discretion rests in the Crown, and is never taken away by Parliament at all. It was in that sense that I made the interruption of which the hon. gentleman complains. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of this as being a statutory offer, an offer on the part of this Parliament which involves a breach of faith if this Government should fail to carry it out to the full extent. Does the hon. gentleman mean to contend—because his argument goes that far—that this statutory offer—not only including the clause which has been brought to the notice of the House, because what is called the statutory offer embraces half-a-dozen other offers, and looks to the admission of free fish, coal and various other products into the United States—does the hon. gentleman mean to contend that it is a breach of faith on the part of the Government of Canada, even for that part of the statutory offer, to decline to allow the United States to say: "You have made that offer; we will take portions of it, and enact those which please us, and which appear favorable to our people, and we will shut the door in the faces of your people in respect to all the other articles"? I can only say that, in my humble judgment, if the Crown, having discretion, uses it in that way, they would use it to betray the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. It may be very true, it no doubt is true, that the discretion of the Governor cannot be interfered with by statute and that the word "may" is permissive and not mandatory; but it certainly is an unfortunate thing that there should be standing on our Statute-book now, and it has been there for the last nine years, a clause like this, which seems to provide that any or all of a certain number of articles named may be admitted to this country free of duty on the United States taking steps to admit similar articles there free of duty. It was understood by all, beyond question, that on the United States admitting free any of those articles named there would be corresponding action on the part of the Canadian Government, and if this was not the intention of the clause, then it has been left on the Statute-book to work mischief, as it is doing on this occasion. It invites retaliation, and if it does not mean what it absolutely says it ought not to be there, it ought not to have been put on the Statute-book in 1879 and continued there, and if the Government do not intend to comply with the obvious language of the clause they had better expunge it from the Statute-book with all possible haste. Of course, the view that will be taken by the American Government is that Canada has been acting in bad faith. They find this language on our Statute-book, and they believed evidently, and they will believe, that if they took this step we would be prepared to do what we explicitly promised to do. We have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite that we have a standing offer of reciprocity to the United States, according to the language of this clause, in any or all of the articles named. It is thus the Americans understood this offer. Now, if understanding this offer, as they obviously did, as one to admit free certain articles which they have placed upon their free list, necessary action is not taken on our part, and they resort to retaliation, as is threatened, they will do a great injury to this country. Take the single article of eggs. It is true they were on the free list of the United States before this clause was put on our Statute-book, but if we take the article of eggs and if the Americans were to impose a duty of four cents per dozen on them, it would involve a loss to this country of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 on that one article alone. Take the article of fish; if a duty was imposed on our fresh fish entering the United States it would involve a loss of great magnitude to Canada. Now, the matter involved is not one of very great importance. It is true, I am willing to concede, that Americans have selected certain articles and placed them on the free list, the whole of which are mainly in one direction, but we are placed in this unfortunate position that here is plain language on our Statute-book, and we are not complying with that language, and it will be urged in the United States that we are simply shirking what they believe to be a promise, because it is not advantageous to us to fulfil our promise. That is the view they will take. We are not, of course, placed in a better position than if we were granting something that would be advantageous to us. I believe, however, in view of the circumstances of the case, in view of the language of the clause on the Statute-book,—although I admit there is great force in the statement of the First Minister, although it is a permissive clause and not a mandatory one, and one in regard to which the Government may or may not act,—notwithstanding this is true, I believe under the circumstances it will be better to act in accordance with the implied promise embodied in this clause respecting those articles being placed on the free list, because we are inviting retaliation, and retaliation in a line that would prove very injurious to the interests of this country. If we were acting as the American Government believe it would have a severe effect on the relations of the two Governments, and might weaken our present friendly relations; and, in my opinion, when the interests involved in the present case are not of great magnitude, we should consider whether we could not with advantage, and especially in view of the small cost involved, admit those articles to the free list.

Mr. CASEY. I am not a lawyer and I do not pretend to argue this question from a legal point of view, but it is quite as necessary that those who are not lawyers should understand what the laws on the Statute-book mean, at least in general terms, as that lawyers should understand them. I desire to obtain a correct understanding of the interpretation of this statute given by the Minister of Justice. I understood him to say that the word "may" is always introduced when directions are to be given in regard to the exercise of the executive power of the Governor General, that when proclamations are directed to be issued in certain cases the word "may" is always used instead of the imperative word "shall," because, in theory at least, the discretion of the Crown cannot be limited. If that be so, —I do not know whether that is so in all cases—if the Minister's statement be exactly correct, it follows that, for instance, in the case of the Scott Act, or any other Act under which the Governor General is directed to issue a proclamation under certain circumstances, the word "may" is the word used, and therefore the Governor, advised by his responsible advisers, is at liberty to issue that proclamation or not. That is the only meaning I find in the Minister's words. Am I mistaken in that? If not, I suppose I have given a correct interpretation, and it is important that the country should know it. We always were under the impression that a statutory enactment is binding, that whatever the Legislature used, the words "may" or "shall," the statute had to be carried out when the circumstances arose. Certainly in regard to this particular statute, that impression prevailed and does prevail, not only here, but in the United States. The United States, being a nation of honorable people, believe that when we pass a statute declaring that a certain proclamation should be issued under certain circumstances, that the statute meant that it should be issued under those certain circumstances, and not merely that the Government were at liberty to advise the issue of that proclamation if they saw fit. Again, the Minister said that the prerogative of the Crown in regard to the issue of a proclamation can be exercised only on the advice of the responsible Ministers, and it is by their advice His Excellency has not issued a proclamation under present circumstances. Why is it the Ministers did not so advise him? The Minister of Justice says it is because the United States have chosen to put only a portion of the articles on the free list. Well, what is the wording of the statute? The statute says: "Any or all of the following articles." Why did the Government, and remember it was this present Government, this present set of advisers, place the words "any or all" on the Statute-book if they did not mean to accept reciprocity in regard to some of them, but would only agree to reciprocity in regard to the whole number? If they did not mean at that time to offer reciprocity in regard to some of those articles, but would require the whole number to be placed on the free list, they have changed their minds, and they have to explain to the House and the country the reason of this change of policy. Remember that those hon. gentlemen are the same advisers now, with few exceptions, the Minister of Justice being among the exceptions, and, at all events, there is the same Premier at the head of the Government, who is responsible for the advice given by any of his colleagues, as were the Government who placed on the Statute-book the words "any or all of the following articles." The hon. the Minister of Justice at least has given no explanation whatever as to why they have gone back upon the distinct wording of the statute. Now, Sir, this is a distinct change of policy, no doubt. In 1879 I am quite satisfied the Government did intend to make this offer of partial or full reciprocity in natural products, as we learn from the discussion at the time and from the use made since in the country of this portion of the statute. The reason of the change of policy is this. The hon. gentleman sees that if he allowed, even that there was reciprocity of natural products he would be giving up his whole case in favor of the National Policy, and he would be admitting that the National Policy did not protect and prosper all those articles in Canada. In order to save his beloved National Policy and his beloved friends—the few of them who make money on the National Policy—he insists upon violating the offer which was formerly made by his own advice to the United States when the National Policy was introduced. That is the reason of this change of policy, and that is the only reason the country can put upon it. It would be clear to everybody if he agreed that there should be reciprocity in those articles, that the whole pretence of the National Policy having benefitted the country in the past was a humbug. The hon. gentleman does not like to acknowledge that he has been a humbug in the past—he does not like to acknowledge it, at all events, and for that reason a change of policy has taken place. The possibly serious consequences that may follow from this breach of faith—for it is nothing else—on the part of the Government would take too long to discuss here. We may probably hear something about that before the end of the Session. If the United States have that respect for themselves which they have always shown, it is highly probable that the consequences will be very serious to our trade, and the right hon. gentleman will then feel the responsibility of what he has done.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, the First Minister has invited us to look at the statements that were made at the time that the National Policy, so called, was introduced, and when this resolution upon which that clause in the statute was before the House. I find that Sir Leonard Tilley, in introducing that measure, made these remarks:—

“I have this to say to our American friends: In 1865 they abrogated the Reciprocity Treaty and from that day to the present a large portion of the imports from that country into the Dominion have been admitted free. We have hoped, but hoped in vain, that by the adoption of that policy we would lead our American friends to treat us in a more liberal spirit with regard to the same articles. Well, after having waited twelve years for the consideration of this subject, the Government, requiring more revenue, have determined to ask this House to impose upon the products of the United States that have been free, such a duty as may seem consistent with our position. But the Government couple with the proposal, in order to show that we approach this question with no unfriendly spirit, a resolution that will be laid on the Table containing a proposition to this effect: that as to articles named, which are the natural products of the country, including lumber, if the United States take off the duties in part or in whole we are prepared to meet them with equal concessions.”

That was the proposition, and that has been crystallised into an Act of Parliament. The words of the Act being “any or all” of those articles.

Motion for adjournment withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT FOR EASTER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that when the Speaker leaves the chair at six o'clock this day, that this House stands adjourned until Tuesday next, at eight o'clock p.m., in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE WRIT FOR KENT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, before you proceed to the Orders of the Day, I wish to question the Government as a matter of privilege. A day or two ago this House passed a motion ordering the issue of a writ for the County of Kent, in Ontario. I understand that up to this time no writ has been received. I would like to know whether the Government have appointed a returning officer and whether the writ has issued from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the officer so appointed. In this matter, Sir, the Crown has no discretion whatever. The officer is the servant of the House and his duty is to obey the order of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Two or three days ago information was conveyed to the Clerk of the Crown in Mr. CASEY.

Chancery that Mr. Speaker had issued his warrant. The Government will in a day or two select a returning officer for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Up to this time the Government have not appointed any returning officer?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have not appointed one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And so the order of the House is disobeyed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has not been disobeyed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The word “may” is not there in that case.

COST OF RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What has been the cost of the Railway Commission to the present date, and what amount is estimated will be the whole cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $26,415.71. There may be a few outstanding accounts, but they will certainly not exceed $1,000 additional, and may not reach that amount.

COST OF LABOR COMMISSION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What has been the cost of the Labor Commission to the present date, and what is the estimate of the whole cost of the commission?

Mr. BOWELL. The cost of the Labor Commission to the 19th March, the date on which the accounts were last made up, as they are sent in every month, was $24,137.05. The whole cost will depend upon the length of time that the commission will occupy, and consequently it would be impossible to state it now.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia) asked, Whether, under the terms of the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, all lands paid them on said contract are not liable to be taxed so soon as the Company sells the hay of said land, or in any other way receives a rental for said land?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That question involves a question of law which the Government cannot well answer about. The hon. gentleman can take the best legal advice to get an answer to that question.

MR. HENRY SMYTH.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Has Henry Smyth, at any time during the past year, been in the employ of the Government? If so, in what capacity, and at what salary? How much has he been paid? Is he still in the employ of the Government? If so, in what capacity? If not, when were his services dispensed with?

Mr. CARLING. I suppose the hon. gentleman refers to Henry Smyth, ex-member of this House?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Smyth was employed last year in the immigration service in the North-West and also in Dakota and Minnesota. He was paid at the rate of $100 a month, with an allowance for actual travelling expenses. The total amount paid to him was $1,850.50. His employment by the Department ceased on November 15th last at the termination of the specific duties for which he was appointed.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, How many persons are now employed by the Government of Canada in every branch of the public service, and receive public money in consideration of said service?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman would do better to put that in the shape of a motion for a return. It is impossible to answer it in reply to a question.

INSOLVENCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John), for Mr. EDGAR, asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce an Insolvent Act during the present Session, or any legislation in that direction?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to establish, and bring into active operation, experimental farms in the Province of Manitoba during the coming season?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

PAYMENTS TO IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have any sums of money been expended by the Government, in payments of any sort, to persons in Dakota, to induce them to remove to Manitoba?

Mr. CARLING. No money has been paid whatever.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF OTTAWA COUNTY.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, Whether the Government intend to cause such a geological survey to be made in the County of Ottawa as will afford all necessary information with regard to the mineral and phosphate interests of that section of country?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The work of the Geological Survey in Ottawa County was commenced last year, and it will be continued this year with special reference to the subject the hon. gentleman refers to.

HARBOR OF PAPINEAUVILLE.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to send a dredge, at the opening of navigation, to Papineauville, to remove all obstructions from that harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention to send dredge to work in that direction.

SURVEY OF CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. DOYON asked, 1. Whether the survey of the Indian Reserve of Caughnawaga, entrusted to Mr. Lea Walbank, has been completed? 2. If so, whether it is the intention of the Government to lay his report before the House, and when? 3. What is the total amount paid to Mr. Walbank, to date, and what amount remains due to him?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The field work connected with the survey has been completed. The returns of the survey have not yet been received, but they are promised in the course of a few days. As to whether the report will be laid on the Table if Parliament asks for it, I presume it will be brought down, as I see no objection to that being done. The total amount paid to Mr. Walbank and his staff up to date, on account of the survey of the Caughnawaga reserve, is $18,000. The cost of this survey has been very heavy, but it has been occasioned by the intricacies connected with the work, owing to the Indians having taken up and cultivated irregular pieces of land within the reserve, and their respective rights having to be clearly defined by survey of the boundaries of these pieces of land, with a view to determine what those rights were, and making a valuation of the land individually improved by them.

GRAZING LEASES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. WELDON (St. John), for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, asked, How many acres of land in the district of Alberta, North-West Territories, are held under lease for grazing purposes, and on which no settler is allowed a homestead entry without first obtaining the permission of the leaseholder?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The number of acres of land leased for grazing purposes in the district of Alberta altogether is 4,466,844. Of this 1,718,640 acres are held under old leases, and the land is not open for homestead and pre-emption. I may say, however, that we are doing our best to get that particular provision released, and in the Calgary and McLeod districts we have succeeded very largely. Several of the old leases have been cancelled for non-fulfilment of the conditions. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will answer a question put to me the other day by Sir Richard Cartwright, which I was then unable to answer in full. He asked what amount of money had been received from the sale of lands in the North-West, from the 1st January to the 1st March. I have ascertained that the amount is $100,068.04.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Mr. REID, for Mr. PRIOR, asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a Commission to accurately define the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska, and if so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Diplomatic correspondence is now going on between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, in which the Canadian Government is consulted, with reference to a survey either jointly or separately by the two Governments.

SECTION "A," WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. WELDON (St. John), for Mr. EDGAR, asked, 1. To whom was the work of deepening section "A" of the Welland Canal originally awarded? 2. Were new tenders called for when the work was taken off the hands of the first contractors? 3. If not, then, to whom was the work awarded?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work was awarded to R. P. Cooke and Chilton Jones for $145,299, they being the lowest tenderers. The work later on having been taken off the hands of this firm, new tenders were called for, and the lowest tender was accepted, namely, that of Murray & Cleveland, for $173,945.

PAMPHLET ON SCIENTIFIC DAIRY PRACTICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to publish in the German language Mr. Lynch's pamphlet on scientific dairy practice?

Mr. CARLING. It is not the intention.

SALES OF CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. WELDON (St. John), for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, asked, 1. Whether the Government have obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a statement of the lands sold by them to private individuals or corporations? 2. Whether, if they have not obtained such statement, the Government intend to take any steps to secure such statement?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That return was laid on the Table about a fortnight ago.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Collingwood and Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Western Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. Ward.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the South Norfolk Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

BILL CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Curran.)

UPPER OTTAWA IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved second reading of Bill (No. 20) relating to the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company.

Mr. HAGGART. Before that Bill obtains its second reading, I would call the attention of the Government to the peculiar nature of the Bill. It virtually gives to this company the control of the navigation of the river from the Des Joachims rapids up to the Quinze. They have at present the control of the Ottawa as far as towage is concerned and the passage of logs from the Des Joachims down to Ottawa River, and this gives them the further control from the rapids up to the Quinze. Perhaps it is not objectionable that the control should be given to them, so far as regards the present members of the company, who are principally the owners of the mills around Ottawa and the principal persons interested in it, but I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that at some time or other it is contemplated that the canal system may be extended up the Ottawa river to the Georgian Bay, and the control of this company might pass into other hands by the sale of stock or otherwise, and might not be worked so much in the interests of the people if it were in other hands. Besides, I think that, in regard to a large river like the Ottawa, it is objectionable that the slides and other improvements in connection with navigation should be in the hands of a private company at all. Many of the improvements on the different large streams as well as on the Ottawa river are in the hands of the Government, and they pay well, in fact they pay a handsome dividend. I think it is objectionable for a company as at present constituted to have control of the river from Des Joachims to Ottawa. It may be very objectionable, and it may, at some future time, cost the Government a large sum of money when they may be compelled to assume these works again. I believe that this company is composed, principally, of the same persons who are interested in this work, and are desirous of obtaining the Government works—I do not know whether there are any between the Des Joachims and Quinze, but there are on the Madawaska River. I enter my protest on behalf of the parties interested in that section of the river in lumbering and driving logs down that stream. I say these improvements ought not to pass into the hands of any company. We believe that there is at present a control by the Government, and that it is in the best interest of the country and the best interest of the trade, that it should remain so. I simply state these objections for the purpose of drawing the attention of the Government to the enormous scope of this Bill, in which Parliament is asked to give control of the navigation from the city of Ottawa to the Quinze Rapids. It is simply objectionable that any company should have the power which this company propose to assume under this Bill.

Mr. BRYSON. In rising to protest against the passing of this Bill, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I do it with a great deal of reluctance, as I feel that the promoters of this Bill, being Chaudière lumbermen, are entitled to fair consideration in making improvements. They have operated on the Ottawa River for a distance of 140 miles, as their charter of 1875 gives them power to do. But they are now asking for further powers beside driving powers, and on a river which has been declared by this Legislature to be a navigable stream. I believe the Ottawa River improvements should be controlled entirely by the Government. They not only ask control of the river for 350 miles, but they virtually ask control of the entire towage of logs and timber as well, which, to my mind, as a practical lumberman, would prove very detrimental to the private interests of the minor proprietors on the Ottawa River, which I do not believe is the intention of this Government. I proposed at one time to discuss this Bill clause by clause, as it is to my mind exceedingly objectionable, but as the time of the House is very limited to-day, I will not go into the details, but will merely say that I protest against any company acquiring such right as they ask for in this Bill. It is true that the company are willing to adopt certain amendments in this Bill. I have met them and have discussed the Bill clause by clause. It is now before the House, and the company are willing to make certain concessions in order to get the Bill through, but I believe that even with the concessions which they are willing to make, it is not in the public interest that the Government should allow this Bill to pass. I ask the Government, during recess, to give it their serious consideration, and after the reassembling of Parliament, I think, the Government should take over the improvements now held by the Ottawa River Improvement Company, instead of giving these men further power to control the river for 350 miles.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am quite sure the two hon. gentlemen who are opposing this Bill are doing it with proper intentions. Let me say, however, that the question is not a new one. The gentlemen who are now asking for an extension of rights and powers that they already possess in regard to a portion of the Ottawa River have possessed and enjoyed those rights over a certain portion of the Ottawa River since 1875. It is not correct, as stated by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) that these gentlemen, the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company, have any rights as regards the navigation of the Ottawa, or that they control the navigation of the Ottawa in any respect. They have a right to locate and construct certain improvements to facilitate the descent of timber down the Ottawa River. When they obtained their Act of incorporation in 1875, it was believed by them that the point to which they then proposed to go, Des Joachims, was sufficiently distant and northerly upon the Ottawa to suit all their purposes. As the timber has become cut away along the Ottawa, and as it is necessary for the lumbermen to go further into the interior, it is found necessary for them to construct certain works and to have driving powers over a further extent of river, and that is the reason they are here to-day asking for the powers mentioned in this Bill. I say they have no powers for controlling the navigation of the river. The whole object of this company, first, in getting incorporated in 1875, and getting certain powers as far as Des Joachims, and now asking to have these powers to Lake Temiscamingue, is for the purpose of facilitating the descent of timber to the mills at Ottawa, and for cheapening the cost of its transport. They are asking for no new powers, as I have already said, and the powers that they have possessed under the Act of 1875 were carefully guarded by the House at that time, as I propose the House shall carefully guard the powers granted under this Bill, if they allow it to pass. Let me say, Sir, that the gentlemen who are asking for this Bill, and who obtained the Act of incorporation in 1875, were not particularly desirous of constructing these improvements. It required a considerable outlay of capital at their hands, which they would very much rather not have undertaken, and if the Government had been willing then, or if they were willing now, to undertake the construction of these improvements for the purpose of facilitating the descent of timber, I am quite sure that the gentlemen interested in this Company would be quite willing to withdraw this Bill and to transfer their works to the Government, as the hon. member for South Lanark has said, for the acknowledged cost of the work as constructed by them. Let me point out this further circumstance in regard to what has fallen from the hon. member for South Lanark respecting the canalling of the Ottawa River. In the Act of incorporation of 1875, it was specially provided, and I have no doubt that provision will be incorporated in this Act also, that the company should remove any of these works at any time that the Government might require them to be removed to facilitate navigation. Now, as regards the objections offered by my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Bryson), he says that it is proposed by this Bill to give to this company control of all the towing upon the Ottawa River. I think this House will agree with me that that would be utterly impossible. You cannot take away the river, you cannot grant any franchise upon the river that will prevent anybody else from putting a steamer there for the purpose of towing or doing any other work. All this company asks with regard to towing is this, that if they are unable to make a contract with a towing company, or with any steamboat company, or if they are unable to secure the towing of their logs at reasonable rates, they should have power to construct and run steamboats themselves. It is not necessary to come to this Parliament to get that power. They already have it. That company organised in 1875 under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and obtained letters patent to enable them to do what this Act will enable them to do in respect to towing logs down the Ottawa. I repeat again that all that is asked by this Bill is to enable these people to construct improvements under the strict supervision of the Government, and to locate them where the Government may determine for the purpose of facilitating the descent of timber down the Ottawa. And let me say this further, if I thought a single public interest or the right of a single private individual would be interfered with by this Bill, I would not have brought it before the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bill has already received the attention of certain members of the Government, and especially of myself, as chairman of the Railway Committee, to which this Bill will most likely be referred, and I must say that after reading the Bill I found that it certainly required considerable amendment before it should be allowed to pass, provided the principle of the Bill was admitted. Therefore, in allowing now—so far as the Government are concerned—the Bill to be sent to the Committee, we do not pledge ourselves to the principle of the Bill, but we wish it to be well considered by the Committee to which, of course, these measures must be referred. When the Bill comes back from the Committee it will, I have no doubt, be in such a form that it will receive the best consideration of this House. There were a number of omissions from the Bill which its promoters promised to remedy. There were certain sections, one or two referred to by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson), which, of course, must disappear, or be very much modified. Under these circumstances, and as these modifications and amendments cannot be made in this House but must be made in the Committee, I think the best course to follow is to allow this Bill to receive the second reading and be referred to the Committee.

Mr. HAGGART. With the permission of the House I desire to reply to an observation made by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) in which he stated that I said the Bill gave exclusive control of the river to this company in regard to navigation. I said it virtually does so. If a party has a railway round the rapids on a stream, which is navigable above and below, and has sole control of that railway, or has slides for the passage of logs, that party can make their tolls and towage so excessive over that particular portion of it as to compel parties coming down the stream to use their towage above and below that railway or improvement. This Bill virtually gives control of navigation so far as regards the passage of logs and timber down that stream.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The best answer to that remark is the fact that you cannot give the control of the navigation of a stream to anybody. No company can possess any franchise giving right to navigate any stream.

Bill read the second time.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade there-with.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending Trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. FREEMAN. I am quite aware that before the adjournment of the House there was a feeling of impatience among the members for the conclusion of this debate. I do not know what effect the recess has had, but I am very much disposed to believe that it has not changed that feeling very much; and as I am quite in sympathy with it, I will endeavor to-night to make the few remarks I intend to make in as short a time as it is possible for me to make them. The proposition before the House I understand to be something like this, that it is not only desirable but necessary, in order to save this country from ruin, that there should be a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity made with the United States, and that the extravagant expenses of the Government should be stayed; and inasmuch as these extravagant expenses are a part of the National Policy, in order to get rid of that and the other burdens that rest upon the people, it is not merely important, but absolutely necessary, if any good is to be accomplished, that the gentlemen on the other side of the House should be put in power and the present Government displaced. While the resolution does not set this out fully, the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed it very boldly, very clearly and very distinctly. The National Policy has been the stone of stumbling, the rock of offence to hon. gentlemen on the other side. Against it they have hurled their artillery of misrepresentation, their artillery of ridicule, their artillery of every description. Indeed, no language was lacking on their part to bring that policy into discredit and now, Sir, when seeming failure is at hand, when all the predictions of the hon. member for South Oxford seem to have failed, when all their hope is gone, they find an ally; they strike hands with a gentleman who represents himself as a Canadian. Well, Sir, he may be a Canadian born, but my experience, and it is not a very short one, leads me to this conclusion, that of all Americans, the one that this country should keep clear of is an Americanised Canadian. There are no greater enemies to this country than the men who settle down in the United States, and make, as they express it over there, their "pile," and who then come over here and treat us as if we were a poor, ignorant set of men who were unable to find our own way through the world, and who need assistance, not to make our "pile" like themselves, but to be tools by which they can accomplish their purposes. I need not remind this House of the condition of this country between the years 1873 and 1878. When hon. gentlemen opposite came into power they found a full treasury, they found the country prosperous, as they themselves acknowledge, and they found everything in gratifying condition. What was the condition of the country in 1878? Every source of national life was obstructed, the sinews of trade and all avenues from which flows the life of the nation were obstructed or cut off, and the captain of the ship,—and I desire to remind hon. gentlemen that I come from near the salt water, where I was born and brought up, and if I use nautical expressions I hope they will pardon me—the captain of a ship, as the storm clouds gathered, indicating a storm, stood with his hands behind him helpless, with nothing to offer the people of the country but—hope. Hope is, doubtless, a very excellent thing, but my experience would lead me to this conclusion, that when you see a storm coming you must have something besides hope, for with that alone the storm will burst on the ship and captain and crew will find themselves in a terrible predicament. It was a dark day, the year 1878, for this Dominion. I have said something in regard to it, but there was one sign that perhaps more than anything else showed the condition of the country in 1878, and that was the number of bankruptcies. No less than $29,000,000 was, I think, the amount for which people were bankrupt at that time, and during the subsequent years bankruptcies continued, and there was the same tale of bankruptcies, bankruptcies! Yes, the nation was bankrupt, she was congested at the heart, and relief had to come from somewhere. In that dark cloud, as it hung over the horizon, came a rift; and sailors are delighted when they see a rift in the cloud, for they have hope then, and there is something upon which they can found hope. That rift gave promise of a bright sky beneath. To the front came the leader of the Opposition, the old, tried friend of this country. He, with his wise statesmanship, saw that the changed circumstances on the other side of the border necessitated a change of policy and change of action here, and he said to the crew of the ship, I am ready to take charge if you are satisfied with the mode I intend to adopt to bring the vessel out of the storm safely. And the heart of the people turned to the old chieftain and they were ready to grasp his hand, and they put him at the head of the Government in 1878, and adopted the National Policy as the policy of this country. What did the National Policy do for this country? It first filled the treasury, and that is a most important thing in any country. The outlook is always dark when the purse is empty, and one of the signs of a good time coming is that the treasury becomes filled. The National Policy filled the treasury. It did very much more. It restored confidence; and what is a country without confidence, what is a man without confidence in himself, what is a community or a family or a nation without confidence? The National Policy restored confidence to the people of this country, and with confidence came prosperity. Factories started up, work was provided for the working classes, trade revived and the congestion of the heart of the nation was removed, and we stepped out with renewed prosperity—I say the heart of the nation, because I believe in the future we shall have a great nation on this side of the boundary line, a nation that will vie with the nation to the south, a nation built up on British institutions, with British principles, with British men. I say that this young nation has gone on from step to step in her prosperous career; and how do we stand to-day, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite have said? How does this Dominion stand to-day so far as regards wealth, prosperity and advancement? She stands better to-day than ever before, there is more prosperity in this country to-day than ever before, and it has been steadily advancing and gaining since the National Policy was introduced. Try this Dominion by every test which men experienced in banking, commerce and finance would apply, by those tests by which communities or individuals and great commercial corporations are tried, apply every test by which nations are tried by the men who hold the purse-strings of Europe, and under those tests this country stands to-day in a prosperous condition. We have the proof of it everywhere. There is something more the National Policy has done for us; I need not speak of the magnitude and importance of that great highway, that iron road which connects the Atlantic with the Pacific. Why, it is only a few years since the advocacy of a road across this continent would have exposed a man to the ridicule of the more sober, solid-going people of the country. I need not speak, I say, of the magnitude of this great highway or its importance not only to this country, but to the Empire; I need not speak of the herculean task which this country took upon itself when it determined to build that railway; I need not do more than quote one of the leaders of the party opposite, who said it would require the whole resources of the British Empire to build this road in ten years. Nothing more than that statement is necessary to show the resources of this country and what it is able to do, when in less than ten years it has been able to carry out that great work, and to-day the credit of the Dominion is far higher than it was the day we determined to build the road. But hon. gentlemen opposite object to all this reasoning. They say that this is not a serious test to apply. One hon. gentleman had the fortitude—I say fortitude, because I hardly know by what name to characterise it—to tell us that it was no sign of wealth when a man had money in the savings bank. I call that an extraordinary assertion and one of the most extraordinary that I have ever heard. It, Sir, is an extraordinary thing to tell men in this House that it was no sign of riches, wealth, or prosperity when a man had money in the savings bank. I contend, Sir, that it is one of the indications that this country is growing in wealth when the deposits of our people in the savings banks are larger than ever they were before, and when they have multiplied wonderfully during the last ten years. What is the wealth of a country but the savings of every individual in that country, and what are the savings of a man but what he has left after all his expenses are paid, and when he has his family supplied and everything provided for? Is it not a sign of prosperity, is it not a proof of some measure of wealth when a man can deposit

a balance in the savings bank? I consider it is, Sir. We are some of us traders in this House, we understand the rules of commerce, and it is an extraordinary thing that any one should rise and tell us that we should not trust a man sooner when we knew he had money in the savings bank. Why, Sir, the idea of such a statement is preposterous. I maintain that from this the wealth of the country is manifest, but when we, on our side, boast of the wealth of the country, they tell us in opposition to that statement that we have not kept our people in the country. They say we are losing our people by emigration, that the National Policy has not put a stop to this, and that it has not brought back the million of Canadians who are in the United States. Well, Sir, the National Policy has not brought back that million of people, nor has it kept that portion of the people in the country who left since the National Policy was introduced. What did one hon. gentleman representing Prince Edward Island tell us here the other night, and in telling it, whether intentionally or not, he touched the very marrow of the question? He told us that the people were always going from Prince Edward Island to the United States, and that they would always continue to go. In that, Sir, lies the whole of the matter. People have always been going. In the memory of the oldest man in this House it is well known that the people have been going from this country to the United States. I remember forty years ago seeing in my own town, people boarding the sailing packets and going to Boston. They have been going steadily ever since, and I believe that they will continue to go, and that neither the National Policy nor any other policy will prevent them. We have been asked why they are going there. Well, Sir, they have a broader field there; but it is no reason why we should decry our country, or why we should have a poorer opinion of ourselves because there is a broader field in the United States. As well might a young man starting in business say that he could do nothing, or that he could not succeed because some person had been extensively in the business before him, or had probably been born in the business and had everything prospering around him. But that is not the stuff our young Canadians are made of. Our young men are plucky enough to say: "We will go in and we will take our share of what is going, and we will compete and contend with the older and richer men." The National Policy, while it has a tendency to restrain and keep back the people from going abroad, cannot be expected to accomplish very much in that line. The National Policy, I say, is calculated to keep the people at home, because it provides labor for the people, and will continue more and more to give our people opportunities and advantages such as they possess abroad. In this way it will tend to keep our people at home. Now, Sir, we have also been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we have not built up an inter-provincial trade. I suppose the object—or at least one object—which it was expected would be accomplished by the union of those Provinces was that there would be an inter-provincial trade built up between them. Statistics, Sir, are not wanting to prove that contention in this House, and I have not thought it necessary to provide myself with them, for we have had statistics here in great abundance to show just what provincial trade there is between the Provinces. I say, Sir, that if the inter-provincial trade between the Lower Provinces and these Upper Provinces is not so much as it might have been, we have to blame hon. gentlemen opposite for that. What is it that interferes most largely with inter-provincial trade, and the communication between the people of the Upper Provinces and the people of the Lower Provinces? Why, Sir, it is the continual efforts of the Liberal party to create ill-feeling between the people of the Provinces below and the Provinces up here. They seem to regard it as a part of their duty, and as a part of their mission, that they shall, in as much as they possibly can, keep up a feeling of distrust and dislike between the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Ontario. They began this policy immediately after Confederation, they have been doing it ever since, they are doing it to-day and they will continue to do it as long as this Dominion continues under the National Policy. I say again that it is to the gentlemen opposite and to the party opposite that we owe it, if there is not more inter-provincial trade and if there is not a better feeling of amity and friendship between the Province of Nova Scotia and the Upper Provinces than there is to-day. I will pass from that to what hon. gentlemen opposite have said with respect to the farmers of Ontario. They have told us that this National Policy has not prospered the farmers of Ontario. Well, Sir, I was very much surprised last Session when I sat in this House and listened to the doleful stories of hon. members opposite with regard to the poverty of the farmers of Ontario. Down in the Lower Provinces we were made to believe by those gentlemen who opposed the National Policy, and many did believe it, that the people up here were very rich, that they were fattening on the good things of the land and that we in Nova Scotia had to pay tribute to the farmers of Ontario for every barrel of flour that came from that Province. We were told, Sir, that the people of Ontario lived at the expense of the people of Nova Scotia. That is what they told us then, and I must say that their stories had some effect on my mind because I thought the people up here were all very wealthy, I thought they were rich and that we were poor, and when I listened to what hon. gentlemen told us about the poverty of the farmers of Ontario I was struck with amazement. I tried to call to mind some statements that I had read with regard to the prosperity of the people up here. I examined an author—or authors, as you may wish to call them, of considerable eminence and who are highly esteemed and regarded, I believe, by gentlemen opposite. I took the Toronto Globe of 1886 and I read in the Globe something that I will read to you now. It may have been read before, but it is so good that I will read it again. The following is from the Toronto Globe of December 18th, 1886:—

"There are many among ourselves who do not fully realise how broad is the domain they occupy, how advantageous its situation, how bountiful its resources, how fertile its fields, how favorable its climate, how substantial its progress, and how hopeful its future. * * * In extent Ontario extends over ten degrees of latitude and twenty degrees of longitude. From Lake Erie on the south to Hudson's Bay on the north, it has a breadth of seven hundred miles, and from the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence Rivers on the east to the English and Winnipeg on the west, it has a length of one thousand miles. Exclusive of its vast waters, which are nature's highways of commerce, it has an area of 200,000 square miles. It is larger than the six New England States, with New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland, by 25,000 square miles, and larger than Great Britain and Ireland by 78,000 square miles. The portion of it south of Lake Nipissing, which is the best settled and best known, has a soil and climate not equalled by any other portion of the same area on this continent. * * * But we can allow for these and still possess a country large enough and rich enough in resources on which to develop and sustain a nation. In Upper and Lower Ontario we have room enough for a Great Britain. Its farm land, its forests, its mines, its fisheries, its navigable waters, its innumerable water-powers,—all these furnish conditions under which steady and substantial expansion is not only possible, but under which it is only to be escaped by the blunders, the crimes, or the stupidity of the people. It may be said that little progress can be hoped for in the settlement of our northern districts until communication is opened up—until highways and railways are built, over which traffic may pass, and settlers and traders come and go. That is true, but with the wealth and resources of this Province there is nothing formidable in the building of roads and railways. We have only to look back at what has been done during the past fourteen years, to be satisfied that the Government and the people of Ontario are equal to any such enterprise, and to be satisfied also that they could not make a more desirable investment of the public funds. To-day there is hardly one important section in the older districts of the Province without its railway line; the total length in operation, exclusive of the Canadian Pacific main line, from Pembroke westward, is about 4,600 miles; and towns and villages, with their local markets, have sprung into existence or have been nurtured into importance all over the country. In 1872 we had in Ontario 122 incorporated villages, towns and cities, with a population, as enumerated by the assessors, of 374,854; in the present year we have 206, with a population of 675,499. The number of townships with municipal organizations in 1872 was 406, and the population as taken by assessors was 1,049,931; in the present year we have 445, with a population of 1,143,187.

"We should like to refer to the encouragement given to the great agricultural industry of the Province, by grants of public moneys given to Agricultural Societies, to Dairymen's Societies, to Fruit-growers' Societies, &c. We might show, for instance, how the number of cheese factories in the Province increased by 223 in ten years, and the value of their annual product by $3,213,000, and how in four years following the decade, the number of factories increased by 200 and the value of their annual product by $2,330,000. It is enough to say that its one Chamber system, with wise and able men at the head of its affairs, with a vigilant but grateful people industriously developing its resources, Ontario to-day is the wealthiest, the soundest, the most progressive, and the best-governed commonwealth in America."

Now, Sir, that is the record given by the Toronto Globe, and we know how the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite contrast with this record. I put this question to the House, and I put it to myself at the time, who tells the truth? Does the Globe, in this statement which it sends not only throughout America but over all Europe, tell the people the truth, does it tell the Government the truth, when it says that no better investment can be made than in the railways of Ontario? Does it tell the people the truth when it says that there is no wealthier or more prosperous commonwealth in America than the Province of Ontario? Does this paper tell the truth, or do hon. gentlemen opposite tell the truth? Both statements cannot be true. There is falsehood somewhere, and I leave you, Mr. Speaker, I leave this House to judge where it is. Now, while I am reading about Ontario, I will read something about Prince Edward Island, for I am speaking now rather of the Dominion than of a single Province. We remember what the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), said the other day about Prince Edward Island. He told us that the farmers were living without hope. I think those are just his words—I could refer to them, but I will not occupy the time of the House by doing so. I do not know whether he referred to only one class of the community, but he said that if it were not for the money sent home by their sons from the other side of the line, the people would really suffer want. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a hard description of a country. I trust it is not true. At all events, it is not fully correct, and it is contrary to my ideas of Prince Edward Island. Some of our people visit Prince Edward Island every year, and the reports that they bring back of the wealth of that Province are cheering and charming. We supposed it was a garden, a second paradise, where the people could live without much labor. I will read you what the Prince Edward Island Agriculturist says of that Province. This paper is the organ of the farmers, and if it told what was not true the farmers would detect it immediately, and would not suffer its statements to go uncontradicted. This is what the Prince Edward Island Agriculturist says:

"Prominent among the many evidences of the rapidly increasing prosperity of our farmers that we have met in the course of our ramblings during the past summer, are the numerous buildings being erected in almost every section of the Province. It is safe to say that for a number of years past there has not been such activity in building, and never in one season, in the history of the Province, have so many buildings of a superior class—much in advance of those of former times—been put up by farmers. Many of the houses built during the summer would, in size, architecture, finish and general appearance, do credit to any city in the Maritime Provinces. We are glad to note that many farmers have had to enlarge their barns, or build new ones, and that in these improvements the majority of them have kept in view the great advance made in agriculture and stock raising, and modelled their farm buildings accordingly. Thus they are evidences not only of increasing prosperity, but of a fuller knowledge of the great science of farming. The people are not only making great strides in agriculture, but they are doing so as a result of getting out of the old ruts, and moving alone with the spirit of the age. Farming to-day is not such as it was fifteen or twenty years ago, for the old methods have been completely revolutionised. The people are better off, their farms are in better heart, their buildings are more adapted to their intended purposes, improved stock graze in their broad fields, they till the soil in a very intelligent manner, and with a higher conception of the important position they occupy in life. In short, the farmers of to-day are more comfortable, better educated, and more contented and happy, than were those who preceded them in the march of life. All over the island are thrifty, intelligent, hardy communities of steady-going farmers, whose families are contented, and whose homes are models of neatness, order and comfort. The men are 'strong of arm and stout of heart,' and the women are 'pious and sensible, good mothers, helpful daughters and honest folks.' The wail of 'hard times' is seldom heard among the farmers of Prince Edward Island."

Now, Sir, I ask which of these stories is the true one? Are we to take the wail of hon. gentlemen opposite as well founded? Or are we to accept the statement of this paper, which is largely circulated among the farmers, that there is no such thing as the wail described by the hon. gentleman opposite heard in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. WELSH. What is the date of that?

Mr. FREEMAN. I read the speech of the hon. gentleman for Queen's, Prince Edward Island. He told us that the condition of the farmers of Nova Scotia was about the same as that which he described of the farmers in Prince Edward Island. Let me tell the hon. gentleman this, that if he means to say there is a wail of discontent from, and that a want of hope exists among, our farmers in Nova Scotia, he is wholly incorrect. Let me tell him that such a statement lacks every element of proof. Our farmers, it is true, are not rich; we do not expect to see very rich farmers, especially in those portions of Nova Scotia where farming is not the chief industry, but if our farmers are not rich, they are fairly prosperous, they are hopeful, and they are in a large measure, contented. At all events, they are certainly not discontented in the manner in which the hon. gentleman would endeavour to persuade us they are. Speaking of mortgages on farms, I may say that, so far as the farmers in my own part of the country are concerned—and that is the section in which there are a great many farmers—there is hardly such a thing known as a mortgage on a farm. Except in the case where a young man has bought a farm and has effected a mortgage on it, which he hopes by his industry to pay off, there has not been a mortgage taken on any farm in my section of country during the last ten years; and our farmers there are prosperous and happy. I will say this also, that not only are our farmers honest and industrious, not only are their homes orderly, not only are their daughters the models of all the virtues and accomplishments that adorn society, but our farmers are a sober community. In the northern district of the country I have the honor to represent, the district in which the farmers are most numerous, there has not been a single licensed dram shop known for many years. Our farmers are industrious and sober, and whatever side of politics they may take, whether they be Liberals or Conservatives, they are sensible, honest, progressive men, of whom any country might well be proud. I might make here some comparisons between our farming community and that of the United States, which hon. gentlemen opposite hold up to us as a model in everything. They want us, not only to model our tariff on theirs and our trade operations, but, I suppose, to model ourselves in every respect on the fashions set by the United States. I am sure we will hesitate before doing anything of the kind. I might give you quotations from different papers in the United States, which publish most doleful accounts of the condition of the farmers in the Northern States, and these would show conclusively that when hon. gentlemen opposite tell us the farmers of this country are to prosper and succeed by allying themselves with our neighbors on the other side of the border, and when they point to the farmers of the northern portions of the United States as a sample of the success that is to be expected from a union with that country, they are merely trifling with us; they are not dealing honestly or fairly by the farmers of this country. Another charge which hon. gentlemen opposite make is that we have increased the debt of the country. Well, our debt is a pretty large one and some of our friends in the Lower Province, when they see the figures, say: Well, I wish we had a little of it; I would like very well to have a year's interest on it. It is a very heavy debt, no doubt, and I remember last Session our Ministers having a pretty hard time of it at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, because, in some of the counties in our Province, they did not represent the debt at its full value but were some few millions below what these hon. gentlemen said it was, and what I believe it was. Hon. gentlemen opposite held up the Ministers as being unworthy of confidence, as having committed a great blunder, as having been guilty of a great sin, and it struck me they were going it a little too strong. It struck me they were forgetting their own conduct with regard to the debt. I have heard in my own county my opponents loudly talking, but what has their party done? They charge this Government with saddling this country with $220,000,000 debt, and they held that the people must get rid of this Government which was so improvident. But how does this matter of the debt stand. Looking into it a little I find that it was not all incurred by the present Government. I find that, during the administration of these hon. gentlemen opposite—I examined the figures, and at first I could not believe it; I turned the book first one way and then the other way, and I said, is it possible that these gentlemen ever saddled the country with any debt; it was something that bothered me, but I found that it was actually true they actually brought this country $10,000,000.00 in debt during their administration of five years. Why did they not tell this to the people? Why did they not tell the people of Nova Scotia, We involved you in debt to the extent of $10,000,000; we expended $40,000,000 during our term of office? Why did they not tell the people that, out of the whole debt, $109,000 were incurred as the result of Confederation and of the transference of the debts of the Provinces to the Dominion? If they desired to be honest and straightforward, why did they not let the people understand this, why did they not tell the people the true amount for which the present Government should be blamed or condemned? Before charging dishonesty as against members on this side of the House, those hon. gentlemen should first get their own skirts clean, and should see that they themselves are doing the honest and honorable thing. Now, there is a consideration in regard to this debt. As we hear it spoken of from platform and on the hustings, we imagine that it is something that might have been got rid of and that was not at all necessary. That is the idea which the people have in regard to it; but let me ask, what bearing does the debt of the country have upon the prosperity of the country? I say that the debt of the country is intimately connected with the prosperity of the country, and, if the hon. gentlemen opposite object to this statement, I would ask them to point out or to put their fingers upon the public work which has been undertaken with the money for which this debt has been incurred, to tell us what public work they would not have engaged in, what railway they would not have built, what canal they would not have deepened, what public building they would not have erected? Let us know where they would have saved this money they speak of. But they tell us nothing about this. I suppose they would not have built the Pacific Railway. I suppose, if they were in power, they would not have built that road which has given us the position we have to-day of having this railway, bringing the products of Asia across the continent of America and shipping them to Europe; bringing the people of Asia in competition with those of Northern Europe. Would they have built that railway, or would they have ceased to continue the railway which was already commenced, or what would they have done in this matter? I venture to say, when they make a full explanation in regard to this matter, it will not be satisfactory to the country. Now, there is a statistician, who I believe has some weight in Europe and in America, in this country and in Britain. I think he is a man who is relied upon by most people, I refer to Mr. Mulhall. He says:

"The expenditure in our colonies for railways, canals, harbors, drainage and other productive works has been most beneficial, the colonists borrowing at 4 and 5 per cent. and increasing the public wealth in a far greater degree."

Mr. Mundella, member of the British Parliament, an eminent political economist, said in 1886:

"A debt incurred for the purpose of constructing reproductive works was a very different thing from a debt incurred for aggressive wars. There was no doubt it was as immense advantage to a new country to have an abundant means of transport. There was a tendency in England to undervalue the importance of railways in the colonies and to overestimate the colonial debts. He believed the money lent to our colonies was perfectly secure and well laid out. Every effort ought to be made to encourage the colonies to develop their magnificent resources."

That is what this gentleman says about the expenditure on railways, and there is much more to the same effect. I say that the debt for which this country is responsible is a debt which has been well incurred, a debt which has been incurred for works which are highly productive, and which have contributed highly to the welfare and prosperity of this country. These are some, and only a very few, of the objections that hon. gentlemen make to the National Policy, and the grounds upon which they condemn the National Policy. As a remedy, as they say, for the ills which afflict this country, they will have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Well, there seems to be a good deal of difference in what these hon. gentlemen understand by unrestricted reciprocity. Sometimes it is called commercial union and sometimes it is called unrestricted reciprocity, and, if the speeches of these hon. gentlemen are taken up and examined, you will find that they differ very widely in their understanding in regard to the matter. It is, however, the breaking down of the tariff wall between the two countries, according to whichever view you take, and they say that great wealth and great prosperity is to come to this country in consequence of our having the privilege of selling our products in the United States markets. As they contend, it is simply to obtain the benefit of selling our raw products to the United States, and it is from this that the great benefit is to accrue to us. A country that produces everything which this country produces, which has produced, as we have, sufficient to sell a large quantity to foreign customers, is to obtain a wonderful advantage and wealth in the way these hon. gentlemen suggest. They say that when this tariff wall is broken down the farmers are to save two millions of money, which they pay into the United States treasury for the goods they now send in there, and, at the same time, they dwell upon the statement that we are to get dollar for dollar for all we get from the United States—that, while we are to get great results, great riches and great wealth in consequence of this union, the United States are to get equally wealthy with us, dollar for dollar. They have not told us whether this is to be per capita, whether the 5,000,000 of people on this side are to receive one dollar and the 60,000,000 of people on the other side are to get one dollar profit, or whether it is to be a profit per capita, but, if it is in the way I have suggested, I do not see where the money is to come from. I thought I could see this shrewd, clever Mr. Wiman, who has gone about Wall street, where money is made in some way, and generally out of some other people's losses,—I thought I saw this shrewd Americanised Canadian reading the speech of the hon. gentleman, especially the part in which he says: We are not beholden to them; we are going to give dollar for dollar. I imagine Mr. Wiman chuckling, and saying to himself: "Did you ever know an American to give a dollar for anything less than a hundred cents?" Let me tell you, that in any treaty you make with the Americans they will take care to get a dollar and a half out of you for a dollar, instead of a hundred cents. Why did they abrogate the treaty of 1854? Because they said they did not get the lion's share. This country contended at the time—at any rate, it was the feeling of the Maritime Provinces—that they were getting rather the better of that treaty, and I thought that was the universal opinion until I heard the contrary here. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us how gravely the American people were wronged by that treaty, how much money we were making out of it, and what great fools the Americans would be if they would have anything to do with us on the same terms again. I believe they had the best of that treaty, and we have had it from their own mouths that the reason they refused to continue it was that they hoped to drive us into asking for political union with the United States. Now, let us suppose that this union is effected, and that we got this $2,000,000 from the Americans for the benefit of the farmers of Ontario, how are we going to give that amount back? Remember, hon. gentlemen opposite say that we have to send our manufactures into their country, that for every dollar they displace in manufactured goods here we are to displace a dollar on the other side; and one hon. gentleman grew eloquent over the idea that Canadians could hold their own in that part of the world. As to that I dissent from that hon. gentleman. Just as he was getting up into the clouds with this grand idea of what Canadians were doing and could do abroad, he seemed to get paralysed, and he came down like some lofty bird under whose wing the marksman has shot a bullet, and said: "But when I come to my own business, I do not know whether I can hold my own or not." I think he might well say that. In manufactures this country can never hold its own with the Americans; it is ridiculous to suggest that we can. They would flood this country with manufactures, and if the people of this country, for the sake of getting their raw products into the United States, are willing to let the Americans come here and overwhelm and destroy our manufacturing industries, let us know it; but I believe they will never listen to any such suggestion. But some hon. gentlemen have spoken of the great wealth that lies under our soil, in our great mines. When one hon. gentleman was describing that wealth, I was reminded of a story I heard of a young man who had left his home in the country, and went abroad and saw great and marvellous things. When he returned home he was telling his brethren what he had seen. He found them very careless listeners, and he soared higher and higher, and at last said: "Why, in the interior of one island I was on, there were mountains of silver and rivers of gold, and all you had to do was to go in and help yourself." When the hon. gentleman was describing this country, I thought that he would come to the mountains of silver and rivers of gold; and it is this wealth, I presume that we are to give the Yankees. Let us suppose that it is, how are we to get the wealth? Is there any process by which either Canadians or Americans can take our mines and our lands, and remove them across to the other side of the line? I trow not. If the mines are to be worked, if the lands are to be cultivated, and if we are not developing our own resources, I suppose the Americans will have to come across and dig our mines and tickle our soil. If we have lost an immense sum of money, as we have been told, by the one million of people who have gone from us to the United States, what will the Americans lose if they send five millions of the people of the United States into this country in twenty-five years, as Mr. Wiman says they will? Why, Sir, the debit is all the other way. We debit them with everything, and give them no credit for anything. How are they to reap any advantage? Simply by taking our minerals and produce to the United States and getting a commission by shipping them to foreign countries. Why, Sir, if we Canadians know our privileges, as intelligent, industrious and far-seeing people, as I think we are, we will develop our own mines and tickle our own lands and ship our produce to foreign lands ourselves. We will not ask these American to come in and be our factors and agents in this matter; we will let them stay and develop their own mines and tickle their own lands. There is something else involved in this question—there is a loss of revenue; and Mr. Wiman in his pamphlet says there is no question but that the manufactures of the United States will displace a very large quantity of manufactures that come here from England; and as he is the man who has originated all this wisdom, I suppose we should take his word. If that is the case, in addition to the $7,000,000 that we have to provide for, there will be three or four or perhaps seven millions more, and how is this deficiency to be made up? Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored in a way of their own to show how this can be done, but they have dealt with it in generalities; they have not attempted to come down to hard pan, and as they attempted to grapple with it, I thought of a man with St. Vitus' dance among sharp-edged tools—he stood away off for fear of getting touched. In that way they were dealing with the manner in which this $7,000,000 was to be made up,—we say it will be nearer $14,000,000. Only one hon. gentleman opposite really attempted to deal with this matter. When, however, he came to touch upon direct taxation he was reminded by an hon. gentleman opposite that they would have none of that in their Province, and he dropped it just as he had dropped commercial union for unrestricted reciprocity on a hint given him by one of his friends. I say hon. gentlemen opposite have dealt with the question in generalities, and have not shown how they are going to provide the $7,000,000 of deficit in the revenue. We have been told that increased trade will do it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that we would spring into a better position in a day, and that our wealth would be increased. That reminds me of the old tale of Sinbad the Sailor. It will not do, however, to give us nothing but generalities in dealing with an important question of this kind, one affecting the very vitals of the country. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) after he was driven off the direct taxation remedy, jumped at the expenditure and said that by retrenching the expenditure they would be able to save millions. The hon. gentleman, also, told us how he was going to save. He was going to stop further public works. Here is very significant language used by the hon. gentleman:

"If we admit it is not possible to readjust our tariff, and that it is not possible to supplement that loss by increased revenue from other sources which undoubtedly it is possible to do, if we admit that for the sake of argument, we are still warranted in saying that it is possible to go back to the expenditure of 1881 and that we would have revenue enough without any change in the tariff even with unrestricted reciprocity."

Then we are told very distinctly by the hon. member for South Oxford that this Government could not retrench. He believed the Government were in a position that it was impossible for them to retrench, they had run so far with extravagant expenditures, and the consequence was this: if the revenue was to be obtained there must be retrenchment, and if retrenchment was necessary it must be made by hon. gentlemen opposite, who must therefore come into power. That is just what those hon. gentlemen want,—there is the whole thing. They think Mr. Wiman will help them to that position; but Mr. Wiman, a keen Americanised Canadian will have them in a place where they will not have to say much about the matter, for he will be master of the situation. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says:

"Now, would it be possible for us to effect retrenchments? We who have run up our expenditure from $13,486,000 in 1868 to $36,000,000 in 1887; we who have increased our expenditure four times as fast every year as the population has increased, is it possible to retrench in this country? Well, Sir, if it is not possible to retrench, it is not possible to avert ruin; if it is not possible to retrench, the country has got to go to the dogs; if it is not possible to retrench in this country, we may as well give up the case—the whole case. Now, I hold that it is possible. I will tell you where you might effect some retrenchment. You might abolish that sum of all political villainies, the Franchise Act, and you would save $400,000 at one stroke, and you would also save your character, and your consciences would be clearer."

The hon. gentlemen opposite talk as if we had no consciences. The party of purity has the conscience; they remind us of the old Scotch saying, "ma conscience." The hon. gentleman continued:

"You might get along with a little less expenditure on public works and buildings. I believe that in the United States, with all its wealth, there are about 60 cities only where they have public post offices. They only give post offices to large commercial cities such as New York and Buffalo."

So we are better off than the United States. The hon. gentleman will no doubt say it is all very well to build a post office in Toronto, but no post office buildings are required down by the sea, because they can be placed in the corner of a house. He goes on to say:

"They do not go into the business of building little $6,000 post offices as bribes to the people; they have not got so low in the scale of humanity as that."

Every public work in the Lower Provinces is called a bribe.

"Well, we might save very largely in the expenditure on public works and buildings; we might cut it all off, the whole thing, lock, stock and barrel."

The hon. gentleman was getting religious—and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not pick fun any longer at me on this account. He was thinking about the other world, this is another-world matter to him. He had better change his course a little, I think. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite this: members in the western part of the Dominion have got the Canadian Pacific Railway built, the canals enlarged, and a network of railways over the country, and they are not going to put us in Nova Scotia off by telling us that they are not going to allow any more subsidies to railways or other public works. What do they mean by telling us that they are going to save $7,000,000 of revenue in order to give the farmers of Ontario two millions for their horses and barley? No, our Nova Scotian people will never listen to such a demand; and I think hon. gentlemen opposite have themselves forgotten a little, for they do not always speak so plainly as to what they intend to do when they get into power. I have no doubt they will talk differently afterwards, they have been talking differently in fact. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has told us that this sad, this union question, is going to help us in Nova Scotia, and is particularly going to help the fishermen. I do not wish to be considered disrespectful, and I listened to the hon. gentleman's speech with a good deal of interest. I knew his long and successful experience in mercantile life, his long connection with the political party with which he is associated, the fact that he had held a seat in the Government and his long experience in all matters connected with this country, and I therefore expected to gain a great deal of information from the hon. gentleman's speech, and that I would be ready to say "amen" to his speech. But I was astounded as I listened to his speech, I was astonished that the hon. gentleman expressed great sympathy for the fishermen. I believe, Sir, that the fishermen are deserving of his sympathy, I believe, Sir, that there is no class of men in Nova Scotia who have brought more grist to his mill than have the fishermen and I believe he owes them a very large share of sympathy. I am glad to see that he feels sympathy with the fishermen, and I hope, Sir, that all that sympathy has not some other object besides that of helping the fishermen. He told us, among other things, that the fishermen had but one market for their fish, while he said that we had no other place to ship our fat mackerel to. That was very true. I have no complaint to make about that, for any man who knows anything about the fish trade in the Provinces, will admit it. But he went further than that. He said it was the only market we had for our fish, that the fisherman would be vastly benefited if they had this free market, that consequently the fishermen were suffering from the lack of this market, and that they were un able to build any vessels and that there was no encouragement for them to build vessels to fish in when they had no market for their fish. He described the fishing business in Nova Scotia as in something the same condition that the farming interest was represented to be in by the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward, Island (Mr. Davies.) Now, Sir, I had thought when I heard the hon. gentleman's speech that I had heard something different from him or "of him." I did not hear it "from him" but I heard something "of him," with regard to his views, gathered from his experience as a statesman, and I remember that I thought his views as a statesman then were different from what he enunciated in this House recently. They were made at a time when he hoped—I will not say "hoped," but expected—to occupy the position of Minister in this Dominion, and when upon him would devolve to a very large extent the mapping out of the policy of the Dominion with regard to the fisheries of Nova Scotia. I did expect that his opinions as they were expressed here would be different to what I found them to be. What was the hon. gentleman's opinion in 1872? Let us hear what Mr. Jones of Halifax said as his utterances are reported here in this book which contains the parliamentary debates of this Dominion for 1872. Mr. Jones said among other things:

"The last speaker had referred to the remarks of his colleague from Halifax respecting the advantage the treaty would have conferred upon the fishing trade of Nova Scotia had it been in operation last year. He stated that in that case Nova Scotia would have saved between $500,000 and $600,000 on the duties on herrings and mackerel which had been sent to the United States. He (Mr. Jones) held in his hand the Trade and Navigation Returns for the past year, which he presumed were tolerably accurate. He found from this document that the total amount of pickled fish, herring and mackerel and alewives—sent to the United States last year was 47,000 barrels, which at $2 a barrel would be $94,000 instead of $600,000 as claimed by the hon. gentleman opposite."

Now, Sir, anyone will know that small quantity of fish did not to any extent whatever represent the quantity of fish that was shipped from Nova Scotia, and therefore it overthrows the idea that the United States at that time or any other time was the only market that we had for fish. The hon. gentleman also said:

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. FREEMAN. The hon. gentleman if he cannot hear had better come over on this side. We will not mark you too much if you come over. I think you want to be here. But to continue, the hon. gentleman for Halifax said:

"The hon. member for West Durham, the other night speaking on the point had hit the nail on the head. He stated that the reason why American fishermen opposed the treaty was that Gen. Butler had gone to Gloucester and harangued them, telling them that now was their time to wrest from Congress what they had long wanted, namely a system of bounties and the bonding of their supplies. That was the sole cause of their outcry against the treaty and the Minister of Justice knew it very well and he (Mr. Jones) had grave apprehensions that such a policy would be adopted by Congress."

That was, that as soon as the Washington Treaty came into effect the Congress of the United States would give a bounty to the American fishermen in order to keep our fish out of the market and which would be a direct disadvantage to the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

"Of course, they would not do so while the treaty was pending, but when this Parliament accepted the treaty then would be their time to grant bounties to their fishermen and to allow the bonding of their supplies. And they were right enough from their point of view, because they argued if you give those people the water they will soon own the land."

"If we give the Americans the water they will soon own the land." I beg the House to remember that, as the sentiment of the hon. gentleman, and if it was true in 1872 so it is true to-day.

is true to-day. When they ask us to throw down the customs barriers between this country and the United States, when they ask us to throw down everything we have in this country at the feet of the Americans, and when the Americans have the trade of this country, as would be the case if they had the waters of Nova Scotia, they will very soon have the land, and they will very soon have the country as their own. But the hon. gentleman says more than that:

"Under those circumstances he felt as a representative of Nova Scotia that however anxious he might be for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with the States on fair terms, he was not willing to give the United States everything that we had to offer as an inducement for reciprocity. If we gave them permission to fish in our waters we put them in competition with our own fishermen and reduce the value of their fish. He stood here not to represent one country or one province, but the whole interests of the Dominion (hear, hear), and in that capacity he would feel it his duty to vote against the ratification of the treaty."

I might quote further remarks of the hon. gentleman all tending to the same thing. In one place he says:

"We will lose more by the competition of those American fishermen in our waters than we would gain by the reduction of the duty."

And to show the feeling of the party of which the hon. gentleman was a leader and in which he was a recognised authority, I will read to you what the Chronicle said on this subject. The Chronicle, as you will remember, is the leading organ of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, and I claim that no one has any right to separate the principles of this party. There are only two parties in the Dominion, the Conservative and the Liberal party, and the Liberal party is the same thing in Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and all over the Dominion, and what is said by it in one place should be said by it in other parts of the Dominion. This paper says:

"Sir John has peculiar claims upon England's gratitude. He has helped the Home Government to complete the national degradation by the Washington Treaty."

The Washington Treaty that gave us free markets for our fish was the degradation of the country, according to this paper. Then it says:

"It is the duty of the press to speak out boldly on the question, to separate itself from being a party organ, and to look at the Washington Treaty in its relation to the well-fare of the country. The treaty, if carried out, will prove most disastrous to Canada, and will necessarily lead to annexation."

They feared annexation very much at that particular time.

"There is nothing left for them (the Americans) to ask for except the cession of Canada. It is no wonder that under these circumstances the proclamation of the treaty by President Grant should have been made part of the national celebration of the 4th of July. A traditional triumph of the United States over her old enemy, has added to it this year a substantial victory which gives her more advantages than she was able to secure by the war of 1812."

Now, Sir, there is a great deal more of just that kind of reading. It says:

"We are safe in saying that no measure has ever done so much to weaken the already frail tie of allegiance to the mother country on the part of the colonies, as the consummation of the Washington Treaty. We have been called upon before to-day, either through the selfishness of Downing street or the stupidity of former commissioners, to make unnecessary and unjustifiable concessions to the Americans. . . . We should be unworthy of the name of British colonists and of the traditions of liberty which Britons are supposed to carry with them wherever they may pitch their tent, if the disregard shown to our constitutional rights and trade interests, had failed to arouse a spirit of resentment and indignation within our breast."

This is what that paper says about the Washington Treaty, because the Americans had the privilege of fishing in our waters. Now, under this treaty, we are to get great wealth, our fishermen are to prosper by letting the Americans come into our waters again. I contend that this is a change of base which I did not expect from the hon. gentleman, and I feel exceedingly sorry that he should have deemed it necessary, in the exigencies of his party, so to stultify himself, and so completely to renounce the opinions that he held at that time and to adopt principles exactly opposite. Now, I hold that the commercial union that is now proposed, this breaking down of tariff walls, would be most disastrous to Nova Scotia. I hold just as the senior member for Halifax held, that we are going to lose far more than we could gain by having a free market in the United States, and allowing the American fishermen to come into our waters—we would lose double as much by that transaction as we could gain. The hon. gentleman knows well that instead of the American market being the only market for our fish, the West Indies are the market for our codfish. The fishermen of Nova Scotia are not all employed in catching mackerel and herring, very much the larger portion are employed in catching codfish, and they send codfish to the United States only when the catch falls short there. I remember seasons when the Americans sent us fish to Nova Scotia to be shipped to the West Indies, but the West Indies have been our market ever since the hon. gentleman and myself were young men, and Halifax is to-day the rich city that it is because of her fishery trade with that country. Now, with regard to the United States fish market, let me say that during the Reciprocity Treaty the average price of fish that we sold to the United States was lower than it has been since. The hon. gentleman told us of a schooner that went to the United States with a cargo, I think, of 800 barrels of mackerel, and he lead us to suppose that in consequence of the duty, the fishermen got scarcely anything for their year's work; he told us that they got $30 a-piece out of that cargo. Well, he does not tell us how many fishermen there were to share the money, and therefore you can make but a little estimate of what the fish really sold for. The prices taken from the Boston Fish Bureau at the time, probably, when that vessel was there, do not warrant any such statement as that, and we can only come to the conclusion that the fish he refers to was spoiled fish, certainly it was not No. 1 mackerel. Now, I find that the average price of mackerel from 1854 to 1866 was from $12.84 to $18.90—those were the years of the Reciprocity Treaty when our fish went into the Boston market free of duty. I find that from 1867 to 1873, when we had to pay duty, the price of No. 1 mackerel was from $13.31 to $23. You will see that a larger price was obtained between the Reciprocity Treaty and the Washington Treaty, notwithstanding that we paid the duty, than was obtained during reciprocity, or during the time of the Washington Treaty. The price of mackerel as given by this Bureau of Statistics, from 1874 to 1885, was from $9.29 to $19.21, still lower than the years in which we paid a duty. I contend, therefore, that if the prices of past years are to be the criterion of what prices will be in the future, and they have been taken as the criterion throughout this discussion, then I hold that we gained in our prices for fish by having to pay a duty on it, and the last year carries out that idea. Last year the prices of mackerel in the United States were higher than they had been for a number of years. Now, Sir, I say that these facts led me to believe that under unrestricted reciprocity the interests of our fishermen will be injured. Hon. gentlemen opposite must get into power in order to carry out this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity. Well, now, the people have a voice in that; the people have had something to say all along. In 1872 the Government appealed to the people to endorse their National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite prophesied during 4 years that the country would come to ruin under the National Policy. But when they come before the people with their prophecies, the people said to them: We think you would better stay where you were relegated in 1878, and let the present Government still carry out the National Policy. Again in 1887, the people told them: While we commend your aspirations and ambitions, you had better remain on the Opposition benches a little while longer. And before these hon. gentlemen will be able to carry out their schemes of retrenchment, before they will be able to cut off our subsidies to railways and other public works, they must again go to the people. They told us that they had every reason to expect to be returned to power in 1887; and considering that there was no effort possible to obtain power, which they did not make, considering there was no scheme they did not work, considering they left nothing undone, which people who disregard their honor could possibly do, it is somewhat astonishing that they did not succeed. What did these hon. gentlemen do in Nova Scotia? What they did there must be ascribed to the whole party. They cannot escape responsibility by throwing the whole onus on the Nova Scotians, because the party, as a whole, is bound by its programme in each Province. In Nova Scotia they threw aside every principle that we suppose they formerly held as a Liberal party, for I pretend they had principles. I say it to the credit of the Liberals of my own Province that I believe they had principles, and that a large number of the people there who supported the Liberal party did so in the belief that the Liberal party had principles to which they vowed allegiance. But the Liberal party in 1887 cast aside their principles and adopted in each Province a different platform. In Nova Scotia they were repealers. There they said that the people of the Maritime Provinces were oppressed by the Ontario farmers. There they said that on every barrel of flour imported into those Provinces, the people had to pay a tax of 75 cents a barrel, or 15 cents a bushel on wheat, five bushels of which make up a barrel of flour. In that Province every word they uttered was in abuse of the fathers of Confederation. Not even the late Hon. George Brown escaped. On the contrary that hon. gentleman was held up as a man to be despised in company with every other man who had anything to do with establishing Confederation. In Ontario they told a different tale, and upheld Confederation. They trimmed their sails to every political breeze in the hope that in each Province they would catch a favoring wind. In Nova Scotia they said that Ontario was sucking the life blood out of that Province, while up here they said that Nova Scotia was living out of Ontario, and that all the breakwaters, all these public works built in the Maritime Provinces, were paid by Ontario. What did they do in Quebec? There they erect their platform on a scaffold, and the leaders of this great Liberal party bowed low at the shrine of Riel. I have nothing to say against the sympathy that French Canadians might have for that unfortunate and misguided man, but when the leaders of the party bowed down before him in order to traffic on race prejudices, they forfeited all claim to public respect and confidence. I was extremely sorry to hear an observation made respecting my Province and my countrymen. I was extremely sorry to hear it said that Nova Scotia offered herself to Mr. Blake, and that he would not buy her. I regretted exceedingly that that hon. gentleman, whom I have been taught for years to respect, whom I highly esteem—and I take the declarations of his party in reference to him and the statements of their papers, and I believe he is an honorable man—I was sorry that he was not in his place to tell us something about that offer, to tell us who offered Nova Scotia to him, to tell us how Nova Scotia was offered, and to give us some information more than the statement that Nova Scotia was offered to him. I do not know where that statement originated, I do not know at whose suggestion that insult was thrown upon us the other night, but I do not hesitate to say that I know what it was meant for. If I read what went before it, and if I read what followed after that statement, it was distinctly stated that Nova Scotia was got by corruption, by bribes from the Government, and it was meant that, if Mr. Blake had been a corruptionist, if he had been as corrupt as Nova Scotia, he would have bought Nova Scotia, and the members who now represent Nova Scotia here would not have been here. I think that is what was intended by the statement, and if that was meant, I say in behalf of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia and in behalf of the Liberal party also, that there is not one scintilla of truth in it; and, if I were not in the House of Parliament, I would describe it by some other word. I say that Nova Scotia never offered herself and that no authorised agent of Nova Scotia offered that Province to Mr. Blake or to any other party, and the statement is an insult to Nova Scotia, and an insult that Nova Scotia will not forget, an insult that Nova Scotians, the descendants of honorable men, will a long time remember. Now, this fad would never suit this country. Germany had at one time a customs union. All the smaller States of Germany united with Prussia in a customs union, and before many years passed over the natural result came from that, and all the German States confederated with Prussia. Prussia swallowed them all up, and, instead of the smaller States being benefited by their commercial union with the larger State, the larger State absorbed the smaller. All the smaller States were absorbed, and had to succumb to the power of Prussia. I might give other instances, and they all go to show that in cases of this kind the smaller States are absorbed in the larger. There is no doubt that this is just what the Americans contemplate. Let us see what has been said by the Americans themselves in other days when this question of reciprocal trade came up between the American and the British Governments. When the British North American commissioners went in 1866 to Washington to endeavor to secure the continuation of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, Mr. Morrell, of Vermont, who was the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, said:

"You want these commercial privileges that you talk about. Then take your seats here by the side of us and vote for them."

The Hon. Jos. Howe, at the Detroit convention, said:

"I know that it has been asserted by some and I have heard it since I came into the convention that if the Reciprocity Treaty is annulled, the British Provinces will be so cramped that they will be compelled to seek annexation to the United States."

These are the statements of these men, and we know perfectly well what the United States wants. It wants a market for its productions. Its warehouses are overflowing with manufactured goods, and it wants the Canadian market in which to dispose of them, and under no other consideration than the opening of our market to American manufactured goods will the United States enter into a commercial treaty with us. What did one of the leading newspapers of the United States say the other day in regard to Cuba? Discussing very fully the question of Cuba, it wound up by saying, Cuba is commercially ours now, and we are a nation of cowards or it would be wholly ours. That is the way in which they will talk about this country if this idea of commercial union is carried out. If there is a commercial union between Canada and the United States, they will say that they will be a nation of cowards, if Canada, being theirs commercially, is not theirs politically. Another feature is the fact that Mr. Wiman, who plans this whole thing, says that in twenty or twenty-five years he is going to put five millions of American people into this country. No one who has travelled over this country and has met the American propagandists can fail to know how they represent the beauties of the country on the other side of the line, the mountains of silver and rivers of gold which lie within their borders, and the great wealth which that country offers to immigrants and to anyone who will make that country his home. We know how they work upon the imaginations of the people. But, if so small a number of people can do so much, five millions of Americans in this country, who of course would have the right to vote—for that would be a part of the scheme—would have a much greater opportunity of influencing Canadians, and where then would be the loyal men of this country, where would they stand beside the five million of Canadianised foreigners, agents of the American people, who could easily carry the day against us? And this would be particularly the case if Canadians manifested the same feeling which hon. gentlemen have manifested on the other side of the House. I have been astonished to hear those hon. gentlemen, in presenting this unrestricted union question to the House, talk about Great Britain and the United States in the way they have done. I have been astonished to hear them plead the cause of the United States against that of Great Britain. Mr. Wiman is a little ahead of these hon. gentlemen because he writes pamphlets, but, instead of being loyal subjects of the Queen, as I presume they are, as they say they are, and as I have no reason to suppose they are not, except what I have heard them say in this House, if, instead of representing loyal Canadian constituencies, they were paid agents of the Americans, with American gold lining their pockets, those hon. gentlemen could not have represented American interests more strongly than they have done in this debate. More than that, the manner in which they sneer at our loyalty, calling us sycophants and every other name of that kind they could hurl at us. If they have not done it in this House, they have had it done for them outside. They have represented us as everything that is mean and base, because we are loyal to our country, because we are loyal to Britain. Love, Sir, is one of the largest elements, if I understand loyalty; and would you condemn a man because he loved the knees on which he was dandled in infancy? Would you condemn a man because he loved the father who protected and shielded him in his growing days? If you would, then you may ask us not to love Britain. But, Sir, after Britain has nursed us in our infancy as a colony, and has stood with her fleets behind her and has said to this great spread-eagle nation: "Hands off the little boy," are we to be twitted to-day because we love Britain? It is a new thing, Sir, that men should be twitted in this House of Commons of this loyal colony of Canada for professing their loyalty and their love for their country. It is a thing that will be marvelled at in other countries, and will be gloated over by the Americans who are seeking to annex this country to themselves. I am glad that this question has come up, and that the future of this country is to be decided. I hold, Sir, that when responsible government was granted to these colonies, we put off our childhood as colonies; when Confederation was framed, the nucleus of a great nation was formed, and when this country adopted the National Policy, it was a formal declaration to the world that we had taken the great and important step of nationhood, to protect our own industries and our own labor. We have now gone on for nine years in the same direction, and if we are now to turn back, and go on our bellies, as one of the papers said the other day, and cringe to the United States, and tell them we shall go to ruin if they do not give us this treaty,—I say if we are to do that, it is time that this question was put fairly before the people and settled. I am glad the question has come up, and I only hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not forget it as they did the National Policy which they espoused in 1887, when they told the manufacturers they had nothing to fear. When the hon. Minister of Finance declared that he was pleased to find that the hon. leader of the Opposition had been converted to the National Policy, hon. gentlemen opposite accepted that declaration, but they forgot it very quickly. I hope they will not forget this so quickly, and let us have the issue before the people, for I believe that in this Dominion there is an overwhelming majority of the people who will never consent to be absorbed into the United States. I believe there is an overwhelming majority of loyal people in this Dominion. I believe there is an overwhelming majority who will say with me: Let this right hand forget her cunning, let this tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I forget thee, Oh, Britain, the home of my ancestors, under the temptation of this spread-eagle country!

Mr. BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has expressed his desire that this question should be submitted to the people, for their judgment upon it, as soon as possible. If we can judge the future by the present, I think the Liberal party will have nothing to fear. I have an announcement to make, which I know this House will hear with pleasure, that the election in L'Assomption has resulted in the return of Mr. Gauthier with an increased, or I might say, a quadrupled majority. He was elected last year by a majority of twenty-one, and this year by a majority of ninety-four. I would now ask the indulgence of the House while I make a few observations on the question under discussion. I feel as if it was my duty to congratulate hon. members who have preceded me upon the excellency of their speeches, which have been interesting and in many cases full of information. The resolution at present before the House is, I think, the most important that has ever been discussed since Confederation; it is so comprehensive in its character, so far-reaching in its effects, and involves so many questions that have puzzled the minds of the greatest financiers and statesmen, that I rise to speak upon it with some diffidence. It was not my intention, when the resolution was first proposed, to take any part in this debate, because I felt that the resolution was of such a character that would meet with the acceptance of both sides of the House. It had been said on the introduction of the National Policy that it was a means to an end, that its purpose was to obtain reciprocity, and in discussing the National Policy upon public platforms, we were always met by our opponents with the remark: "We are free traders whenever we can get anybody to free trade with us." In listening to the hon. member who has just taken his seat, if I were a spiritualist, I would have almost thought that George Washington had returned in some sort of an angelic form; but when we come to examine the hon. gentleman's speech, we find that he was accusing members on this side of the House with sometimes suppressing truth, and who would have thought that this essence of purity would ever have forgotten and neglected the same duty himself? Why, Sir, in referring to the Provincial debts which were assumed by the Dominion Government, he did not tell us anything about the assets which came along with the debts. He spoke of an increase of $40,000,000 in the debt during the Mackenzie Administration. He also claims great effects from the National Policy, that it has done wonders for the country, and he intimates that public men and Governments should not make any promises they are not able to fulfil. When we come to examine the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the National Policy and their fulfilment, we find they are very wide of the mark. One of their promises was that the National Policy would check the exodus, which our opponents admitted to be going on; and, moreover, that it would be the means of bringing back those who had left the country. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), in speaking upon this question, intimated that had the National Policy been introduced ten years earlier, there would have been no exodus from Canada. I have taken the trouble to examine as to the true state of affairs in this connection. In 1870 there were in the United States 493,000 Canadians; in 1880, 717,157, or an annual increase of 22,000. In 1886 the number was 1,040,038 or an increase of 55,000 annually, being an increase of 150 per cent. as compared with the previous years under a revenue tariff. I notice that if hon. gentlemen opposite seek some good authority as to the resources of Canada they generally consult some commercial unionists. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred to and read part of a speech delivered by Mr. Ritchie, of Ohio. Had the hon. member completed the reading of that speech he would have found Mr. Ritchie's opinion with respect to this matter. Mr. Ritchie says:

"In 1854 a treaty of reciprocity was made between the United States and Canada, which, by its terms, was to run for a period of ten years or longer, unless terminated by either party upon a year's notice being given. The articles embraced in the schedule attached to this treaty were the products of the farm, forest, mine, and the sea. The operation of this treaty greatly stimulated the trade of both countries, whose present volume is largely due to the impetus given at that time or during that period."

The hon. gentleman also referred in somewhat complimentary terms to my esteemed opponent Mr. Wigle, in terms from which I do not dissent. He dwelt also on the loss the House had sustained by the absence of Mr. Wigle; but I think we may well say that what the House has lost the country has gained. The hon. gentleman was guilty of great ingratitude in resurrecting that old hackneyed speech and asking for a second judgment after its burial by the people of South Essex. I think at the same time he did Mr. Wigle an injustice from the fact that, if I do not mistake the resolution of which he was the seconder, Mr. Wigle has since repudiated the principles involved in that speech. At a meeting of the Conservative Association on the 12th September he was the seconder of the following resolution:

"This association is of the opinion that at the present time all channels of trade and commerce should be as free and unrestricted as possible, having due regard to the necessary revenues of the Government and the best interests of the Dominion, and that the freest possible commercial intercourse with all parts of the Empire, the United States and other nations would promote the best interests of the Dominion."

An hon. MEMBER. Who seconded the resolution?

Mr. BRIEN. Mr. Wigle. I thought I would refer to this matter as the hon. gentleman might have left a wrong impression on the minds of hon. members that Mr. Wigle was not in accord with advanced public opinion. The hon. gentleman also referred to the egg argument in somewhat amusing terms. I am sorry that he did not have that egg, for I am sure that if he was as apt with cracked eggs as with disjointed arguments he would be tolerably skilful. As representative of the people an hon. member of this House occupies, as it were, a dual character, especially when a new question comes before the House. He has to consider, first, its probable effect on his own locality, on the constituency he represents; and I will now briefly deal with that aspect of the question. I need not tell the people that in the section of the country I represent, South Essex, of the benefit that would accrue to them from the market of a city like Detroit, with a population of 150,000 people, being freely thrown open to them. Many of them have, no doubt, fresh in their memories the advantages that flowed to them from the old reciprocity treaty. It is no question whatever with the people in that section as to who pays the duty. Each man is well aware that if he has a horse to sell or any cattle, barley or any other produce he has to pay the duty, and instead of receiving $100 for his horse he will receive only $80. We have an opportunity of becoming conversant with those facts from having a personal knowledge of them. I have prepared an estimate, which I think is a very moderate one, as to the effect of unrestricted reciprocity on my locality, and the estimate will apply to the country generally. Take a farmer having a farm of 100 acres. Suppose he sold one span of horses worth $200 he would save $40; if he sold two head of cattle worth $100 he would save $10; five tons of hay, save $10; 150 bushels of barley, save $10; 100 pounds of wool, save $10, or an increase of profits amounting on the whole of the products of a hundred acre farm to the extent of $150. There is in the county, a portion of which I represent, 430,000 acres of assessed farm land, which would give 4,300 farms of 100 acres each. Assuming that we had free trade with the United States, that would give for this county an increased profit of $645,000. In the Province generally there are 208,000 farms, and taking the increased profit it would reach $31,200,000, which capitalised would amount to $780,000,000. That is one class of farmers. I need not say anything of the fishermen and of the lumbermen, for they will be satisfied. As to the manufacturers in our section, I have a communication from a manufacturer in the town in which I live, which, with the permission of the House, I will read. He writes:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am just in receipt of your telegram, 'How would reciprocity affect my business.' I have watched the debates on this question with a great deal of interest. Unrestricted reciprocity would be a boon to the manufacturing company here. We would then have the American States for our market. In fact, we have sold some as it is, because they considered the ploughs superior to their own make. If it were not for this duty line we could ship large quantities there and easily compete with the American manufacturers. We have to buy our steel in the States, because there is only one firm that make plough steel plates, and they do not make an article to compare with the Pittsburgh make. The Nova Scotia plates are very inferior, and they charge just about as much as the Pittsburgh men, that is they add nearly as much as the duty, so that as far as they are concerned they make a harvest out of the duty business. Having to buy a good article to make good goods in Pittsburgh we have to pay the duty. Last year the Government committed the outrage of raising the duty from 12½ per cent. to 35 per cent. on plough steel plates. This was done after we had made the greater part of our contracts for the season and, therefore, could get no more for our ploughs sold. This difference ruined the business for the year. True the Government, finding their mistake, reduced the duty to the old thing, 12 per cent., but they would not make any rebate for the money wrongfully taken from us during the year. Another point. There are about three ploughs made in Canada to one in the States, in proportion to the population of the two countries. Therefore, the competition has become so keen that the prices are cut very low, and in order to affect sales resort is had to giving long terms of credit, thus making the risks of bad debts much more. For our line of business, I would consider our institution worth 50 cents on the $1 more than it is now if the Chinese wall was thrown down. Stand firm as a rock. The cause is right and in time must win. We are all well.

"MILNE."

I have a telegram from the lumber firm of James Taylor & Son in my section of the country. They say:

"We think unrestricted reciprocity would be a great benefit to our business."

I have now dealt with the farmer, the lumberman and the manufacturer as far as our section of the country is concerned and, I believe, so far as my judgment goes, and from what I have been able to find out, that it would be of great benefit to the fisherman as well. Now, as to its general effects upon the country, we all know that under the old reciprocity treaty that we had prosperity in this country such as we had not experienced before that treaty nor since. We know that our import and export trade increased from $30,000,000 in 1853 to $84,000,000 in the last year of the treaty. This is sufficient guarantee that it was a great benefit and that it was a success as far as the country was concerned. I do not wish to delay the House by going into a long list of figures in this matter as so many who have preceded me have given uncontrovertible facts with regard to those things. We have had figures enough and if we were only able to remember them I presume we would be all "figured-heads." With your permission, Sir, I will read a report as to the progress of the country during the years between 1850 and 1860. It is written by Mr. Ward, an American, who made this report in 1862 in accordance with the desire of the United States Congress. He thoroughly investigated the resources and the progress that Canada had made and was making. In his report he says:

"During the interval between the last census and the preceding one (1850-1860), the decennial rate of increase of population in Canada exceeded that in the United States by nearly 5½ per cent.—Canada adding 40·87 per cent. to her population in 10 years while the United States added only 35·58 per cent. to theirs. She brought her wild land into cultivation at a rate in nine years, exceeding the rate of increase of cultivated lands in the United States in ten years by nearly 6 per cent.—Canada in 1860 having added 56 acres of cultivated land to every 100 acres under cultivation in 1851, while the United States in 1860 had only added 14 acres to every 100 acres under cultivation in 1850. The value per cultivated acre of the farming lands in Canada in 1860 exceeded the value per cultivated acre of the farming lands of the United States—the average value per cultivated acre in Canada being $20·87 and in the United States $16·32. In Canada a larger capital was invested in agricultural implements, in proportion to the amount of land cultivated than in the United States—the average value of agricultural implements used on a farm having 100 cultivated acres being in Canada $182 and in the United States $150. In proportion to population, Canada in 1860 raised twice as much wheat as the United States—Canada in that year raising 11·2 bushels for each inhabitant while the United States raised only 5·50 bushels for each inhabitant. Bulking together eight leading staples of agriculture—wheat, corn, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat, peas and beans and potatoes.—Canada, between 1851 and 1860 increased her production of these articles from 57,000,000 to 123,000,000 of bushels—an increase of 113 per cent.; while the United States in ten years, from 1850 to 1860, increased their productions of the same articles only 45 per cent. In 1860, Canada raised of these articles 49·12 bushels for each inhabitant, against a production in the United States of 43·42 bushels for each inhabitant. Excluding Indian corn from the list, Canada raised of the remaining articles 48·07 bushels for each inhabitant, almost three times the rate of production in the United States, which was 16·74 bushels for each inhabitant. And as regards live stock and their products, Canada in 1860 in proportion to her population owned more horses and more cows, made more butter, kept more sheep, and had a greater yield of wool than the United States."

Referring to this report the author, Sir Edward Watkin, the former president of the Grand Trunk Railway, a gentleman well known to hon. gentlemen in this House, says:

"Our British Government having thus allowed the treaty to expire, and having thereby damped the energies of the colonies, and excited the hopes of the protectionist and annexationist parties in the States, what are we to do?"

"In the first place Parliament should express its condemnation of the failure of the executive; in the second, its desire for peace and fraternity with the United States; and in the third, its determination to stand by the Queen's Dominions on the other side of the Atlantic."

"What ought we to seek now to secure, in the interests of peace and civilization?"

"1. A neutralisation of the 3,000 miles of frontier, rendering fortifications needless.

"2. A continuance of the neutrality of the lakes and rivers bordering on the two countries.

"3. Common navigation of the lakes and the outlets of the sea.

"4. An enlargement of canals and locks to enable the food of the west to flow unimpeded and at the smallest cost direct in the same bottom to Europe or any other part of the world.

"5. Neutrality of telegraphs and post routes between the Atlantic and Pacific, no matter on which territory they may traverse.

"6. A free interchange of untaxed and an exchange, at internal revenue duty rate only, of taxed commodities.

"7. The passage of goods in bonds through the respective territories as heretofore.

"8. A common use of ports on both sides of the continent."

That statement was made nearly 20 years ago, and it is almost in accordance with the present resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), so that we find that all Englishmen do not consider it disloyal to enter into any reciprocity treaty with the United States. It refers to the amendment of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and it also applies to the section of country which I have the honor to represent. At the present time there are residents in the towns along the lake shore, many brave sailors, captains and mates of vessels, second in courage to no men in the Dominion of Canada, who might be useful citizens if they were retained in Canada, but in consequence of not being able to obtain situations, owing to the destruction, almost, of our shipping, they have to seek work in the United States, although it does not have the effect, as hon. gentlemen opposite would seem to think, of making them disloyal, because they still live under the British flag and are loyal subjects of the Queen. Now, I will not contrast the condition of Canada at different periods, as that has been so frequently done by hon. gentlemen from this side of the House, but I will refer to one or to points. With regard to population, I think I have made a fair and moderate estimate. I have taken, as a basis our population in 1861, and the natural increase of births over deaths. In the Australian colonies that increase is $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or at least 25 per thousand, and in order to maintain the position under all circumstances, I have placed our increase at 20 per cent., which will be at the rate of 2 per cent. The population of the old Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, in 1861, was 300,000. Then our population in those Provinces should have been, in 1871, 3,708,000. Adding to the population of the old Provinces that of Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Manitoba, and the North-West Territories, 200,000, which is, I think, a little under the mark, we should have, in 1871, a population of 3,908,000. Add to this from the same standpoint the natural increase, and we should have, in 1886, a population of 5,080,000; whereas, according to the statistics furnished by the Government, our population in 1886 did not exceed 4,725,000. Then we have lost of our natural increase, 355,000. Add to this sum the immigrants we have received, according to the Government figures, 824,000, and we have, under these circumstances, 1,179,000 to account for, and the question is, where have they gone, and what is the cause of their departure? Sir, if a remedy can be found which will retain these people at home, and, if possible, bring back those that have gone away, I think it should be adopted, and I believe that unrestricted reciprocity would have that effect. We all remember the great promises that were made of a home market under the National Policy. Well, this home market has not been found for the farmers. In some cases, I believe, there is a slight increase in the population of the towns and cities, but it has been at the expense of the country, so that there is really no home market whatever. It has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that under unrestricted reciprocity our cattle trade with England would be destroyed. I will not presume to give you an opinion on that point myself, but I will give you the statement of a gentleman whom all will admit to be fully competent to speak upon it, and that is Mr. Valancy Fuller, a stock dealer. I will not detain the House by reading a long letter of his upon this point, but in substance he says that this new arrangement will not affect the sale of cattle in England if our quarantine regulations remain the same. Now, it has always been claimed by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me on the opposite side of the House, that the National Policy has benefited the laboring men. Instead of using any argument of my own, I will mention a circumstance that occurred to my personal knowledge, which shows the effect it has upon laboring men near the border who are in frequent communication with the people across the line. A young man who was employed as a painter in the village of Leamington, went to Detroit and bought an article which cost him \$1. Coming back over the river, he had to pay a duty of 30 or 35 cents. He went to his home, and a few days afterwards a painter came from the city of Detroit and offered to work for the same employer at a much less rate of wages than this young man could obtain himself, so that the young man had to come down to the standard of the American labor or else lose his situation. That was the effect upon this laboring man. It not only reduced the purchasing power of what he earned, but it gave him no protection. Indeed, public money has been spent in the past in bringing laborers over from Europe to compete with our own laborers.

Mr. TAYLOR. Times are much better in Canada than in the States, then?

Mr. BRIEN. That only shows the principle. It is a special case, it shows what they can do. Now, the question of interprovincial trade has been frequently referred to; the Minister of Marine has referred to it at great length, and I am glad to say that I think we can produce evidence of the benefit of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, by taking the result of interprovincial trade. What has been the principal cause of the increase of interprovincial trade? Why, Sir, simply throwing down the barriers between the various Provinces which formerly had a tariff of their own. It had the effect of increasing the interprovincial trade, and I am sure that trade will not stop on account of the flag. Our climate varies over a narrow strip of country over 4,000 miles in length, and our natural productions are varied according to the climate. Well, we must have variety of products in order to secure an exchange of trade, because two nations having the same classes of goods to export are not likely to trade so freely with each other as those having dissimilar classes. Variety is the basis of exchange and exchange is the basis of commerce, and I know of no means to meet the case except that set forth in the resolution now before the House. The Government may tunnel mountains, they may bridge rivers, and annihilate space, but they will find it impossible to overcome the difficulties of climate. The hon. gentleman of Marine referred to the natural market. With regard to that question, there are many things to be taken into consideration. A natural market is one in which we can sell at profitable prices, and from which we can obtain in exchange return cargoes. The hon. gentleman also referred to the West Indies and to the increase in provincial trade as compensating advantages to the Maritime Provinces for being debarred from their natural market. On this point, I will read what the late Mr. Howe has said, and Mr. Howe, I think, is an authority whom no one would be likely to question. Mr. Howe, according to a report in the Halifax Chronicle, said:

Our neighbors may have their faults and their misfortunes, but there they are 34,000,000 of them divided from us by the Bay of Fundy as by a street—they on the one side and we on the other. Where will be our market for coal for ever? In the United States. Where will be the market for our grindstones? In the United States. Where will be our market for plaster, and fish, and our potatoes? In the United States. Here are five great staples, and there is our market."

That ought to be accepted as good authority. He goes on to state:

"The man with a shallop of coal goes to the United States; he wants a freight to return with, and you say to him: 'You shall bring back flour from the United States, but you must turn your shallop up the St. Lawrence and make a twenty-five or thirty days voyage to Quebec.'"

Hon. members also differ, as did the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Porter), with regard to what the result of the policy embodied in this resolution would be. The hon. member for Perth intimates that we would likely become hewers of wood and drawers of water, while the hon. member for Huron claims that we produced in Canada as fine a type of men as exist on the face of the earth. There is a contradiction somewhere. I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Huron that Canada does produce the highest type of man to be found in the world, just as I believe it is not the country which presents the greatest facilities for man's livelihood that develops the highest type. The highest type, on the contrary, is found in those countries where pluck, energy and skill are required to overcome adverse influences and consecrate nature to men's own use. If Canada produces a superior type of man, how is it that Canadians will not be able to compete with their American neighbors when they will have just as cheap labor and all the raw material at hand? It seems to me somewhat strange that while hon. gentlemen opposite are willing, if we can judge by their past utterances, to let the farmer seek his market where he will, they will not allow him to buy where he will, but insist on giving control of the whole market of this country to the manufacturers. That the interests of the farmers, the lumbermen and the fishermen should be sacrificed to protect the interests of the manufacturers does not appear on its face to be just. With regard to our manufactures, our exports have within the last few years been on the decrease, instead of the increase. A great deal has been said about this cry of disloyalty. It does seem to me that in this case, that cry is quite uncalled for; and I would not insult the constituents of hon. gentlemen opposite by insinuating that they are disloyal when there is no cause for disloyalty. When this question is being discussed, I have always in my mind what the historian Hallam says. I hope it does not apply in this case. He says: "Patriotism and loyalty are too frequently the pretense of the hypocrite, and the plea of the designing politician." The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) gave us quite a lecture on this question, but I think if he were reminded of the past, he might take a little of the lecture for himself. He did not know how to manifest his loyalty sufficiently, but the hon. gentleman occupies here a unique position; and if we are to judge from the past, all he need do would be to visit his returning officer and with equal justice, that functionary might appoint the hon. gentleman to any position he chose and thus give him an opportunity to sacrifice his life or the British Empire. Let us turn back to 1869, and we will find some interesting reading. In the speech of the late Hon. George Brown, that hon. gentleman when speaking about the demand made in 1869 to negotiate a treaty on a basis somewhat similar to that laid down in the resolution before us, said:

"More than one effort was made by the late Government (Macdonald-Cartier) for the renewal of the old treaty between 1866 and 1869. In 1869 formal negotiations were entered into with the American Government and the projet of a treaty was presented for discussion. The negotiations continued from July, 1869, to March, 1870. The projet included the cession for a term of years of our fisheries to the United States; the enlargement and enjoyment of our canals; the free enjoyment of the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, the assimilation of our customs and excise duties; the concession of an import duty equal to the internal revenue taxes of the United States; and the free admission into either country of certain manufactures of the other."

To make this stronger I will read the comments of the Times on Mr. Dorion's speech. The Times said:

"A single circumstance may show to what extent the freedom of action of our colonies may go. It is at this very moment a matter of discussion in Canada whether a treaty of reciprocity should not be concluded with the United States; and the result of the deliberations may very possibly be the admission of the manufactures of New England into the Dominion under lighter duties than the manufactures of Great Britain. If the Canadian Ministry come to the conclusion that such an arrangement is for the benefit of their country, will the Colonial Office advise the Crown to disallow the negotiations? Assuredly not."

With regard to this discrimination against England, I took some trouble to ascertain what was the effect of the old reciprocity treaty of 1864 on the trade of England. From 1844 to 1850, our aggregate trade with England was $160,000,000, or an average of $14,500,000 a year. From 1854 to 1866, $332,000,000, or an average of $25,500,000 a year. This is an increase of about 80 per cent. I think that will be a full answer to the question of discrimination. Instead of decreasing our trade with the United Kingdom, I am confident that this would have a tendency to increase our trade with Great Britain, as it would induce such an era of prosperity in this country as would enable us to purchase more than we do now. Further, I believe it will also have the effect of consolidating the various Provinces, and creating a feeling of satisfaction which I think no man will doubt is required at the present time. I think any person, looking at the situation calmly, will find that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with Confederation itself, and I think it is a duty on the part of all those who have at heart the interests and the stability of Confederation to support this resolution, if it is going to have the effect, as we believe, of consolidating and cementing together the various Provinces of this Dominion. There can be no doubt that it would have that effect, that it would give greater satisfaction to the Maritime Provinces, that it would afford a more convenient market to the people of the North-West, and that it would also largely add to the prosperity of the farmer and the manufacturer in the Province of Ontario. We believe that such an era of prosperity would set in if this were carried out that it would have the effect not only of doubling our trade with the United States but also that with England. It certainly would have that effect if we are to judge from the past. It is time that this question should be faced and should be looked at from a serious standpoint. We aspire at some future time to become a nation, and there is no doubt that we have a good foundation on which to build a great nation if we now pursue a proper course, and I believe this is the first step to consolidate the Provinces together.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox.) I have been somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pressing this debate after the observations which were made by Sir Charles Tupper. Has the hon. gentleman got any more information from the United States Government leading him to believe that this is a more opportune time to present this matter to that Government than the time when it was presented at Washington? Does not the hon. gentleman know that the great political parties in the United States are now engaged in getting ready for the presidential election, and that the party in power is not likely to do anything to lessen its chances of success at the poll? The hon. gentleman will remember the efforts which were made by the Government of which he was a member, I refer to the Government of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, when they sent the Hon. George Brown to Washington and made a desperate effort to get a reciprocity treaty passed. They were accused on that occasion of offering more than they were justified in offering, but, notwithstanding the liberal offers which they made to the people of the United States, the United States refused to make such a treaty. Is this agitation in the interests of the country, or is it because hon. gentlemen opposite have failed in their prophecies in relation to the Fishery Treaty and are now seeking to raise a cry in order to injure the Government and to embarrass the Government, and in that way, as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said, get a platform with which to go to the people? The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) drew a very doleful picture of the position of the farmers of this country. He seemed to think that, if we could get commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, it would be a boon for all our ills; our land would go up in value, we would have general prosperity, and we would be altogether much better off. I would like to compare our exports in breadstuffs from 1875 to 1879 with those from 1880 to 1884. We exported of breadstuffs from 1875 to 1879, $31,954,797; but we imported to the value of $61,362,580, or we exported over our imports in those five years, $20,592,217, or a yearly average of $4,118,443. Our exports of breadstuffs from 1880 to 1884, under the National Policy period, were $90,201,639, and our imports $16,623,986, or the total exports over imports amounted to $73,577,653, or a yearly average of $14,715,530, as compared with a yearly average under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite of $4,118,443, or about three and a-half times as much. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that this must have been of some benefit to the farmers of the country, that, if the people of this country raised so much more produce, they must have had more money, and times must of necessity have been better. Now, the hon. gentlemen suppose that they have made a strong case showing the depression of the farmers of this country. I would like to give them a quotation from an hon. gentleman who stands high in the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, who was at one time a member of the Mowat Administration, and who was before that a member of this House. I think he has taken a great deal of pains to get the necessary information on which he bases the statement which I will read, which is a short extract from one of the five letters written by the Hon. James Young to the Globe in 1887. He says :

"How absurd it is, not to say unpatriotic, to speak of Canadians, especially our farmers, as being poverty stricken and suffering serious disadvantages as compared with our American neighbors. Let them go into the country districts of the various States; let them compare northern Maine and New Hampshire with our Maritime Provinces, or Michigan, Ohio, or any other State, with Ontario; let them contrast the territories of the Great North-West, and it will be found that our general prosperity does not compare unfavorably with theirs. So far as Ontario is concerned, I know no part of the United States in which the masses of the people are healthier, wealthier, or happier."

That is a statement made by a leading member of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also took great exception to the home market. He wanted to know where our home market was. He had a great deal to say about the tall chimneys which had been promised to us under the National Policy. I have another short extract here from the same hon. gentleman whom I have quoted before, and I think it ought to be good authority to hon. gentlemen opposite. In speaking of the markets in which we dispose of our farm produce, he classifies them as three markets—the American, the British, and the home market; and he says :

"It is the very marrow of the question to determine the relative value of these three markets to our farmers, and we are fortunately now in possession of some reliable data which may guide us in doing so. The able head of the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, Mr. Archibald Blue, in a carefully prepared statement now in my possession, makes the value of everything produced on Ontario farms in 1886 to have been close upon $160,000,000. Adding $140,000,000 for all the other Provinces, which must be a moderate estimate, we reach a total production for the Dominion of $300,000,000. Assuming that one-half of these products were consumed by the farming community themselves. These various statistics will, I trust, furnish our farmers some reliable data upon which to estimate the relative value of their three chief markets. The surplus farm production of the Dominion (only one-half the total amount) for 1886, as we saw above, was about $150,000,000, and of this our own market absorbed (to use round numbers), $110,000,000, or 73 per cent.; Great Britain, $22,500,000, or 15 per cent.; and the United States $15,500,000, or 10 per cent. It is quite evident from these facts that it must be absurd to represent our farmers as dependent on a market which for twenty years has only taken 10 per cent. of their surplus and only 5 per cent. of their total annual production."

Now, if the hon. gentleman will just consider this a little, I think he will find where the home market is. I think a home market that consumes 73 per cent. of our surplus products is a very good home market. England takes 15 per cent. of our surplus, while the United States takes only 10 per cent., so that we have not much to gain from commercial union. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down said that if we got unrestricted reciprocity with the United States it would be a great boon to the farmers of his district, and that it would bring back to this country many of the Canadian people who have gone to the United States. But he failed to tell us how we could bring them back. If he would only tell us that, it would be a good thing for this country, and we might make the effort. But the hon. gentleman forgets that if we have a market of 60,000,000 people to deal with, the moment we have unrestricted reciprocity with them, we shall have 60,000,000 competitors in our own market, and a people who export $500,000,000 worth of farm products annually are not likely to want much of our farm products. The hon. member for North Norfolk in a very ably and carefully prepared speech, tried to make out that the farmers of this country pay the duty on all they export, and he was not satisfied with that, but he said they also pay duty on what they import. It is a new doctrine to me that we pay the duties both ways, and it may be true, but I do not believe it. On that subject I would like to give another short quotation from the Hon. Mr. Young, to show what the view of the Reform party has been in the past :

"Equally fallacious is it to assume that the Canadian farmer pays all the duties on the horses, cattle, barley, &c., which are exported across the lines. For forty years the Liberal party has been taught differently, and the demonstrations of Adam Smith, confirmed by all great living political economists, as well as by practical experience, clearly prove the contrary."

That has been the doctrine of the Reform party in the past, and I believe it is the common sense view of all parties of the present time, that although there may be exceptions, as a rule the consumer pays the duty. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said in his speech that we raise a particular kind of barley, and that the Americans must have that barley, and still he insisted that the Canadian farmer, in order to get it into the American market, must pay the duty. That seems to be a very strange kind of logic, and, if it is correct, I think it was very kind of the American Government, in 1883, to take 5 cents a bushel of duty off, just to benefit the Canadian farmer. With reference to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 in natural products, which has been so much talked about, some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have said that there were casual advantages which made times better for Canada than they would otherwise have been during the existence of that Treaty. The hon. member for East Huron said the Grand Trunk had been commenced five years before the Reciprocity Treaty went into effect. I do not wish to dispute that, because preliminary surveys may have been made, and some work may have been done; but one thing we do know, the Grand Trunk Railway was not opened for traffic until 1856, and consequently between 1854 and 1856 there must have been a large amount of money spent in this country in building that railroad, which must have added materially to the prosperity of the people. The hon. gentleman also said that the Russian war was nearly over before the treaty of 1854 came into effect. We all know that the Russian war commenced in 1854 and the treaty of peace was not signed until 1856; and no matter whether the war was nearly over or not, I do not think any member of this House will venture to say that wheat went up to $3 a bushel in consequence of the reciprocity treaty, but I think every hon. gentleman knows that the Russian war was the cause of that rise. The hon. gentleman also said the American war from 1861 to 1865 was of no advantage to us, as it cut off 10,000,000 Southerners from dealing with us. I think that war was a very great advantage to us, because it drew more than 2,000,000 of the American people from industrial pursuits for fighting purposes; consequently these men were not able to provide their own necessities, and were at the same time kept from competition with us in our market. I have taken the trouble to look up some statistics on this subject, and I find that our total exports to the United States from 1855 to 1859, before the war, amounted to $78,000,000, or a yearly average of $15,610,000, while our exports to the United States from 1861 to 1865, after the war, amounted to $93,866,600, or a yearly average for the five years of $18,773,000. It does seem to me that these figures show that that war was of some advantage to the people of this country. The yearly average surplus exported to the United States during the war period exceeded that exported before the war by over $3,000,000. It seems to me that was quite an advantage. There is just one other matter with respect to this treaty of 1854; it is part of the statement made by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and I agree with him. He said :

"Hon. members on this side of the House are willing to accept the same kind of treaty as the one of 1854."

I am willing to accept that kind of treaty too, and I believe hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are willing to accept such a treaty; but they are not willing to go the length to which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be willing to go, that is so far as unrestricted reciprocity in order to secure trade with the United States. As a reason why we are not prepared to do that, I am in a position to prove out of the mouth of the same gentleman to whom I have referred, that we have been more prosperous since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty even than we were during that time. If that can be shown to be the case we ought to be able to dictate to the United States, or at least we ought to be prepared to say that we are prepared to accept a treaty on fair terms, and except on a fair terms we are not prepared to accept any treaty. The gentleman to whom I refer is Hon. James Young, a gentleman belonging to the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite. He says:

"There exists almost universally throughout Canada not only the most friendly feelings towards the United States, but an ardent desire for freer commercial relations between the two countries. Not that we cannot prosper otherwise. On the contrary, notwithstanding some grievous misgovernment, Canada never developed or prospered more than during the twenty years since the reciprocity treaty expired."

It seems to me that it is a very good reason why we should be prepared to accept a reasonable and fair reciprocity treaty, and not be willing to give the Americans any advantage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would that not be a reason for having no treaty at all?

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I would simply say, in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell, that we can do without a treaty. I think we can do better with one, and I am prepared to go any reasonable length to secure it, but I am not willing to go the length of annexation.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is?

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I do not like to be personal, for to be personal is to be unparliamentary, and I would not like to be unparliamentary. We will, however, soon find out what unrestricted reciprocity means. It is pretty hard to tell what it does mean, if it does not mean annexation.

An hon. MEMBER. Why did it not mean that before?

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). We never had unrestricted reciprocity before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was proffered by Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. BOWELL. No, never.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Unrestricted reciprocity with the United States means free trade with the United States and the same kind of tariff against the rest of the world as the United States has in force. I think that is unrestricted reciprocity; I may be wrong, and if so, hon. gentlemen who follow me will put me right. I should like to give another quotation from the same gentleman to whom I have referred, because I rather like his views, and I think he is a sensible man and a good Reformer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. All Reformers are that.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Yes, all Reformers are, but they do not always show themselves to be so. That gentleman says:

"It may be presented in the pleasing guise of 'complete reciprocity,' but every intelligent person must see that what is proposed is simply a Zollverein, which is not only irreconcilable with our continued connection with Great Britain, but a sort of half way house on the road to annexation. Political union has followed commercial union in Germany, and he must be very blind who thinks it would be different on this Continent."

That is a statement made by Hon. James Young, who is a man that I think hon. gentlemen opposite will say is worthy of credence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That statement is an historical mistake.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). It may be, we do not know. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) may know, for he is said to be a philosopher. I have a statement here, taken from a newspaper, made by ex-city Attorney J. N. Cross, of Minneapolis. He says:

"The time has come to be generous to Canada, and to at once form with her a Commercial Union, a 'Zollverein' for tariffs, a perfect union for trade, traffic and commerce in their every aspect, to be followed by a political union."

I think if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to investigate as to the men who are in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity on the other side of the line, they will find they are only in favor of it as they hope it will be a stepping stone to annexation. I desire to give the House an illustration of the effect which unrestricted reciprocity would have in this country in regard to direct taxation. Our revenue, as a matter of course, is raised now from customs duties. We raised last year $22,500,000, $7,300,000 of which was on goods imported from the United States. We imported a little over 40 per cent. of our total imports from the United States last year, and although I have talked with many people, some favoring unrestricted reciprocity and others opposing it, I never met a man who said our imports from the United States under the system proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite would be less than 75 per cent. of the whole importation. My own impression is that it would be more, that if we had free trade with the United States, we would buy in that market everything we could, and only go outside that country for such articles as we could not procure there. In that way we would lose from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000, which sum would have to be made up by direct taxation. I desire to give the House an illustration of how this proposition, if carried out would affect the counties of Lennox and Addington, because hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be anxious to benefit the farmers, and they never tire of talking about the wrongs of the farmers under the present Administration. The assessment of the county is $8,166,000. Of that amount only $438,000 is for personal property and taxable income, while $7,728,000 odd is for real property. Hon. members, especially those who have had anything to do with municipal matters, can easily understand how this happens. The assessor can see the real estate and the improvements, and consequently he cannot be deceived to any great degree as to the value. If he is not satisfied, he can make enquiries of the neighbors and find the value, whereas when he comes to assess personal property or taxable income the people are interested in not telling him the whole truth, and people hold the opinion that there is not much harm in doing it. In my county we have one town of nearly 4,000 inhabitants, from fifteen to twenty villages with from 50 to 500 inhabitants, and in all those places there is a good deal of personal property; but my impression is, that three-fourths of the personal property in the county is not taxed, and the result of that for municipal purposes real property pays more than seventeen times as much as personal property and taxable income. If we have to raise direct taxation in order to conduct the affairs of the country the same thing will happen. There is another serious aspect to this question which I think hon. gentlemen have forgotten. They are never tired talking about the wickedness of the revising barrister and his clerks, and the hon. gentlemen must know that if we have to resort to direct taxation that we will have to get in all probability valuers for every municipality, but certainly we will have to get tax collectors. Those people going around those different municipalities will have an opportunity of doing political work and that sort of thing, and I am afraid that if hon. gentlemen succeed in getting this resolution through and a treaty made with the United States they will be kept out of power for the next twenty years, not alone the next five years, which would be very bad.

Mr. BOWELL. Bad for them?

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Yes, bad for them.

Mr. BOWELL. Good for the country.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Yes, as my hon. friend says, it would be good for the country. There were some sweeping assertions made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In his speech to this House, which was very carefully prepared, he said that all public works should be stopped, as well as all subsidies to railways. He would reduce the grant to the militia by a million dollars, or, in other words, wipe it out altogether; he would stop superannuations, reduce the civil service 65 per cent., reduce the House of Commons one-half and virtually wipe out the Senate. I would like to know if the party which the hon. gentleman follows ever comes into power, will he say to them: "I will not give that party my support unless they make these reforms," or is it that he wants annexation pure and simple. Gentlemen, I do not know which view of the matter he takes. I suppose it makes very little difference to me personally, but I am satisfied that Canada wants to maintain her independence. I am satisfied the Government of this country is doing the best thing for the country.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Hon. gentlemen opposite may differ, but I say "yes." Notwithstanding the wail of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the laudations of the United States by the hon. member for North Norfolk (M. Charlton) and his supporters I have faith in the future of Canada, and I am willing to support the Government lead on by the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, who has brought this country to be a great Dominion from being a few scattered Provinces.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 4, 1888.

No. 27.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 4th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

STANSTEAD ELECTION TRIAL.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Brooks the certificate of judgment in the matter of the election petition for the Electoral District of Stanstead, by which the said petition was dismissed.

REPORTS ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That, as the time for the reception of reports of Committees on Private Bills will expire to-morrow, the same be extended until Friday, the 27th instant, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, in their fifth report.

Mr. LAURIER. Is not that a very unusually long period to extend the time to? If I understood aright, it was up to the 27th instant that the hon. gentleman proposed to extend the time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it is not an unusual thing. On the contrary, we have to do it from time to time on account of the work of the committees. I think our committee, which has, I suppose, three-fourths of the Bills presented to the House this year, cannot sit oftener than we are sitting. We sit twice, and sometimes three times a week, and we will require all this time to pass the Bills which have been presented.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What time do you propose to get through?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As soon as you let us get through.

FORFEITURES FOR TREASON AND FELONY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 88) to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony, and to otherwise amend the law relating thereto. He said: It is proposed by this Bill to adopt the provisions of the law of England in reference to forfeitures for treason and felony; practically to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony, but to provide a means by which the property of persons convicted shall, during their incarceration, be administered, subject to an account to them at the conclusion of their term. Power is also to be given to the court which has jurisdiction to try these offences, to award compensation for the injuries the convict may have inflicted.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—BILL.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 89) to amend chapter eight of the Revised Statutes: An Act respecting the Election of Members to the House of Commons. He said: I will make a few brief explanations as to the purport of the Bill. In the first place, it contains the principal provisions which were embodied in the Bill which was under discussion during last Session of this House, which seemed to meet with a good deal of favor on both sides of the House. In addition it is proposed to adopt the section of the English Act which allows to a member whose agents have, without his knowledge or connivance, committed acts in relation to the offences of treating and undue influence, and which would forfeit his seat—in such circumstances, the member has a right to excuse himself by showing affirmatively to the court the following circumstances: that no corrupt or illegal practice was committed at such election by the candidate or his regular election agent; that the offences mentioned in the Bill were committed contrary to the orders or without the connivance of such candidate or his agent; that such candidate or his agent took all reasonable means to prevent the commission of corrupt or illegal practices; the offences mentioned in the Bill were of a trivial and unimportant character; that in all other respects the election was free from any corrupt or illegal practice on the part of such candidate or his agent; in such case the candidate is not to be subject to the incapacity provided by the Act. It is proposed, likewise, by this Bill, to make uniform the dates for holding elections in British Columbia and in the other electoral districts for which special provisions had been made as to the time for nomination, and the interval between nomination and polling day, in consequence of the difficulties of communication. Then it is proposed that special disqualifications, as in the mother country, shall be established in relation to persons who are convicted upon the indictment of any corrupt practice. It is proposed, in addition to the penalties prescribed by the existing law, that these persons shall be, for seven years from the date of their conviction, incapable of being registered as persons entitled to vote, or of holding any public office within the gift of the Crown or the Parliament of Canada; vacating any such office if they hold any when convicted of such offence; they are made incapable of being elected to this House, or of holding a seat in the House, they must vacate it. There are various other provisions inserted with a view of increasing the safeguards as to secrecy, as to tampering with ballot boxes, providing for greater conveniences for the taking of statements which are required to be taken at the close of the poll, and the authentication of the statements which are usually enclosed in the ballot boxes. The Bill likewise deals with the cases mentioned last Session, of the boxes being lost, and the statements not being forthcoming.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As to the gazetting of members?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no special provision.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice as to whether there is any provision regulating, within certain limits, the issue of the writ to the returning officer, or perhaps I should say more correctly, taking care that a returning officer be appointed within some reasonable period after the writ has been issued by you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no provision on that subject.

Mr. TROW. I would like to ask from the Minister an explanation of the first section of his Bill. He said that the subject had been fully discussed last Session, and favorably received by this House, yet he omitted to explain the nature of the amendments.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The sections which I referred to particularly were those providing that the ballot paper should be sufficiently substantial to prevent marking and puncturing it in such a way as that it would be possible to discern the way in which a person votes, and providing for a hard surface to be furnished by the returning officer or his deputy, in order that the ballot may be marked without showing through on the other side, and various other details of that kind.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUNISHMENTS, PARDONS AND COMMUTATIONS

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 90) to amend chapter 181 of the Revised Statutes, respecting punishments, pardons and commutations of sentences. He said: It is merely to remove a defect in the existing law as applicable to the North-West Territories. There are provisions in the Speedy Trials Act with reference to sentences carrying with them hard labor, and the Speedy Trials Act does not extend to the North-West Territories; this Bill will remedy that defect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FRAUDULENT MARKS ON MERCHANDISE.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) to consolidate and amend the law respecting fraudulent marks on merchandise. He said: This Bill will be found to be an adaptation of the English Fraudulent Marks Act of 1887, and which all Her Majesty's colonies have been asked to adopt. I may explain that the provisions of the existing laws with reference to the fraudulent marking of merchandise were found to be almost entirely inadequate, and in 1883 a convention was held at which the following powers were directly or indirectly represented: Belgium, Brazil, France, Great Britain, Guatemala, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, San Domingo, Servia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Tunis and the United States. These States adopted the provisions which are contained in this Act and in the Imperial Act of 1887. A subsequent convention was held in 1886 in which the provisions of the preceding convention were confirmed, and extending as regards some matters of detail. I will say that the new provisions, in the first place, provide a protection by criminal proceedings in relation to fraudulent marking of merchandise. The protection by criminal process is confined by this Bill to the registered trade marks. The system of registration has been in force for ten or eleven years, and it has been held both in the mother country and, I think, in the colonies that sufficient time has elapsed to enable the registration system to be perfected, and it is, therefore, proper to take criminal action for fraud in relation to registered trade marks. In the second place, the burden of proof has been changed in relation to goods fraudulently marked with fraudulent trade marks. Persons having such goods in their possession are required to prove affirmatively that they came by them in good faith and had no intention of fraud. Then it is provided that all offences against the Trade Marks Act shall be punished by summary conviction, instead of being left to be dealt with by indictment under the old system. It has been found that the practice of resorting to indictment is one of great practical inconvenience to the mercantile community, and that procedure by summary conviction was more appropriate and suitable in dealing with offences of this kind. There is an enlarged provision as to false trade mark descriptions. There are provisions for searching premises in which it is supposed that goods fraudulently taken out are to be found, and a provision likewise for the seizure of goods of that description, and the prevention of their passage through the Customs.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is it the intention of the Government to drop entirely the Bill respecting the Controverted Elections Act?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

THE WRIT FOR RUSSELL.

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to ask the Government whether they can inform the House to-day if the order of the House for the issue for a new election in the County of Russell has been complied with? We were promised it would be issued immediately.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman repeat the question when the First Minister is in his place?

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask of the Minister of Finance, whom I am glad to see in his place, whether the attention of the Government has been called to a certain Bill recently introduced into Congress, called a Retaliatory Bill, which may have important effects on the commerce of this country, and whether the Government are prepared to take any action with regard to it? Numerous communications have reached me, and I dare say have reached the hon. gentleman, showing there is great uneasiness in many parts of the country as to a possible disturbance of trade; and if the Government have come to any conclusion it is highly in the public interest that it should be announced at the earliest possible moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in regard to the enquiry made by the hon. member that the Government have not had their attention drawn in any especial manner to the Bill which has been introduced and to which he has referred; but I am led to suppose that that Bill was introduced under an impression that the Government of Canada were unwilling to carry out the arrangement which the Government of the United States had expected would follow upon the reduction of duty, and I may say that if that Bill has been inspired by any such impression, I think the action that the Government have taken will entirely remove that impression, and I do not anticipate that any such Bill will be proceeded with or any such action taken by the Congress of the United States. I may be permitted to say, as I was not in the House on a former occasion when this question attracted attention, although I do not wish to refer to a past debate, [that the policy of both sides of this House and of both parties in this country has been steadily directed to obtaining a free interchange of the natural products of the two countries; that from the date of the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty both sides in this House, whether in Government or in Opposition, have always been prepared to do everything that it was possible to do to obtain, if we could not obtain a reciprocity treaty, a reciprocity tariff, and, as far and as fast as we could, to obtain the free interchange of the various natural products of the two countries that were indicated in the Treaty of 1854. I can only say that is the policy of the Government to-day, and that any measure we can take to carry that forward will be taken, and that, as hon. gentlemen are aware, the moment the attention of the Government was called by a communication from Sir Lionel Sackville West, covering a memorandum of the Department of State of the United States, to the fact that certain duties had been removed from articles that were contained in the Act of 1879, especially pointed to as inviting reciprocity, an Order in Council was passed placing those articles on the free list, and the proclamation will be issued in the next Gazette.

Mr. MITCHELL. Score one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That communication was made to Sir Sackville West, and I have no doubt it has been communicated to the Government and to the Committee of Ways and Means and to all of those who were under any impression that we would receive from the policy that, as I say, has not been the property of one party or the other in this country, but which all parties believe should be steadily carried forward.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can only say that I think it is a great pity the hon. gentleman was not in his place a week ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may add my congratulations to those of my hon. friend on my right in regard to this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. You want order, do you? I think I am giving order. I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman will permit me to say that we all have one object in view, and I am gratified to know that the course taken by the Government is one that meets with his approval; and I am satisfied he would not wish to make an observation that would tend to lessen the force of that action in any way. I hope, if the hon. gentleman has risen to compliment me at the expense of my colleagues, he will postpone doing so.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is one object I have in view, and that is, if the Secretary of State desires to call "order" to prevent me from stating what I think it is my duty and right to state, he has made a little mistake in his man. That is what I want to say. I want to compliment the Minister of Finance for the frank and manly manner in which he has acted.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I rise to a question of order. This is not in order.

Mr. GILLMOR. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have already moved the adjournment.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman is not in order so long as the motion has not been put.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have moved the adjournment, and I have a right to speak on this matter. I am not going to be put down by the Secretary of State nor by anyone else when I am in the right. I rose for the purpose of paying a proper compliment to the Government, that when they found they made a mistake they took back water at once. I will simply say that I entirely approve of the remarks the hon. the Finance Minister has made, and I believe that no remarks should be made, nor no utterances given expression to by this House that would in any way detract from the frank manner in which the hon. gentleman has stated the policy of the Administration. But I wish to say this, that the attempt to snub me the other day by the Premier, and the statement he made, shows that the policy of the Government on Wednesday last was entirely different from what it is to-day. I simply wish to vindicate myself from the impertinent and insolent remarks that were applied to me on Wednesday.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I think, Sir, that the House and the country has reason to congratulate the Government on the presence of the Finance Minister here to-day. The views expressed by the Finance Minister are very different from the views expressed by his leader in this House not very long ago. Sir, there has been a change in the views and opinions of the Government and there has been a change which the country will receive with pleasure. Not very long ago when it was proposed to put certain articles on the dutiable list that had been on the free list and that were on the free list of the United States, we remember that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—perhaps not all the hon. gentlemen who are there, because it was not formally before Parliament—that the colleagues of the Finance Minister on that occasion adopted views and expressed sentiments altogether different from what the hon. gentleman has expressed here to-day. The hon. gentleman has stated to the House, that on both sides of the House we are one upon this question, and that we are in favor of a free interchange of the natural products of Canada and the United States. Sir, I am glad to find out that the Government are now of that view. It is true that many years ago they did express sentiments of that sort, but a very considerable period has elapsed since we have heard those sentiments expressed by hon. gentlemen sitting on the front benches of the Treasury. The hon. the Minister of Customs shakes his head, but has the hon. gentleman forgotten the altercation which took place on this subject between himself and the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), who supports the Administration? Does the hon. gentleman forget the discussion which took place about fruit trees and grape vines and with reference to the other matters which were put upon the dutiable list and the duties upon which were from time to time increased? Sir, the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are like Captain Scott's coon, they have come down. The hon. the Finance Minister has taken great pains to explain to the House that they do not know what is going on in Congress, but the hon. gentleman, I suppose, will bring down to the House the communication received from Sir Lionel West. We will find out from that, and be able to judge, whether the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have recently done as the organ of the Minister of the Interior says they have done, namely, that they have passed an Order in Council putting upon the free list articles which the First Minister but a short time ago declared would be ruinous to Canada to put on the free list. Then, Sir, that hon. gentleman said that we had scores of articles on the free list already that the United States had not put on their free list, and that he was not going to put upon the free list articles which would promote the interests of the United States and which would enable the people of the United States to crush the interests of the people of Canada. Well, Sir, the hon. gentlemen have had new light, and I have no doubt whatever that that light has shone in the Congress of the United States. Sir, we find in the Montreal organ of the hon. gentleman the following communication :—

"Since the discussion in the House last Wednesday relative to Canada placing on the free list certain natural products specified in clause nine of the Tariff Act, the equivalents of which have been placed by Congress on the American free list, the attention of the Government has been officially called to the matter by the Washington authorities through Sir Lionel West."

Remark, gentlemen, "By the Washington authorities through Sir Lionel West." Now, Sir, I have no doubt that the production of that communication from the English ambassador at Washington would prove to be an excellent commentary on the speech of the Finance Minister here to-day; it would greatly add to the clearness of that speech and would enable us to understand how it was that this Government that has allowed those articles to be on the dutiable list since 1854, have had new light since the discussion which took place here on Wednesday last, and have discovered that it was for the interest of the people of this country that those articles should now be transferred from the dutiable to the free list. Sir, we are making progress. We supposed that the Government here was as fixed as Atlas with the world upon his shoulders and almost as free from anything like a correct idea upon the subject of the trade and commerce of the people of this country. Sir, I think that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has done an excellent service to the people of this country in bringing this matter to the attention of Parliament. He has forced the gentlemen upon the Treasury benches from that position which they have so long occupied, and when they intrenched themselves behind an Act of Parliament which they had no intention of putting into force, which they declared they would not put into force, which they declared it was not for the interest of the people of this country that they should put in force, and which the hon. the First Minister not long ago informed Parliament that the people of this country would sustain them in refusing to put it into force. Those gentlemen have had new light. They have an Order in Council carried on the subject. The hon. the First Minister not long ago told us—what? Why, he told us that if we would allow him to determine the fiscal policy of this country that within two years he would force the Americans from their exclusive position and secure to the people of this country free trade. Well, Sir, we find out how this enforcement has gone on. We find that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have been forced from their position. It has not been Congress which has been driven from its exclusive position by the Government of Canada, but it has been the Government of Canada that is driven from its exclusive position by the action of Congress. The British Minister told the hon. gentleman what the consequences would be if they persisted in the particular policy they had adopted, and which the First Minister declared the Government was prepared to stand by. But we find, Sir, that they have paid deference to the opinions expressed in Congress which they have refused to pay to the opinions of the people of this country. Sir, we congratulate the hon. gentlemen on the respect they have shown for the public opinion of the United States.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I understood the other day that I would be permitted to allude to this matter when the subject came up for discussion. The First Minister took the position that we were not compelled at all to add to our free list such articles as the United States might choose to pick out from the number that was mentioned in what is termed our statutory offer to the United States. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what articles they have placed upon the free list by this proposal, and whether it includes all the articles that are mentioned in that clause of the statute which is generally spoken of as our statutory offer to the United States, or whether we have just placed on the free list such articles selected from among those as the United States have placed upon their free list?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say in reply to the hon. gentleman that it was never proposed by us that we would place any of those articles upon the free list or reduce the duties imposed upon them by our law, except with similar action on the part of Congress. It was only as the duties on these articles were reduced or abolished, and satisfactory evidence that such changes had been made was given to the Governor in Council, that it was proposed that we should take corresponding action. I am very sorry to find that the hon. member for Bothwell does not seem disposed to adopt the course that I believe would commend itself to the great majority of the gentlemen on that side of the House, and that is, not to use language here, in dealing with this question, for a miserable, unworthy party object, calculated to prejudice the interests of the very people he proposes to serve. I say, Sir, if these gentlemen were sincere in desiring that Canadians should have the benefit of this reciprocal free interchange of commodities, they would not take the line the hon. member for Bothwell has taken just now. They would adopt the line I have taken, not in claiming credit to the Government or the party to which I belong, but declaring, as I do declare in my place in this House, that no person can read the past history of this country in relation to this question without finding that it has been the avowed policy of both the great parties in this country to obtain as far and as fast as they could, the free interchange of the natural products of the two countries. In 1854 a treaty was made which met with the approval of both parties, and when it was abrogated both parties in this country united in every effort they could possibly use to prevent that abrogation going into effect. Subsequently, at the negotiation of the Treaty of Washington, Sir John Macdonald, the leader of the Conservative party in this country, pressed on the Government of the United States, and induced the British high commissioners associated with him to press on the Government of the United States, the desirability of returning to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, under which the natural products of the two countries were freely interchanged. That proposition was rejected. Subsequently, the Hon. George Brown, representing hon. gentlemen opposite, who then held the Government of this country, went down to Washington and represented it as the desire of the Government of the day, and of the Liberal party in this country, that there should be a return to the principles of reciprocity established by the Treaty of 1854. That offer was refused by the Government of the United States. I say, therefore, that the credit does not belong to one party or the other, but it belongs to both the great parties in this country, of having steadily endeavored as far as possible, to obtain a free interchange of the natural products of the two countries. Subsequently, when Sir Leonard Tilley, my distinguished predecessor, brought down the policy of the Government in 1879, he placed on the Statute-book an Act which invited reciprocal action on the part of the United States, and took power for the Governor in Council to make free either any or all of the articles that were named. It was discretionary power, as has been stated, and discretionary for the reason that when you are dealing with the action of the Crown you must necessarily use a language that is discretionary. But it was, in my humble judgment, none the less an invitation to the Congress and Government of the United States to make these articles free, and a holding out of an expectation that this Government would take similar action in such an event. Now, this question is not quite so plain as it would appear to be, and I am very sorry that in the discussion which took place here a few days ago the House did not rest on the statement made by the hon. First Minister, as I understand it to have been made, that this subject was engaging the attention of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, no, that is not the statement he made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say he would have been warranted in making that statement, for it was engaging the attention of the Government before a question was raised in this House. I may say that no member of this Government is so much to blame in this matter as I am, and I will explain to the House why. I confess I had overlooked the action that had been taken by Congress; it is fair and right that I should say so. My colleagues had a perfect right to expect that in a question of this kind, which appertained to my department, I would bring to their notice any required action to be taken. But there are difficulties in this matter which hon. gentlemen do not seem to appreciate. I will give an illustration. In this application from the Government of the United States, through Sir Lionel Sackville West, reference was made to the admission of seeds free of duty by the United States. Now, the clause in our Act does not pledge us to make free whatever seeds they choose to make free; it specifies "seeds of all kinds." The broadest interpretation you can give to that Act will not make it cover a partial action in regard to any one of the articles named. We say that when they make seeds of all kinds free, the Governor in Council has power to make them free here. But the United States Congress have not made seeds of all kinds free, and therefore, it would have been perfectly competent for us to say to them: "Until you make seeds of all kinds free, there is no moral obligation upon us to admit any of that class free." But we have not stood on that technicality, and it should be remembered that the nomenclature used by Congress differs in a wide degree from that used by us. We have included in the Order in Council all the seeds which have been made free by the tariff of the United States, and they will be free hereafter; so that we have not only complied with the Act of 1879, but have even gone further in the desire to remove the possibility of any ill-feeling or any prejudicial action to Canada being taken through any misrepresentation or prejudice that could be excited on this question. Then, barley is one of the articles with regard to which we have taken power, whenever the United States removes or reduces the duty, to take corresponding action. But a very nice question arose in regard to barley. True, the United States Congress reduced the duty from 15 cents to 10 cents per bushel, but at the same time they greatly increased the duty on malt, thus acting in the interests of the United States, not simply by the reduction of the duty, but by taking a line that was inimical to the interests of the people interested in barley on this side. I mention these matters to show that in this matter there is not quite as plain sailing as hon. gentlemen seem to think. But I may say that the moment the Mills' Bill was introduced into the Congress of the United States, long before the discussion arose in this House, I had the Deputy Minister and the staff of the office engaged in making a comprehensive statement in reference to this question, in order that I might bring it to the notice of my colleagues, as I was bound to do, because I found that by an oversight on my part, caused no doubt by the various duties imposed upon me, the action of the United States Congress had been lost sight of.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a pity you did not coach the Premier.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must know that the Premier had a right to expect that the Finance Minister would bring the subject under his notice. As I say, I am sorry, desiring as we all do to place the relations between the United States and this country on the most friendly footing, desiring as we all do to have the freest interchange of natural products between the two countries, that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did not take the course that the rest of his friends on that side did, of not raising the question; and I think the course he took was unworthy of the hon. gentleman, in view of the great interests that are at stake.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking in a qualified sense and not in any personal manner. I think it was unworthy of the high position which the hon. member for Bothwell occupies in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The insinuation is unworthy of you.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was unworthy of the hon. gentleman's position in this House and of his former position as a member of a former Administration, to adopt a tone or take a means calculated in any way to weaken the action the Government have taken. I will say, in answer to my hon. friend who asked me the question, that we have reciprocated with the United States in the articles they have dealt with, and I have in my hand a message which I sent to Sir Lionel Sackville West for communication to the Government of the United States, which I intend to read to the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wish just to know what are the articles that will be placed on our free list.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We shall place on our free list every article to which our attention has been drawn by the Government of the United States as having been made free by them, and which is mentioned in our statute.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How is the barley dealt with?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statement made by the First Minister was quite correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You had better, perhaps, hear what I have to say before you take exception to it. The statement of the First Minister, which was quite correct, was that the subject was receiving the consideration of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; he did not say that at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He stated that the subject was receiving the consideration of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. He subsequently stated that, but that was not his first statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The right hon. the First Minister said:

"However, that subject, having been brought forward in the interest of the American seedsmen, is now engaging the attention of the Government."

Mr. MITCHELL. Read what he said before that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to go back to a discussion which I regret should have taken place, but I desire to say that what we have done was to make everything free that the Government of United States have called our attention to as having received the action of Congress, under that clause and our relation to that clause in the enactment, and we have stated that we are prepared to go further.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How did you deal with the barley?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That remains untouched for the reason I have given—that and straw, which is another article that has been made free by the United States. Barley has only been reduced in duty, and that reduction is accompanied by an increase in the duty on malt against the interests of the maltsters of Canada. An additional reason is this. A Bill is now before Congress of which I shall have occasion to say more hereafter. That Bill has been introduced there by the gentleman who virtually represents the Finance Minister here, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who is the mouthpiece of the American Administration. He has introduced a Bill in which Canada is greatly interested, making a number of articles free which it is very important to us should be made free, and we think it better to defer taking additional action until we see the result of that measure. I may say that I believe, notwithstanding the action of the present opposition in the United States, that the measure dealing with the tariff will, in a modified form, at all events, become law; and if so I shall take the opportunity of inviting the attention of the House to measures which, I think, will be calculated to go further in the way of freeing the natural products of both countries and having a larger measure of reciprocity on both sides.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The speech of the hon. Minister of Finance will be received with no small satisfaction by the people, and to a large part of his remarks no exception can be taken, either as regards the tone or the matter. As regards, however, some of the references to my hon. friend from Mr. Mills (Bothwell), it is plain to every hon. gentleman that the hon. the Minister could not have been in his place on Wednesday last, when the conversation on this subject took place, or he would never have made the remarks he has regarding the discussion which was then had. The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that it has been the avowed policy of both parties in this country to move in the direction of reciprocity regarding the natural products of each. Certain action had been taken by the United States with reference to the admission of certain natural products of this country into theirs, and the question arose, on the interpellation by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), as to whether the policy of the Government, as laid down in our statute, would be carried out, or whether they had a secret policy which was opposed to that avowed one. The First Minister replied with a good deal of warmth, and stated that the matter was receiving the consent of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. You cannot discuss a matter which has been already the subject of debate.

Mr. DAVIES. The Finance Minister has just given us his view of that discussion. He has made statements as to what was said before, and only to the extent of answering those statements do I wish to refer to a previous debate. The First Minister said at that time that there had been no official communication in reference to the matter, and the question arose whether the Government of the Dominion, without reference to any communication from the United States, were prepared to carry out in good faith the terms of our statutory offer. A discussion arose to the meaning of the offer, and the First Minister declared it was merely a permissive clause which left the Government very full discretion as to whether they should act or not; and the point which the First Minister omitted to refer to entirely was the point on which my hon. friend for Bothwell made his remarks. The First Minister said that, in the exercise of that discretion, it would be in the highest degree impolitic on the part of the Government to reciprocate in those articles. That was the statement of the First Minister, and as evidence that it was not a mere haphazard statement, we have the fact that the Minister of Justice, who followed him, agreed in the construction put upon the statutory clause, laying stress on the word "may," and wound up by saying there was a large discretion left in the Government, and that if the Government would use that discretion in the way the hon. member for Northumberland said they should, they would use it to obstruct the interests of the people of Canada. We had then the declaration of the policy of the Government, expressed in clear, terse, and undisguised language, that we were not to carry out the statutory offer in the sense in which hon. gentlemen on this side understood its terms. It was argued on this side that you must not place the same strict narrow meaning on a great international offer of this kind as you would on a simple contract between man and man. It would have been in the highest degree advisable, and in the best interests of this country, as is proved by the statement the hon. the Minister of Finance has made to-day, had the Government at once declared their intention of abiding by the spirit of that offer. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that, in view of the change of front upon this very important matter, he desired to know what was the motive of that change, and what was the despatch that the Government had received from the Secretary of State. Let us hear the whole of it. There was not a word said by my hon. friend but what his duty called upon him to say as one of the leading men in this House. Therefore he was quite within his right in demanding what he did, the House having been put in possession of the very important fact that the Government have made a complete change in their policy, a change upon which we congratulate them thoroughly, a change which I think is in the interests of the country. I think that the motive which has induced them to make that change will induce them to go a little further, and I have some hope, in view of the change which they have already made, that they may withdraw the resolution which the Minister of Marine has moved, in which they have, as it were, nailed their colors to the mast, and declared for the National Policy every time and the National Policy only. I am still in hope that they will withdraw that in favor of the motion proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) for a broad, free and generous interchange of commodities.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, for a broad, free and generous interchange not only of natural products but of other articles as well. It will not be contended now that it is treason or disloyalty to admit into this country some of the natural products of the United States, and the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, or some of his very clever supporters, will have to state to the people of this country exactly where they draw the line, and what are the articles in regard to which it becomes treason to admit them reciprocally, and when in regard to what it is not treason. My hon. friend the Finance Minister has eased the way for them a great deal, he has smoothed it down. He says it is the natural policy to remove all the barriers which exist.

Mr. MITCHELL. But he differs from the Premier.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He not only differs from the Premier, but he lays down a line of policy which the Premier declared to be in the highest degree improvident, and which the Minister of Justice said would amount to a betrayal of the interests of the people of Canada. We have heard that sort of language used for the last fortnight in this House, that our policy was a betrayal of the interests of the people of Canada, but that has all been taken back—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me finish my sentence—that has all been taken back so far as the natural products of the country are concerned, and now those gentlemen will have to confine their argument to this, that free trade with the States means treason and disloyalty to the Crown in regard to manufactured articles, and to those alone. I have not lost entire confidence in the Government in this trade question. I believe that the Finance Minister in his heart and soul is with us on this point, and I believe he will yet reorganise the First Minister upon it, and will perhaps give him a little more light. I hope, before this Session breaks up, to hear the announcement made, in a frank, honorable and manly way, by the First Minister that he has misconceived the position and is prepared to accept, if not in whole, at least in a great part, the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It would be a great advantage for Canada, and I think that, if the Finance Minister proceeds in his educating policy a little further, he will succeed in achieving this end.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I find that I have been able to lay my hand upon the despatch which I said I would submit to the House if I had it:

"April 3rd, 1888."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the date? Is it to-day?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, yesterday, April the 3rd.

"To the Hon. Sir LIONEL SACKVILLE WEST:

"Immediately on receipt of copy of your despatch to Lord Salisbury, enclosing memorandum from Department of State of the United States, calling attention to certain articles made free of duty by United States, an Order in Council was passed admitting all the articles mentioned, when imported into Canada, free of duty. Proclamation will issue next Gazette. Canadian Government awaits further legislation by Congress in same direction."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have got one progressive Minister on that side, anyway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am reminded of the very eloquent reference that my hon. friend from one of the North-West constituencies made on another occasion, when he referred to the perilous attention which certain hon. gentlemen paid him.

Mr. MITCHELL. You do not seem displeased with it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may add that it will give me great pleasure to lay the despatch and the papers in connection with it on the Table of the House.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I hope the House will pardon me for a moment, while I refer to the subject under discussion. I listened with a great deal of attention to the discussion on this subject which took place last week. If hon. gentlemen desire to deal fairly with this discussion which has now been resumed, they will find in the first remarks of the First Minister, in answer to the hon. member for Northumberland, the very reply which, condensed, was made by the Finance Minister this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, oh.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Allow me to continue. I have not interrupted hon. gentlemen on the other side, and the fact that they try to interrupt me shows that they do not want to hear what is coming. In answer to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) on that occasion, the First Minister said:

"I do not know that this is exactly the time to answer the question, but I may say that no applications have been made by the American Government upon the subject which the hon. gentleman speaks of."

Did the Minister of Finance this afternoon make any other explanation?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Wait—Did he make any other explanation than the expression of a sincere regret that hon. gentlemen should bring this forward at this time, or did he say anything inconsistent with what seems to be so objectionable to the hon. gentleman opposite in the remarks of the First Minister, which I now propose to read?

Mr. MITCHELL. Read the whole of them.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will read the whole.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I tried to read them, but I was not allowed.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). After many interruptions from the other side of the House, the First Minister declared in effect that it would not be the policy of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I shall read afterwards. He stated that it would not be the policy of this Government or of any Government in this country to respond to the action of the United States who might select some one particular article which would perhaps be injurious to the manufactures of this country, and might ask us to reciprocate on that alone and to be bound by any such partial arrangement as that. I say that by no mode of reasoning which can be placed upon the clause in the Act of 1879 could the Government of this country be bound to place such a construction upon it which has been suggested, and, if the Government in this particular instance have responded to the advance made by the Government of the United States in regard to the natural products of this country, if they have responded to it fairly, generously, and liberally, perhaps more so than that section in the Act of 1879 would warrant, does it follow that we were wrong, or that the First Minister was wrong in his opinion the other day as to the interpretation of the Act? No candid or reasonable man, no man who has a pretension to the possession of fair, sound reason can say otherwise, and all the crowing of the Opposition to-day amounts to nothing, and the position of the Minister of Finance as he has expressed himself to-day is exactly consistent with the position taken by the First Minister the other day.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but an effort has been made to place certain hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in a false position. When the discussion took place here a week ago to-day, the attention of the Government was called by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), to the fact that the United States Government had placed certain articles upon the free list; that the 6th clause of the Customs Act of 1879 provided that any or all the articles named in that list should be placed upon the free list, or the duties upon those articles reduced upon corresponding action being taken by the American Government; that the Government of Canada had failed to respond to the action of the United States Government; that that failure had elicited bad feelings in the United States, and that retaliation was threatened. The hon. gentleman pointed out that this was a matter of very grave importance, and he desired to enquire whether the Government proposed to be governed by the stipulations in that clause of the Customs Act, and he set forth his belief that we were bound by the conditions of that Act to place upon the free list any such articles as the United States Government had placed there. Now, Sir, the First Minister on that occasion distinctly denied that proposition; he distinctly asserted that that provision of the Customs Act was not mandatory but was permissive, and that it rested with the Government in Council to do or not to do this thing, as they pleased. I may read, if permitted to do so, the words in which the First Minister presented that opinion to the House;

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only say that the hon. gentleman has not read the clause, else he would not make that statement. It is permissive altogether, it is not obligatory. The language is explicit: 'Any or all of the following things,' &c.—reciting them—'may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided for by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council.' It is perfectly in the discretion of the Government. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but he did not read the clause, or he would not have made that statement. It is perfectly permissive.

"Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will point it out, although this irregular discussion is really interrupting the business of this House. I say to this House that if the hon. gentleman will look over our free list and the United States free list, he will find that there is an infinitely greater number of articles allowed to come into Canada on the free list of the United States than are allowed on the American free list from Canada.

"Mr. MITCHELL. That has nothing to do with it.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An infinitely greater number. But I will point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that we have got the interests of our own people to look after as well as the interest of the people of the United States. And, Mr. Speaker, if time permits, and a debate comes up, we will be able to show that it would be in the highest degree improvident in us to take some single article which will be specially for the benefit of the United States, and especially injurious to an industry in Canada, and put it on the free list, while they refuse to take any of the others in which there could be anything like reciprocity or interchange between Canada and the United States; I say they take out some articles the manufacture of which they think they can crush in Canada, and keep up their tariff on all other articles, except one particular article, when they think that they have got the advantage. That is not the way which we, as a Canadian Government, think best to carry on the affairs of this country, and I have no doubt that the majority of this House, and the majority of the people of Canada, will think with us."

The Minister of Justice, in speaking to the question, said:

"Does the hon. gentleman mean to contend—because his argument goes that far—that this statutory offer—not only including the clause which has been brought to the notice of the House, because what is called the statutory offer embraces half-a-dozen other offers, and looks to the admission of free fish, coal and various other products into the United States—does the hon. gentleman mean to contend that it is a breach of faith on the part of the Government of Canada, even for that part of the statutory offer, to decline to allow the United States to say: 'You have made that offer; we will take portions of it, and enact those which please us, and which appear favorable to our people, and we will shut the door in the faces of your people in respect to all the other articles'? I can only say that, in my humble judgment, if the Crown, having discretion, uses it in that way, they would use it to betray the interests of the people of Canada."

Well, now, Sir, the Crown has used its discretion in that way. The Crown has taken a different position to-day from what it did a week ago, and has placed upon the free list the whole of the articles which the First Minister distinctly informed us should not be placed upon the free list, one week ago to-day. I do not know that in discussing this question I am doing anything that would prejudice the interests of Canada. It was pointed out by the Opposition, a week ago to-day, that the interests of this country were being threatened by the failure on the part of the Government to comply with the stipulations made by them in the Act of 1879; it was said that if we were not to live up to the letter of that clause, it would be better to expunge it from the Statute-book. Now, it is possible that in this matter we have not taken a step that will redound very much to our advantage, but we have taken a wise step, in my opinion; and if we do not wish to take any more steps of that kind, if we do not wish to act upon the statutory offer, we had better repeal it with all possible haste. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that the country deserves well at the hands of the Opposition for having brought this matter to the attention of the Government, for having pressed this matter home, and in consequence of the action of the Opposition, a grave danger has been averted. I believe that if this matter had been allowed to drift along, the result would have been retaliation on the part of the United States, and retaliation of a character that would most seriously have injured the interests of this country. I hope that the utmost care will be taken in future to carry out any offers that we may make by statute or otherwise. We are dealing with a country that is naturally jealous, dealing with a country that, perhaps, is not very scrupulous as to whether they give up the advantage, or whether they take it themselves. But that country certainly has a right to exact from this Government the fulfilment of its promises. It is an act of folly to put a promise upon the Statute-book without the intention of redeeming that promise.

Mr. BOWELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he is advocating reciprocity in a partial or a whole number of articles that may be offered to us by the United States, if we have upon our Statute-book a law which says we may do so-and-so? Is that what I understand?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Customs may understand me to say that if we place upon our Statute-book an offer such as that of 1879—

Mr. BOWELL. Partial or wholly?

Mr. CHARLTON—although that offer may be permissive, yet it is an offer calculated to mislead our neighbors if it is viewed as a permissive offer; and if they accept that offer as bona fide and mandatory, it is better, as I said before and as I say to-day, to carry out the provisions of that offer, than not to do so, and if we do not do so we had better repeal the clause. I do not dispute that the clause was permissive, yet I do say that in the position of matters it had better be treated as mandatory, or we had better abolish it if we do not intend to live up to it in respect to those articles which the Americans put upon the free list.

Mr. BOWELL. Then we will expect the hon. gentleman to support the Bill before the House brought forward by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), because that makes a special provision in matters of wrecking.

Mr. CHARLTON. We will discuss that question later on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry I was not in the House at the time the debate arose. I was engaged otherwise in public business, and therefore lost the advantage of hearing the statements which have been made. But I gather from what I have heard since I have come in, that hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavoring to make a little capital out of this question. The hon. gentleman who just sat down said that the country owes the Opposition credit for bringing this question up. Well, I am very willing they should have all the credit that can accrue to them in this matter; but it is very odd that it is only just now that they have thought of it. I think that on some of these articles, seeds and fruit, the duties were taken off in 1883, and yet, watchful as the Opposition are, they never thought of bringing it up until the hon. gentleman did so the other day. Well, I did not hear the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, but I am satisfied that he has not stated anything inconsistent with what I state to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, he did.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a rude interruption that, a very rude interruption, a very rude interruption.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, very.

Mr. HESSON. He don't know any better.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asks a question. I do not know that this is exactly the time to answer the question, but I may say that no application has been made by the American Government upon this subject which the hon. gentleman speaks of. That is true. There was no application of any kind, and there had not been any. Not only that, but until the other day no application was made in behalf of any person that I ever heard of, who had paid duties on seeds, trees, or vines, that similar duties were not exacted on the other side of the line. But I went on, and I stated that the subject had been brought before the Government, though not officially, by some seedsmen, and I said:

"However, that subject, having been brought forward in the interests of the American seedsmen, is now engaging the attention of the Government, but there has been no official statement even from the Consul."

That is precisely the fact. There was an unofficial statement made to the Minister of Customs, and thereupon he was called upon to make a report showing exactly the articles included in the clause referred to made free by the American tariff and not made free by the Canadian tariff; and at the very time we were discussing this question my hon. friend was engaged in preparing that statement for Council, for the purpose of considering whether that statement would show the articles admitted free by the United States and dutiable in Canada were those respecting which we might properly exercise the discretion given us by the statute and admit them free. My hon. friend who has just spoken says he supposes the clause is permissive; the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said it was not permissive, but I do not think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will say that the statute is not permissive. I am quite satisfied, if he were a judge, and I hope to live to see him one,—he will make a very good judge and we will have a less formidable opponent in this House—I say if he were called upon to decide the question he would decide that the clause was permissive, and he could not decide any other way as a judge. But the matter was before the Council in the manner that I speak of; it was of sufficient importance to call for a special report from the Customs Department, for the purpose of seeing what articles—they are not very important any of them—were admitted free by the United States and were dutiable in Canada. It so happened that, the day after this discussion, a despatch of the State Department, to which allusion has been made in the debate, was received, calling attention in a very informal and unofficial manner to those articles, seeds and trees. That was the first occasion on which it had come before the Government. So far as regards my remark, which has been quoted, that:

"If time permits and a debate comes up, we will be able to show that it would be in the highest degree improvident in us to take some single article which will be specially for the benefit of the United States, and especially injurious to an industry in Canada, and put it on the free list."

I say that now, and I can give a hypothetical case to prove it. Take this instance, and it is one worthy of the attention of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). Suppose the Americans should ask us to admit oranges free, because that would suit them, and they declined to admit potatoes, I think the hon. member for Queen's would say that was a very unfair bargain, that we ought not to allow American oranges to come in from the Southern States unless the United States allowed Canada to send blue-nose and other potatoes from Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia duty free. That is a case I give just as an instance. I say that the statute is discretionary, that it was meant to be discretionary, and that the Government did no more than carry out the principle of the statute. When the matter was brought before our attention by the United States Government, the Government took it up at once, and I hope that in consequence of the active and energetic exertions made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the great zeal and anxiety shown by hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, we shall have more agricultural products introduced on both sides, duty free, than has previously prevailed.

Mr. IVES. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) congratulated himself rather prematurely, I think, when he assumed to think that by the action of the Government in this matter the House and the country were about to accept the policy enunciated in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It seems to me that although the people as a whole do now, as they have always approved of the interchange of natural productions between the two countries, it does not follow that they are prepared to go the length of sacrificing our interests here, of dropping eighteen or twenty million dollars of revenue, of resorting to direct taxation, subsequently or gradually falling into the arms of the United States by way of annexation or otherwise. It strikes me there is a difference between admitting potatoes and oranges and a few other natural productions of the United States into Canada free of duty, and adopting a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, including, as it does, loss of revenue, direct taxation and annexation to the United States. The hon. gentleman said there were no cries of treason now. The cry of treason does not come in that way. We do not say it is treason to propose to trade with our neighbors; we say, it is treason to frame a policy which must wipe out Canada's nationality and which necessarily leads to annexation. I rose not to speak on the resolution before the House, but simply for the purpose of disclaiming so far as I am personally concerned, and I trust the Government and the House will also disclaim it, that the action of the Government in this matter has been in any way brought about or hastened by the legislation which it is said has been introduced into Congress. I do not think there could be anything more mischievous to Canada than to have the impression go abroad, especially among our neighbors, that all they have to do to bring us to book is to threaten us with the passage of legislation like that said to have been introduced into Congress. Why, only a Session or two ago they adopted the celebrated Retaliatory Bill. That measure was passed through Congress with an object similar to that with which the proposed Retaliatory Bill was now introduced. The retaliatory measure, fortunately, was not put into effect by the President of the United States—he had too much good sense; but we were not frightened by that Bill, although it was of very much more importance and would have proved more serious in its effects, than the Retaliatory Bill of the present Session. Our country, our Government and our people were not struck with alarm by the proposed putting into force of that Retaliatory Bill. I repeat that I make these remarks simply to disclaim for myself the idea that the Government have taken this action because of, or on account of that proposed measure, or that their action has been hastened by it. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has told us—and he ought to know—that our neighbors are unscrupulous. He has made that statement.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think, Sir, it is advantageous to allow that expression to go to the House in the sense that the hon. gentleman has placed upon it,—that is, the statement which he alleges to have been made by me, "that the Americans were unscrupulous." What I said was that perhaps they were not exactly scrupulous in matters where their own interests are concerned. I think the bald statement that I said "they were unscrupulous" would not do justice to the sense in which I used the words.

Mr. IVES. I am quite prepared to accept the correction. I do not think it would be right to deprive the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) of the esteem and friendship of his friends on the other side, which he has earned during the present and past Sessions of this House. I think it would be a pity, indeed, if there would be a feeling of difference between him and his good friends, the gentlemen who represent the people of the United States in the Parliament of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman imputes motives to me and insinuates relations with regard to me that he is not warranted in doing. When I rose to make the remark which I did, it was clearly with the intention that nothing said in this House should be of a character to prejudice the interests of this country. It was in that sense that I used the expression. The gentleman is entirely unwarranted in making such insinuations with regard to me or any other member of this House, and I call for the protection of the Speaker.

Mr. IVES. I made no insinuation of that kind and I wish to say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, chair.

Mr. IVES. I have a right to say what I meant and I claim that no point of order can be taken. I merely said the hon. gentleman was a friend of the United States and was a friend of the men who advanced the interests of the States. That is all I said. If the hon. gentleman wishes to repudiate that, I think it would be useless for him to withdraw the statement he made that they are unscrupulous.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman imputed a desire to me to stand well with them and that I did not wish to do anything that would effect my friendly or business relations with them. I repudiate having relations of the character and manner he refers to. The imputation is an unworthy one and I desire your ruling that it may not be permitted to go on the journals of the House without being retracted.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. IVES. I have not given up the floor yet. A point of order has been raised.

Mr. SPEAKER. I really fail to notice in the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) anything that could be objectionable from a parliamentary point of view. I fail to see that any of those remarks went as far as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) thought they did. I see nothing unparliamentary in the language.

Mr. IVES. I have only to say one thing and that is this, that I am happy that the Government have taken this action. I think the section of the country from which I come will approve of that action. I believe they would be delighted to see the free list in natural products very largely increased, as largely increased, or even more so than is proposed in the Bill now before the Congress of the United States. In view of that measure now before Congress I think it would be extremely prejudicial to our interests if it were to go abroad in the United States that we have been driven into this action by a threat of retaliation from the United States. There are no doubt many people in the United States who are working upon that very idea and who are endeavoring to make the people of the United States as a body believe, that if they can only coerce us or "freeze us out" as they term it, they will accomplish the object they have in view, namely, the annexation of this country. Those men are found to be against Mr. Mills' Bill or any other measure for improved or enlarged trade relations between this country and the United States, and nothing could be more injurious to the prospect of the passage of the Mills Bill than for it to be supposed that our Government was forced into this action by the threat of a retaliatory Bill in Congress.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to protract the discussion with regard to this matter. I think that, with the members of the House who have spoken on this side, I should be permitted to congratulate the Government on the step forward they have taken. I would not have said anything with regard to the matter had it not been for the statement made by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who seems to have embodied in him a very great deal of loyalty. This seems to be the cry that comes from that side of the House on every occasion. They declare that we are a disloyal people, and that this matter may result in annexation. I think it does not come well from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) to talk about any such question as that, and I would just read an extract which I happen to have in my desk. It is a special telegram from Sherbrooke, dated March 12th, and I will read it to show the way in which the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) professes his loyalty to the British Government, and to the institution which he professes to think so much about. This special was sent from Sherbrooke on the 12th of March. It is in reference to a matter in which the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) is very much interested. He is not only interested in the welfare of Canada, but it appears he is interested in the welfare of the States, and particularly interested in the welfare of Texas, and I would just read the extract:

"Sherbrooke, March 12th.—(Special).—The bankrupt Dominion cattle enterprise was before the court here a few days ago. It appeared that Senator Cochrane, President, and Mr. W. B. Ives, M.P., Managing Director of the defunct company, undertook, some two years ago, without proper authority from the directors or shareholders, to give the Eastern Townships Bank a chattle mortgage upon the whole of the assets of the company to secure an overdue indebtedness to the bank. This deception upon the —"

Mr. SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman what has this to do with the present debate.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I want to show the loyalty of the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives).

Mr. IVES. I rise to a point of order. I would like the House to permit the hon. gentleman to continue if they will afterwards allow me a moment to answer. I am aware of that passage in the Free Press, but I could not take any notice of it there. If the hon. gentleman brings it before this House I shall take an opportunity to answer it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to refrain from reading that, because we have no debate on this question. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. As the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) desires to make an explanation it would be a good place for him to explain his position with regard to this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow the rules of the House to be broken even for the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives).

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have no desire to transgress the rules of the House at all—I supposed I was perfectly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, Chair.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish just to say to those gentlemen who profess so much loyalty that when a search is made into their past history it will be discovered they are not quite so loyal as they profess to be. Dr. Johnson says: "That loyalty as professed by some is the last refuge of a scoundrel." I think, Mr. Speaker, that the loyalty manifested by some gentlemen on the other side of the House is somewhat of this species.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist on what he has said, but will withdraw it and apologise to the House for having said it. Characterising the loyalty of a large number of the members of this House in the way he has done, I think, is derogatory to the dignity of the House, and he ought to withdraw what he has said.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I merely referred to what Dr. Johnson has said. The species may be very varied, but I did not say it was positively of that character at all.

Therefore, I do not think I have transgressed the rules of the House in any way whatever. I think it is very much out of place for those gentlemen to throw out the insinuations they have.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must submit to the ruling or else appeal. I decided that the words were unparliamentary and very ungentlemanly and he ought to withdraw them and apologise to the House. If he cannot do that I will have to take another proceeding.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How did I transgress?

Mr. SPEAKER. In what you have just said.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Tell me the words I made use of that were unparliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER. The words were that a certain number of members of this House—"that loyalty was the last refuge of scoundrels."

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member said something to that effect and I understood it so.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That was not what I said in the precise words; but if you and the House understood that I did say so, I am quite willing to withdraw it.

Mr. IVES. I shall not occupy but a moment. Your decision, although I bow to it, is rather unfortunate to me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. IVES. The House allowed him to proceed with the reading of that document, and I can only say there is no truth in it whatever; and if permitted by the House and you to refer to it, I would be very happy to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Apologise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think there is much use in pressing for that. If there is any lesson to be learned from this at all, it is the extreme and excessive folly of gentlemen who live in glass houses casting stones, and in particular the extreme and excessive folly of men whose record for loyalty will not bear investigation for one second, either in their own persons or in the persons of their colleagues, presuming, as many have done from the beginning to the end of the late debate, to cast imputations on the loyalty of better men than themselves. However, I do not propose to go into a discussion as to whether my hon. friend here or the hon. gentleman who spoke last is the more loyal or better citizen of Canada. They can settle that matter between themselves at their leisure, and I have no doubt my hon. friend has nothing to dread from the encounter. What I rose to call attention to is this: In the first place, Sir, I do not know whether you entirely comprehended, if I may be allowed to say so, not being as familiar as we are with the intricacies of the English language, the very dangerous attempt made by the First Minister to seduce from his allegiance to our side our estimable friend from Charlottetown, when he got up and intimated that a chief justiceship was at his disposal. I think you ought to call attention to the danger to the morals of our hon. friend.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is on a par with the accusation that Nova Scotia was going to be bribed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sir, the public records and the public accounts show that I had very excellent ground for anything I said in that respect. However, I want to call attention to the fact that the First Minister has been endeavoring to corrupt the morals of my hon. friend by telling him that the chief justiceship was waiting for him when he was ready to take it. But I am bound to say this, that I have known a very much higher price to be paid for infinitely inferior men to my hon. friend; and knowing that, I cannot but feel that the matter ought to be more or less taken notice of. But I wish to call the attention of the First Minister and of his colleagues to the fact that the First Minister was not correct in saying that attention had not been frequently called from this side of the House to the action of the American Government in freeing certain articles. If my memory does not fail me, in the debate in which the present Postmaster General proposed certain changes in the duties on fruit, that point was taken, and taken strongly. He was told that he was likely to destroy a valuable trade which was growing up, and that it was expedient that we should act at once under this identical clause now under discussion, for the purpose of showing the Americans that we were disposed to meet them half way in order to obtain reciprocity in the articles named in that clause. The hon. First Minister will find on reference to the Hansard that he is not at all correct in supposing that we on this side of the House did not over and over again call attention to the fact that the American Government had placed on the free list certain articles referred to in the Act of 1879, and that it was eminently desirable that we should meet them in the same spirit.

Motion withdrawn.

THE WRIT FOR RUSSELL.

Mr. LAURIER. Now that the First Minister is in his place, I would like to inquire if he can inform us whether the Order of the House for the issue of the writ for the election in Russell has at last been complied with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I think not. I was looking into the matter this morning and I had not time to consider who the returning officer ought to be.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman stated yesterday that it would be issued immediately. I will renew the question to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If you please.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, in desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very sure the House must have been pleased that an incident should have occurred which even for a few moments cast a gleam of hilarity over those usually very gloomy countenances on the other side of the House; and I think we may be sure of one thing that whatever credit they may take to themselves from that circumstance, those representing the majority of the people of this country will never permit that any reciprocal advantage, no matter how great it may be, with reference to any class of commodities, will divert the people of this country from pursuing their own interests in the way best calculated to promote those interests and in the manner indicated by the National Policy. Now, Sir, this debate has already been so protracted that any hon. gentleman who undertakes to intervene in it can hardly expect to obtain the attention of hon. members unless he avoids as far as possible going over ground which has been already occupied, and avoid reading those extracts which swell the pages of Hansard without really affecting the issue of the debate. The contention of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I take to be this, that the agricultural interests of this country are in such a distressed condition that they require a remedy, and that this depression is largely due to the burdens laid upon them by the National Policy. To remedy this depression he proposes the remedy, the only one, he claims, that can be found, of widely extended commercial relations with the United States. I deny the premises, and I say that, even admitting the premises to be well founded, the remedy suggested is neither the only one nor the best one. When we come to examine the grounds upon which this alleged depression is based we are confronted with the remarkable fact that at the time of the last general elections, a little over twelve months ago, we heard nothing about this depression; we heard nothing of the farmers being in such a bad condition that it was necessary to resort to the heroic remedy—an ignoble remedy would be the more fit term—of subverting the policy which the people adopted in 1878, a policy in which they renewed their confidence in 1882, and which they finally sanctioned in 1887. When we come to examine the question, that remarkable fact stares us in the face, and we must draw the inference, either that the hon. gentlemen opposite were then ignorant that such a thing as depression existed and therefore did not think any remedy necessary, or that they did not dare to face the evil and propose a remedy. The first inference would be an insult to their intelligence, and the second would be an insult to their courage and statesmanship. The only other inference is that since the general election some terrible calamity has overtaken this country, which has brought about the state of depression that now exists. If we examine the history of the country, we will find that we have had causes for depression, but they are causes which are beyond Government control. We have had dry seasons and short crops. Our cattle have suffered from want of water, and many of our grains were light. But are we to blame the Administration for those evils? Is it the fault of the Government that there has been rust in the wheat and that we have had short crops? And is it contended that reciprocity with the United States would prevent the recurrence of these evils? I would venture to suggest another hypothesis for the course adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I feel rather loath to make it, because it is not very creditable to hon. gentlemen opposite for whose statesmanship and knowledge of the affairs of this country I have much respect. That hypothesis is this: At the last elections they had no policy, and they found it impossible to obtain the support of the majority of the people for want of a policy. Not having the wit, or ingenuity, or sense, to devise a policy for themselves, they took up one which they found out and dried, and which was devised by a renegade Canadian Englishman and a Yankee politician. Every political ground which they had taken formerly was worn threadbare, and they had nothing with which to cover their own political nakedness; so they adopted this garment of commercial union, and having put it on, they strutted about like jack-daws in borrowed shoes. But there is one hon. gentleman among them who is above wearing ready made clothing and second hand garments, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who, by virtue of the magic letters which gives him the title he wears so gracefully, could not think of putting on a second hand garment, even that of Wiman, Smith and Butterworth. He needs must have a coat made to fit himself, so he took his garment, brought it to a tailor, had it made up anew, and called it unrestricted reciprocity. That is the best explanation that can be given of the course pursued by the hon. gentleman. When we come to consider again the grounds of the policy of the Opposition, we find the only tangible statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite is that the mortgages on the farm lands of this country have become so heavy that it is absolutely necessary some relief should be furnished. As a matter of fact, the farm lands of this country have always been mortgaged, and in the existing state of things must always be mortgaged, and I deny the proposition that the mortgages represent a debt. Except to a very limited extent do they represent the debt. They represent the capital invested. They represent the money invested in improving farm lands and promoting the agricultural interests of the country. Not one farmer in one hundred has capital of his own beyond that which he evolves out of the labor of his own hands, and it is good economy for him to borrow money for the purpose of making improvements. At any rate, he thought it was good economy, and the great majority of the people think it is; and I am justified in my contention that that money does not represent a debt, but represents capital invested for the purpose of improving and carrying on the agricultural interests of the country. Even if it were a debt, it is one to which we are no more subject to-day than we were in times past. How, I ask you, can the burden be more heavily felt to-day, when money is obtainable at 6 per cent. and $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., than it was years ago, when the farmer had to pay 10 to 12 per cent. So much for the depression among the farmers, which, I think, I have shown to exist largely in the imagination of hon. gentlemen opposite. But assuming, for the sake of argument, that that depression does exist, let us see what the remedy that is proposed amounts to. We are told the remedy lies in more widely extended commercial relations with the United States. With regard to the burdens said to be laid on the farmers by the operation of the National Policy, I say that ever since 1878, hon. gentlemen opposite have been endeavoring to persuade the farmers that the duty levied on articles imported necessarily adds to the price of similar articles made in this country. The farmers, however, have refused to be deluded by that fallacy, as shown by the fact that they have elected as their representatives men who take the opposite view. I am not going to weary the House with figures, but I wish to point out, by reference to a few of our leading articles of production, how little our agricultural interests would be benefited by this new policy. My contention is, that the American market is not our only and best market, and it does seem to me an argument which no one in his senses would raise, unless driven to it by the necessity of advancing some kind of an argument, that the best market for an agricultural country is a country which produces a large surplus of similar products. If the hon. member for Bothwell were called on to advise the people where they should seek their best market, he would say go to that country which requires the things you have to sell. Do not go to a country which competes with you in the same market. Let us see what the actual state of things is, taking a few of the leading articles. I do not pretend to say that this is a full statement. It is only a partial statement, but it is sufficient to illustrate my view of the case, and I think it is very suggestive. England is the best market for the following Canadian products, and to this extent:—

|-------------------|---------------------|
| Cattle..... | $ 5,300,000 |
| Butter..... | 750,000 |
| Cheese..... | 7,000,000 |
| Bacon..... | 870,000 |
| Hams..... | 370,000 |
| Apples..... | 648,000 |
| Oats..... | 509,000 |
| Peas..... | 2,000,000 |
| Wheat..... | 4,278,000 |
| Flour..... | 1,580,000 |
| Oatmeal..... | 176,000 |
| Total..... | $23,482,000 |

The United States is our best market for the following:—

| | |
|-------------------|---------------------|
| Horses..... | $ 2,200,000 |
| Sheep..... | 900,000 |
| Eggs..... | 1,800,000 |
| Wool..... | 288,000 |
| Barley..... | 5,245,000 |
| Beans..... | 206,000 |
| Hay..... | 670,000 |
| Potatoes..... | 328,000 |
| Total..... | $11,637,000 |

Therefore, England is our best market for leading agricultural products to the extent of nearly twenty-three millions and a-half, while the Americans give us the best market for only a little over eleven millions and a-half. Of course, there are many other articles on both sides, but I am taking those on which the difference is very apparent on one side. Of our cattle, for example, the value of nearly five millions and a half goes to England and less than one million to the United States. The result is this. If we had a market for barley, if the Americans did not require our barley, and did not buy it almost at any price we choose to ask for it, the case would stand this, that we would sell to England twenty-eight millions and a half, and to the States only six millions. Where is our best market in that case? Clearly where we sell the largest quantities of our products and, in regard to this article of barley and in regard to the article of horses and in regard to most of the agricultural products that we sell to the States, there is this remarkable fact that everything we sell to them is better than they have themselves. I have been told, on what I believe to be very good authority, that in the New York market the life of our horses for the sort of work for which our horses are purchased is very much greater than that of horses bred in a southern climate; and it is well known that our barley is superior to theirs.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman consider that that statement would hold good if there was a free admission of all these articles in the United States as there is into England?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not think it would make a great difference, and if it made a difference, it would not be to our advantage. For instance, why should we sell flour to the Americans in order that they may export it and make the profit out of it? Why should we sell them wheat in order that they may grind it, and export it, and make the profit out of it, which is now made by our own mills? If we must have commercial union with any country, it should be with the country which affords us our best market, and that is not the United States. If we must have free trade in manufactures, let us have it with the country which enters least into the competition with our own manufacturers. The manufactures which we buy from the United States are precisely the same as we make ourselves; or, rather, those that we would buy from the United States if the resolution of the hon. gentleman opposite were adopted. But what we buy from England are goods which our manufacturers do not produce. So, if we could have free trade with England, it would interfere to a far less extent with our trade than for us to have free trade with a country that manufactured the same class of goods that we do. If, therefore, we are to have a system of commercial union adopted, let us have it with the country which gives us our best market, and in which we meet with the least competition as regards agricultural products and manufactures. There is another subject which has not been touched upon to any extent in this debate, and it is one of which I have some knowledge in a general way, although I do not pretend to have a particular knowledge of it, and that is as to the effect that reciprocity in lumber would have upon our trade in this country. We have always dealt with this question as though the lumbermen were the only people in this country who had an interest in this trade. I say the people of this country as a whole have a much larger interest in this trade than the lumbermen themselves, and I confess that I look with great suspicion upon any measure which is said to tend to stimulate the lumber trade. When I see our lumber going out of the country to the extent to which it is now being sent out of the country, when I remember that in the part of the country in which I live there was a time when lumber was plentiful and that now a hemlock board is the best a farmer can get, and that that is the same all over the Province of Ontario, it is no wonder that I should regard with suspicion any measure which stimulates the export of lumber. When once a pine tree is gone, it is gone forever, for all practical purposes. We are doing nothing to replace the trees which are cut down, we are doing nothing to fill the gaps in our forest, even where there are facilities for doing so. Besides, I take it for granted that, if the American import duty is taken off, our export duty up on sawlogs must go too. The effect of that is easily understood. In my own constituency, before that export duty was put on, I have seen the representatives of Michigan firms who had taken elaborate precautions to prepare to take our logs across the lakes, who had built their scows and bought our limits, and I think the other day in Toronto, at the last sale, some of our most valuable limits were bought by those men. Their policy is clear, and I think we might take a lesson from them. They know that their supply of timber is limited, that pine trees are increasing in value every year, and so they are saving their pine forests in Minnesota and Michigan and purchasing our limits. If that goes on, instead of our timber being cut up and manufactured in this country, it will be transported to the mills in Michigan, and this country will not only lose the timber but the profit which it has hitherto made on the manufacture. One or two words in regard to this unrestricted reciprocity. I do not charge hon. gentlemen opposite, in the view they hold on this question, with desiring to change the political relations of this country, and I think they have carefully framed this resolution so as to avoid that imputation, but I may point out to them that the practical difficulties in the way of carrying out such a scheme as that which they present to the House would necessarily lead either to its being extended all the way to commercial union or would lead to disputes which would result in its abrogation by one party or the other. Without pretending to know much about importations and about the transaction of business, it does appear to me that, supposing such a treaty were made and there was a difference, as there probably would be, between the import duties of the two countries, a year would not elapse before we would find complaints made from the country which had the higher import duties that the other country was bringing in English or French or German manufactures and passing them through by some trick by which they evaded the letter of the law and so got them into the other country. I may be wrong, but I think there is good ground for that expectation, and I think we could never stand still on the resolution which is now before the House. I think that either the whole thing would be abrogated in consequence of disputes in regard to the customs, or it would be extended to such a degree as necessarily to bring about the subservience of this country in a fiscal point of view to the neighboring country, and what the result of that would be hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves. I think there is no possibility of avoiding the conclusion that it would bring about a change in our political relations which would be most disastrous to what I conceive the best interests of this country. I believe that there is no such depression as would justify a revolution in our fiscal policy, no such depression as would cause us to depart from what has been our policy ever since Confederation; for, mark you, if this view is correct, we have been under a mistake ever since Confederation, and we must abandon all hope of realising the dreams we have held of ever becoming a great nation. We must admit that we have been the greatest fools in expending millions of dollars in railways that are practically useless. I say to propose a remedy like this, an ignoble remedy, would be to ask the people of this country to do something which nothing but the direst necessity would drive them to. Having failed to establish that point, the whole case of the hon. gentleman falls on the ground, and he has no right to ask this House, or to ask this country to revolutionise our commercial arrangements and to adopt a policy which, in the opinion of the great majority of the people, whether rightly or wrongly, will lead to political changes which are abhorrent to them. Therefore this House would be justified, in view of our highest and best interests which are not to be measured by mere dollars and cents, in rejecting the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, and if we are to have reciprocity confining it simply to those natural products which do not interfere with the policy adopted by this country, and which has so largely contributed to its welfare and prosperity.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not my intention to take up a great deal of the time of the House in discussing the question before us. When the question was before the people last summer, and there was a great deal of agitation throughout the country in favor of commercial union, I paid a good deal of attention to it; but it always seemed a great objection to me that the proposition had never been put upon such a financial basis that I could understand it becoming a serious question before the country. I can understand a commercial union between this country and the United States, but so far as the proposition of the hon. gentleman opposite is embodied in his resolution, I confess I am unable to understand it. Commercial union, as it was proposed, is something similar to the Zollverein which existed among the different principalities of Germany. We were to have similar tariff regulations in this country and the United States, and we were promised that the customs duties between the two countries would be abolished. We were told how the revenue was to be divided, and a basis was to be agreed upon between the two countries, either a per capita one, or one according to the interests involved in the two countries. I could understand that proposition. The difficulty that always occurred to me was this: if we receive only a per capita allowance of the duties on goods which came into this country, how were the engagements of the country to be met? We import into this country at present nearly double the amount per head that they import into the United States, and the revenue which we receive barely suffices for the wants of the country. In any arrangement between this country and the United States in the form of commercial union, the basis would be a per capita one, we would receive only one-half the customs duties which we receive at present. Hon. gentlemen say that we are not going to have commercial union, we are going to have unrestricted reciprocity, with the rights of fixing our own tariff; but I shall endeavor to show, in the remarks that I am about to make, the absurdity of any such proposition as that. Unrestricted reciprocity with the rights of fixing our own tariff—what does that mean? It means that we shall have the fixing of the tariff on any goods which come from any other country than the United States, into our own, and an unrestricted interchange of commodities, either manufactured or otherwise, between this country and the United States. That is a proposition which never enters into the heads of any one in the United States. They never make a proposition of that kind; you never see anything like it proposed by any statesman in the United States; you hear nothing of that kind in the press of the United States. They always ask, as a condition attached to unrestricted reciprocity, a similarity of tariffs. The hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gets up and says: The proposition which we propose for you is not one of commercial union, we intend to reserve to ourselves the right of fixing the tariff. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to show you the absurdity of such a proposition as that. What does it mean? Suppose the United States, on some articles, have a tariff of 25 per cent.; suppose we have a similar tariff to theirs on iron, which ranges from $4 up to $22 per ton. Suppose they leave to the people of Canada the right of fixing the tariff on articles coming into this country in any manner which they like. What is the object of unrestricted reciprocity? Is it not for the purpose of compelling us to interchange commodities, manufactured or otherwise, with the United States? I can show you how, if we are left to the fixing of our own tariff, we would not be at all obliged to take a single article of manufactured goods from the United States unless they can manufacture them cheaper than we could import them from any other part of the world. The simple reason is this: Iron, as we all know, is at a high price in the United States. That price is fixed by the import duty of from $4 to $22 per ton. Supposing we were left the right of fixing our own tariff, and we wanted to use, say, 100,000 tons, or 50,000 tons, of steel rails in this country; would we go to the United States and pay $10 or $12 a ton more for them if we had the right of fixing our own tariff? Would we not fix the tariff at such a rate that we could get these rails into the country $5 or $7 or $8 cheaper than we could from the United States? I know the answer hon. gentlemen will make to a proposition of that kind. Their answer is that the liabilities of our country are such as would compel us to raise as large a revenue as possible on all articles coming into the country, and that fact would oblige us to prevent any such transaction as that occurring. But, no, Mr. Speaker, if we import these goods from the United States, we would have to pay no duty, and there would be nothing accruing to the revenue in that case. If we put on $4 or $5 a ton, or 10 per cent. duty, there would be a larger amount coming into the revenue of this country, and we would be getting the articles cheaper. You would think that no sane person, no politician or statesman in the United States, would make any such a bargain as that with us. They do not propose it, Mr. Speaker. The proposition is the simple and bald one, on their side, of unrestricted reciprocity in natural products and manufactures, with similar tariffs. What would be the result in this country if we had a similar tariff with that of the United States? What would be the amount we would receive from duties on goods coming into the country? As I said before, the Canadians import into this country double the amount per capita of what the Americans import. Supposing there was a pooling system between the two countries, Canada would only receive one-half in the shape of import duties of the amount it does at present. How are we to pay our liabilities in a case of that kind?

to Canada not in our interest

Mr. COOK. Reduce the expenses.

Mr. HAGGART. There are some fixed liabilities we are obliged to pay. We have to pay the annual subsidies to Provinces, the cost of legislation, interest on the Dominion indebtedness, expenses for the purpose of keeping the Indians from starving in the North-West, the cost of the constabulary there—all these sums we must pay some way or other, and it devolves upon hon. gentlemen opposite on submitting a proposition before the House, the adoption of which would completely change the fiscal arrangements of the country, to show some financial basis upon which the proposition can be supported. Not a single hon. gentleman who has addressed the House during this debate has attempted to solve the problem, except the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he made his statement on the supposition that the imports into this country would pay as much duty to the treasury with commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity between this country and the United States as they do at present. I can understand the benefit of commercial union between peoples similar to one another, peoples of similar ideas, of similar lineage, without different feelings and sentiments, peoples the same as the German people, having a fiscal arrangement by which there was commercial union and by which the customs duties between the two countries were abolished; but I cannot understand the proposition for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States which the hon. gentleman has introduced. I cannot understand it, because it means, if it means anything, commercial union plus the custom houses between the two countries. It has no other basis or foundation. What arguments do hon. gentlemen opposite advance in support of their proposal which involves an entire change in our fiscal policy? They speak of the benefit which would accrue to this country from the free exchange under unrestricted reciprocity of agricultural products, of fish and the products of the mine and other products. Their first effort is to show a depression in our agricultural industry. I deny that our agricultural interests are depressed. I make the statement, and I make it supported by the opinions of the best statisticians, that the agricultural population in Canada are in as good a position as any other agricultural population on the face of the globe. The amount of money invested in agricultural lands in this country is greater per capita than in the United States, the yield is within a percentage of being as great. The reason why it is greater in the United States is because the returns of California are included. We have larger receipts and returns for our agricultural population than any of the New England States; our return is greater than any of the Middle States. A farmer in any portion of Canada is better off than a farmer in New York or any of the Middle States. We are now, according to the opinion of statisticians who have made the subject a special study, in the same position as the Western States, and the only reason of the percentage of return being greater in the whole United States is because of the enormous return of California per capita. I am convinced that if we had the statistics down to the present day, giving the returns of our North-West, with its enormous crop this year, and the returns of British Columbia, the return per capita for the farming population of this country would be greater than in the United States, and the farming population per man is better off in this country than in any portion of the United States except California.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do our farmers leave in such numbers?

Mr. HAGGART. I have heard a great deal about farmers leaving this country. It has been natural, since 1820, for the surplus population of the country to leave here. The whole number of people, being Canadian born subjects, who have left here from 1820 up to 1888 and gone to the United States, has been about 1,000,000. The present number in the United States according to last census, the only return we have, is 713,000. When I heard the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) the other day talking about the large number of people that were annually leaving Prince Edward Island, that it was almost depleted, that the country was naturally going over to the United States, I turned up the census of the United States out of curiosity to find out how many had left Prince Edward Island and gone there, and I find that of people born in the Island there were at present living in the United States, according to the last census, 7,313. That was the total number of people who had left Prince Edward Island and gone there. Hon. gentlemen may think I am wrong in my statistics, but I will take the American Almanac and show there is no mistake about them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman will find that they do not distinguish between British North America and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HAGGART. They do; they distinguish in every particular. Nationalities of the foreign born population, from the official return of the tenth census, 1880, Canada 610,000, New Brunswick, 41,788, Newfoundland, 4789, Nova Scotia 51,150, Prince Edward Island, 7,537.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that; I also know, what I intimated, that they are not very particular about distinguishing between the small Provinces.

Mr. HAGGART. The only official statistics we have are those of the United States census, and I have quoted from that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What year?

Mr. HAGGART. Last census, 1880, and compiled in 1881. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of telling us of the immense advantage that would result from the interchange of agricultural commodities and minerals between the two countries. It is true there has been an immense traffic developed in the Lake Superior district and in Michigan from extracting ore from the mines there; but hon. gentlemen opposite always reject or refuse to state, or at least they do not tell us the reason. There would not be, I venture to say, a single ton of iron ore extracted out of United States mines or manufactured there if it were not for the protective duty which exists, ranging from $4 to $22. Are they going to offer to the people of this country markets so highly protected without receiving some corresponding advantage? Hon. gentlemen tell the House of the paltry 30,000 tons of iron ore exported from this country to the United States. The United States or rather the people of the United States tax the industries and the agricultural portion of the country in order that they may manufacture for themselves. They have ores in the country, but is it not a notorious fact that you can take better ore than is to be found anywhere in the United States from Bilbao in Spain and deliver it in the United States for a less price than it can be taken from the Michigan mines to Philadelphia? If it were not for the protective duties they have at present in the United States there would not be a single ton of United States ore smelted and worked there, because free trade England and Spain and those other countries could send them the products of their mines and undersell them in their own country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in Northern Alabama and in other portions of the United States iron is produced for less cost than in any other place in the world?

Mr. HAGGART. I am quite aware of it. I have the authority here for my statement, and the statistician on the subject says that there would not be a ton of ore manufactured in the United States if you could export iron ore into the country free of duty, and that the ore of a better quality from Bilbao could be delivered cheaper in Philadelphia than it could be extracted from the different mines of the United States and delivered there. What would be the use of the railroads in the United States, and where would their increased prosperity be if England should at one time or another alter her fiscal policy in reference to foreign nations? What is it that builds up Chicago and Milwaukee and those railroads which centre there? Is it not the carriage of the surplus cereal products of that country for the purpose of delivering them in England? What is it that gives a benefit to the agricultural population of our North-West and the Western States of America? It is the high market in England; it is the carriage of the surplus products of this country towards the Atlantic coast for export to that great country beyond the Atlantic which consumes so much of our produce. We have had a great deal of talk in this country about the glorious United States. Sir, we belong to an empire greater and more glorious. We belong to a people and we belong to a country which consists of 352,000,000 of inhabitants. We belong to an island which has increased in wealth during the last decade at the rate of £400,000 sterling a day. The wealth of that country has increased at that rate. The people of that country emigrate to every portion of the world, but you do not hear the cry that the country is becoming poor, nor do you hear her people running down their own country. If we are going to unite to any country let us have closer bonds with the country which can benefit us. What would be the use of all that great farming country in the Western States unless they had England as a market for their surplus products? And are we going to cut our connection with the best market in the world for the purpose of forming some absurd political policy proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite and which not one of them has attempted to put before us upon a financial basis. As I showed in my opening remarks not a single one of the gentlemen opposite except indeed the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has attempted to put their proposition on a financial basis. Are they going to ask the people of the country to support any such policy as this, or are they going to ask the people of this House to support it, without giving us the financial aspect? The pre-requisite, to advancing any proposition of that kind which will alter the fiscal arrangements of this country, is to show how it can be done. Has any one of them attempted to do that? Not a single one, but the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have endeavored to show how absurd his proposition is; I have endeavored to show that the amount paid in import duties by the inhabitants of this country is as two to one compared with the amount paid by the people of the United States, and that the requirements of this country need nearly the whole revenue. We may reduce our requirements to some extent, but even the hon. gentleman could not explain his case in any other way than by saying that the balance of what we require should be raised by direct taxation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I thought perhaps that I was listening to him the other evening, and I listened to him in order to hear how he proposed to raise the custom duty and excise, and how we should get the balance, which even, according to his own calculation, was required after that. I may have misunderstood him, but I think he said it was to be raised by direct taxation.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me I will explain.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. HAGGART. Certainly. I do not wish to make any statement as to what any gentleman may have said, unless it is correct.

Mr. CHARLTON. I proceeded to point out in what way I deemed the necessary revenue could be raised. I asserted distinctly it would not be necessary to resort to direct taxation. I then said: "even admitting for the sake of argument" that which I would not admit, that it were necessary to resort to direct taxation, and I proceeded to show that in that eventuality the country would be a large gainer. I did not say that it would be necessary to resort to direct taxation, and I did not believe it.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps it was from some remarks like those I drew the conclusion which I did. I was paying attention to the hon. gentleman's remarks, because he was the only one who endeavored to supply the information which the country and the House required from gentlemen opposite. When they demand a complete change of the system of government of the country they should show in some manner or other how they intended to carry out their project financially. I say they have never done this, and as I said before, it is required by the country that they should do so. The hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), described the glowing condition of the country which would follow from this change, and I trust I may be pardoned if I show how it would be entirely different from the glowing condition he represented. What would be the effect of this policy on this country? Would not the manufactories, or the majority of the manufactories, of this country be closed?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. It is true. I admit the proposition that a Canadian is just as intelligent and as good as an American, and as good a man as any to be found in the United States, but, unfortunately on account of the smallness of the market the whole capital of the manufacturer in this country has been forced into the supplying of four or five articles while in the United States his energies are centered in the manufacture of one article. Any manufacturer in this country will tell you or any one who has inquired into the matter will tell you that the result of this policy now proposed would be almost a complete destruction of the capital at present invested if there were open competition between Canada and the United States. They are the judges of what would be best for themselves, and I venture to say that 99 out of 100 manufacturers in this country will tell you that it would be complete ruin to them if such an arrangement was made as they propose. And another thing. What would become of the commerce of this country? The hon. gentlemen themselves say: "Oh, we naturally go south, we naturally go to the United States for anything we can buy and importers going from New York or Boston to the old country buy wholesale and buy larger quantities than are required for the limited markets of Montreal and Quebec, and as a consequence they may be able to sell cheaper. His facilities for navigating between the ports of the old country and this on account of the immense export and import trade being nearly equal both ways, and as a natural result the people of this country would go to the markets, where perhaps they can buy a little cheaper, where perhaps they would have a larger stock to select from, and Montreal and Toronto and Halifax and St. John, instead of supplying the retail trade of the Dominion as at present, would become ports in which there would be hardly any commerce done whatever." Under this system we would have the whole trade and commerce of this country transferred to a foreign country. What benefit would that be to the agricultural portion of this country? No benefit at all except the interchange of two or three commodities, in the sale of horses, the sale of chickens and the sale of barley over there. The great agricultural products of this country are sent to Great Britain where they have a market, and what benefit would it be to have a free interchange only for those articles? It would be of course to some extent a benefit to the country, and that, I suppose is the policy of this Government and of all parties in this country—to get as unrestricted a trade between this country and the United States as possible, having regard to our fiscal position and our manufacturing interests. It is in the interest of the people of Canada to have such an interchange as that. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us how much better off people on the other side are than people here. On the contrary, the people of this country per capita are nearly as wealthy as the people on the other side. Our commerce is nearly double per capita what the commerce of the United States is. Our shipping is greater by nearly two to one per capita than that of the United States, in everything that constitutes a nation, man for man, we are equal if not the superior of the people of the United States.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why cannot we hold our own, then?

Mr. HAGGART. We can hold our own. Now, what would be the result of such a proposition as that of hon. gentleman opposite, even supposing it had a financial or fiscal basis? It is not a proposition in the form of a treaty that would be continuous, say for thirty or forty years. It proposes to leave to each nation the framing of its own tariff. The time might come when there would be a change in the Government of the United States or a change in the Government of this country; a different set of people would come in who might change the tariff regulations altogether; and if our manufactures were wiped out and the present commerce transferred from Montreal, Quebec and all our other seaport towns to the United States, then how could we expect to revive trade if the arrangement came to an end? It would be impossible. The country would be put back, and it would take ten or fifteen years to restore it to its former position; and even then capitalists would lose confidence in the country, for they would say that although the Government and Parliament of this country had promised a certain policy to the manufacturers of this country, they had revoked that policy at the instance of the Opposition without providing for compensation. The consequence would be that promises of any kind from any party would not induce capital to re-engage in manufacturing. A more absurd proposition I never heard propounded in my lifetime by any great party in the country. The primary condition of such a proposition should be to put it on such a financial basis that it can be clearly understood by the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have never endeavored to do so. The hon. member for Queen's described the wonderful wealth that would accrue to this country in a few years under the carrying out of this policy. He described the flag as drooping over his head, but the breeze of public opinion he said would soon come and open its folds. The breeze of public opinion will never blow in this country in favor of such a policy. It is to the interest of the people of this country to have an Opposition which will propound a policy that will be acceptable to the country. It is to the interest of the people of this country that there should be an independent spirit, perhaps not in the House, but in the country, to change the current of opinion from one party to another; but the party that propounds such a policy as this, mark my words, will never get into power.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

27-1888-3

Bill (No. 59) to confer certain powers on the Nova Scotia Telephone Company (Limited).—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 61) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 69) to confirm a mortgage given by the Central Railway Company to the Central Trust Company of New York to secure an issue of Debentures.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Tobique Gypsum and Colonisation Railway Company.—(Mr. Weldon, Albert.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Annapolis Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

ST. JOHN'S AND IBERVILLE HYDRAULIC COMPANY BILL.

Mr. BAIN (Soulanges), for Mr. VANASSE, moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to grant certain powers to the St. John's and Iberville Hydraulic and Manufacturing Company.

Mr. BECHARD. There is a strong opposition on the part of numerous people, who will be seriously affected by it, to this Bill. I would ask that the second reading be delayed so that I may have time to communicate with those people.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The last time the Bill was up for a second reading, I asked that it be allowed to stand over, in order that the hon. gentleman and his friends might have an opportunity of presenting one or two petitions against it, which I knew were coming on. These have been presented, and I understand others are coming. This Bill will be before the committee for eight days, so that there will be plenty of time for the presentation of petitions, and I would advise the hon. gentleman not to object to the second reading, but to reserve his opposition until the Bill goes into committee.

Bill read the second time.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed debate on proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright, on amendment of Mr. Foster, and amendment to amendment of Mr. Jones (Halifax).

Mr. HAGGART. I was about concluding my remarks before dinner, and those which I shall now make will be very short. I wish briefly to refer to some of the remarks I made before recess, and to which I defy contradiction from hon. gentlemen opposite. I stated that unrestricted reciprocity means parting with our right to fix our own tariff; I stated that it means parting with all our rights in respect of our fiscal policy. I stated that unrestricted reciprocity, as rightly understood between reasonable men and between countries, means that the tariff of each country should be the same. I referred to statements made by gentlemen who advocate that scheme in the United States, and I showed that, without exception, they require similar tariffs in the two countries. I may refer to an address to the American people, which was issued by Mr. Blaine, son of the gentleman who was supposed to be a candidate, in the Republican interest, for the presidency of the United States. He is supposed to mouth the opinions of the Republican party in the United States, and he said that there were only two ways of dealing with the Canadian people, either retaliation or unrestricted reciprocity with similar tariffs. I have shown that if unrestricted reciprocity means anything it means an agreement between the two countries to have a common tariff, and I defy any hon. gentleman opposite to prove the contrary. I stated that if we desired that our manufactured products should be admitted free into the United States, and have the benefit of their highly protective tariff, we would have to prevent goods manufactured in other countries from coming into this at a nominal rate of duty and thus competing with United States manufactures in our markets. I showed the absurdity of an agreement such as that proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, by pointing out that if on the American side there was a tariff on foreign goods of 30 to 50 per cent, and we had a similar one here, and if the power was given to us to legislate in any manner we liked in regard to our own tariff, we might legislate to admit foreign goods which are manufactured cheaper than American goods, into this country at lower rates, and thus nullify the whole agreement. The United States will never agree to a proposition such as these gentlemen propose. A proposition to receive the support of this country and of the people of the United States, must be a reasonable one. We must, if we expect to enter into an agreement of this kind with the United States, be prepared to assimilate our tariff to theirs. That argument is incontrovertible. I have never heard it attempted to be answered by hon. gentlemen opposite. Another reason, which is advanced to the people of Canada, especially Ontario, for the purpose of inducing them of entering this commercial union,—for commercial union it is, notwithstanding the denial of the hon. member for South Oxford—is that between Ontario and the sea, our country is occupied by an alien population, a population of French origin, a population alien to us in religion, in tradition, and in sentiment, and we are asked how is it possible to build up a nationality with such a population between us and the sea. Well, we, the representatives of the Conservative party, have accepted the position. We entered into a union with our fellow countrymen of French descent, and we entered into that union, not with our mouths but with our hearts. We believe they are as great a nation and as great a people as we ourselves are, and we are willing to accept the responsibility of building up a nationality on the north shore of the St. Lawrence with them. We are told that through the influence of their priesthood, through the influence of early marriages and other causes they are increasing in population to such an extent that the time will come when they will rule this country. That time may come, and if through the teaching of morality and from other causes, they will succeed in building up a nation on the north side of the St. Lawrence, we are perfectly willing that they should do so. Those remarks were intended solely for the population of Ontario, with a view to induce us to enter into the scheme of commercial union. What does it mean? It means not only intimate relations with the people on the other side of the border commercially, but it means a union in every respect, it means that we are to cease this nationality which we are endeavoring to build up in connection with the British Empire on this side of the St. Lawrence. As for me and the party to which I belong, we are in favor of that union, we are in favor of building up an empire on the north side of the St. Lawrence in accordance with the sentiments of the British Empire. We believe that, if the day ever comes that we should separate from the Empire, we will have a nationality of our own on the north side of the St. Lawrence. We live in a climate which begets men, and we will at some time have an influence over the continent of America as great as that of any other empire that ever was on the face of the globe. That is the ambition of our people, and it is a laudable ambition. What is that empire that we are in accord with? Has it not done everything it possibly can for the advancement of this country? Has it not loaned us money, and protected us in every respect? Has it not opened to us its markets and done everything it possibly could do for a colony, which we are? I think it is to the interest of this part of the Empire that we should be in accord with the Empire? It is the greatest Empire on the face of the globe. It is the greatest Empire that ever was known. We have free intercommunication not only with the colonies of the British Empire but with the British Empire itself. We are part of an empire which, as I said before, contains 352,000,000 people under the dominion of the British Crown, and it is to our interest to have closer communication with that empire than we possibly can have with the people to the south of us. While we are willing to have as great an interchange of commodities and of manufactures with that people as we can, consistently with our position, still, as I said before, we are man for man equal to the people to the south of us. We have as great intelligence, as great industry, and we have, perhaps, as fine a climate—at least we have a climate that begets as good men as they have—and it is to our interest to build up our own nationality. I urge upon hon. gentlemen opposite to adopt a financial and a fiscal basis which is sensible, which people can understand, and until they do that, the proposition which they now put forward should be voted down. It has no basis. It is merely a statement of individuals. It is a sentiment without any basis which any reasonable person can be asked to support. It is my opinion that the position we occupy is one which we properly ought to occupy, in communication with the great Empire with which we are connected; and, if the time should come when we will be separated from that Empire, it is my opinion that it would be to our advantage to remain a separate nationality, which it would be impossible for us to do if the doctrines which are preached on the other side were carried out. I have shown that, if our manufactures and our commerce and everything that constitutes a nation are wiped out, we will be left at the mercy of the people to the south of us, and it is our duty to ourselves, to our children, and to our children's children, to build up a nationality on this side of the St. Lawrence in accord with the Empire; and I believe that these sentiments will be echoed by every elector throughout the whole Dominion of Canada.

M. AMYOT: M. l'Orateur, je viens d'entendre de jolies paroles, dites avec beaucoup d'éloquence, au sujet du grand Empire britannique. Certes, pour ma part, je suis heureux d'appartenir pour le moment à ce grand empire. J'aurai occasion, dans le cours des remarques que je vais faire, de revenir sur cette question, mais l'honorable député qui m'a précédé (M. Haggart) aurait pu nous dire en passant si ce grand empire n'est pas attaqué au cœur même, si au centre même de ce grand empire, il n'y a pas des millions et des millions de personnes qui pleurent et qui souffrent la persécution malgré la gloire du drapeau britannique. Il aurait pu nous dire, avant de nous vanter ces trois cent cinquante millions d'âmes, pourquoi cette grande puissance ne réussit pas à protéger, même à ne pas persécuter ceux qui sont près d'elle, cette pauvre Irlande. Il veut nous annexer à ce territoire. Nous verrons tantôt le grand amour qu'a pour nous cette grande métropole qu'il appelle, lui, la mère-patrie. Nous verrons son brûlant amour pour ceux même qui forment partie de l'Empire britannique.

Je n'ai pas l'intention d'employer l'excuse ordinaire, et de dire qu'à cette phase de la discussion je ne devrais pas parler. Au contraire. La question a été présentée avec beaucoup d'habileté à deux points de vue par les libres-échangistes et par les protectionnistes. Mais il est une partie importante du pays qui n'a pas encore été entendue. Je regrette qu'une bouche plus éloquente que la mienne ne soit pas chargée de combler cette lacune. Il y a dans le pays des gens qui croient que la protection est nécessaire. Il y en a d'autres qui croient que le libre-échange est nécessaire, et il y en a d'autres qui croient que les circonstances doivent tout décider.

En 1878, les États-Unis avaient élevé une barrière contre nous. Nous ne pouvions pas envoyer chez eux nos effets de culture ni nos effets de manufacture. Quand nous voulions pénétrer là, nous heurtions une barrière qui ne s'ouvrait pas; mais eux envoyaient chez nous tous les effets qu'ils voulaient, ils inondaient nos marchés des produits de leurs récoltes et des produits de leurs manufactures. Ce n'était pas juste, et l'on aura beau, de ce côté-ci de la Chambre, dire que c'était juste, moi, je dis que ce n'était pas juste. Je dis que cela appauvissait le pays et que tant que les Etats-Unis mettront une barrière contre nos produits, nous devons les empêcher de communiquer chez nous, nous devons nous protéger contre eux. Mais, M. l'Orateur, je dis aussi que quand les Etats-Unis seront prêts à nous ouvrir leur marché, quand ils seront prêts à nous dire : voici 60,000,000 d'âmes, venez commercer avec nous, ce jour-là, nous devons nous aussi ouvrir nos portes et dire : très-bien, nous sommes prêts, marchons ensemble sous le drapeau de l'Amérique.

Quelques honorables DÉPUTÉS. Oh ! oh !

M. AMYOT. J'entends dire Oh ! oh ! Le mot drapeau de l'Amérique les surprend. Ce sont des gens, je présume, qui auraient empêché les Etats-Unis d'obtenir leur indépendance et qui poussent la loyauté jusqu'à croire qu'il faut nécessairement, pendant des siècles et des siècles, faire l'affaire d'un autre pays pour être loyaux. Nous verrons tantôt ce que l'Angleterre a fait pour nous, jusqu'où doit s'étendre cette loyauté et le sens du mot drapeau de l'Amérique. Il ne faut pas craindre d'appeler les choses par leur nom.

En 1878 donc, suivant moi, la protection était nécessaire. Les Etats-Unis se protégeant contre nous, nous fermant leur marché, et le nôtre leur étant ouvert, leur excédant de récoltes et d'objets manufacturés s'en venaient dans nos villes et dans nos campagnes et faisaient mourir d'inanition nos propres manufactures. Nos cultivateurs n'avaient pas la chance de vendre leurs denrées puisque les cultivateurs américains pouvaient venir leur faire la lutte sur leur propre marché. Il fallait la protection contre cet état de chose, et tant que les Etats-Unis continueront leur politique de protection contre nous il nous faudra continuer la nôtre contre eux.

Mais que se passe-t-il aujourd'hui, M. l'Orateur ? Aujourd'hui, nous voyons un mouvement en faveur de la réciprocité. Depuis longtemps la question de l'union commerciale s'agitait. Depuis plusieurs mois des hommes de talent, un canadien dont nous devons être fiers, M. Erastus Wiman, a soulevé le mouvement de l'union commerciale. Naturellement, l'écho de ses discussions et de ces discours transmis par la presse s'est répandu jusqu'en Angleterre. Or, qu'a dit M. Chamberlain lorsqu'il a été envoyé par le gouvernement anglais aux Etats-Unis ? Je vais lire ce qu'il a dit en parlant au nom du peuple anglais et qui est rapporté dans une résolution unanime de la Chambre de Commerce de New-York le 3 de novembre dernier :

"Whereas the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the representative of the Government of Great Britain on the Fishery Commission, in a speech delivered before he left England, is reported to have said as follows: 'The arrangement between the Colonies and Great Britain, is essentially a temporary one. It cannot remain as it is. * * * Already you have in Canada—the greatest of all the Colonies—an agitation for what is called commercial union with the United States. Commercial union with the United States means free trade between America and the Dominion and a protective tariff against the mother country. If Canada desires that, Canada can have it;' and,

"Whereas, on a subsequent occasion, the right hon. gentleman further said, that 'Commercial union with the United States meant that Canada was to give preference to every article of manufacture from the United States over the manufactures of Great Britain. If the people of Canada desired an arrangement of that kind, he did not doubt that they would be able to secure it, and he did not think anybody in England would prevent such arrangement by force; but he remarked that in that case all the advantages of the slender tie that bound Canada to England would disappear, so far as England was concerned; and it was not likely that the people of Great Britain would continue much longer to sustain the obligations and responsibilities of a relationship, all the reciprocal benefits of which had been withdrawn;' and,

"Whereas, The foregoing expression of opinion by an eminent public man, in a high official position, is an important contribution to the knowledge of the members of this Chamber and as it is supplemented with information from Canada that a strong movement is in progress there favoring the closest possible commercial relations with the United States, it would seem to be the duty of this Chamber, without any regard whatever to political or territorial considerations, to investigate the possibility of a greatly enlarged extension of the commerce of this city and country with the northern half of this continent, and;

"Whereas, It is most desirable that the Canadian Fishery question, which for over 100 years has periodically threatened to disturb the peaceful relations existing between Great Britain and this country, should be settled on the broad and enduring basis of a mutual interest, resulting from an enlarged commercial relation between Canada and the United States; therefore, be it Resolved..."

Ces paroles de M. Chamberlain, prononcées en Angleterre, n'ont pas été désavouées encore que je sache, et pourtant il était l'envoyé de l'Angleterre.

D'un autre côté, aux Etats-Unis, nous voyons un grand mouvement; les chambres de commerce se réunissent partout; la presse discute, les orateurs encombrant les hustings, chacun d'un bout à l'autre des Etats-Unis, affirme désirer faire un commerce libre avec nous. Notre pays lui-même consulté a répondu dans de nombreuses assemblées publiques qu'il était prêt à commercer avec les Etats-Unis. Devons-nous accepter cette réciprocité ? Qu'est-ce qui nous a été dit en 1878, pour nous faire accepter la protection qui alors, suivant moi, était nécessaire ? Quelle était la motion de l'honorable premier lorsqu'il proposait d'adopter la protection ? Il terminait sa motion en disant :

Que cette politique gardera au Canada des milliers de nos compatriotes maintenant obligés de s'expatrier pour trouver du travail que le pays leur refuse, rendra la prospérité à nos industries qui luttent et souffrent si péniblement, empêchera le Canada d'être un marché à sacrifice, encouragera, développera et activera notre commerce interprovincial, et tendant à la réciprocité de tarif avec nos voisins dans la mesure requise par les intérêts variés du Canada, aura grandement pour effet de procurer éventuellement à ce pays une réciprocité commerciale.

Pourquoi cela était-il mis dans la motion, M. l'Orateur ? Nous avons fait les élections là-dessus. Nous disions aux électeurs : nous voulons la protection pour arriver à ce que vous désirez tant, vous, peuple du Canada, pour arriver à la réciprocité commerciale avec les Etats-Unis. On peut donc parler de réciprocité sans être rebelle, sans être traître à son pays, et sans être utopiste ni en politique ni en commerce.

M. l'Orateur, dès 1869, cela était déjà prévu. Je trouve dans un discours de sir Francis Hincks sur le budget, le 7 avril 1870, les paroles suivantes :

L'honorable préopinant a attiré l'attention de cette Chambre sur les mots "politique nationale." Eh bien ! mon opinion est que nous devrions jouir de la faculté de faire tout ce qui est bon et utile à nos intérêts; or, qu'on ne l'oublie pas, si plusieurs de ces articles ont été jusqu'ici maintenus sur la liste des exemptions, c'est uniquement en conséquence des négociations entamées à plusieurs reprises avec les Etats-Unis au sujet du renouvellement du traité de réciprocité.

A ce sujet, je ne saurais mieux faire que de citer ici l'opinion exprimée par mon prédécesseur dans le cours de l'exposé financier qu'il faisait à cette Chambre l'an dernier. S'adressant aux Américains, il leur disait : "Nous vous avons permis d'importer ici votre charbon en franchise, bien que vous imposiez un droit élevé sur le nôtre. Nous permettons l'importation en franchise de vos farines, de vos céréales, votre houblon, votre sel et autres articles, tandis que non-seulement vous ne voulez pas nous rendre le réciproque, mais qu'encore vous nuisez à nos propriétaires de moulins en imposant un droit plus élevé sur les farines que sur les grains. Cet état de chose," pourrions-nous fort bien ajouter, "existe depuis trois ou quatre ans, mais vous devez comprendre qu'il ne peut se perpétuer. Le temps viendra peut-être bientôt où nous devons avoir une politique nationale qui nous soit propre, que cette politique nationale pêche ou non contre une théorie ou une autre de l'économie politique. Car nous devons être guidés principalement, sinon exclusivement, par la considération de ce qui peut nous convenir à nous-mêmes, et nous pourrions avoir à consulter notre propre intérêt sans égard à celui des autres."

L'honorable premier ministre lui-même, dans un discours qu'il prononçait à Montréal le 7 juillet 1877, disait :—

Vous allez enterrer cette fausse politique, et vous allez adopter la politique du parti qui déclare qu'il conservera le Canada pour les Canadiens et qu'il aura une politique nationale. Vous adopterez la politique du parti qui veut que le Canada ne baise plus les pieds du frère Jonathan, qui exigera la réciprocité du commerce ou la réciprocité des impôts. Si les Américains veulent s'entourer d'une muraille de Chine, nous aiderons à l'érection de cette muraille. S'ils ne veulent pas que nous allions chez eux, nous ne leur permettrons pas de venir chez nous. Nous ne souffrirons pas que le Canada devienne un marché pour le surplus des produits américains; nous ne permettrons pas que ce pays soit asservi aux manufacturiers et aux capitalistes de la république voisine.

Il y a eu, à la Chambre de Commerce de Montréal, en 1875, une assemblée à laquelle n'étaient pas étrangers certaines personnes qui sont maintenant en cette Chambre, et où la résolution suivante fut adoptée. Le rapport se lit comme suit :

" Acting upon the invitation from the St. John Board of Trade, formally accepted at Ottawa, your council, early in the summer, commenced preparations for the special session, which they decided should be held in St. John on the 16th day of July. At that meeting there were forty-eight delegates present, representing 20 different cities and towns,—while the following gentlemen attended from the National Board of Trade of the United States:—

Portland: T. O. Hersey, Esq., Chairman.
Cincinnati: W. W. Taylor, Esq.
New-York: John Austin Stevens, jr., Esq.
Boston: B. F. Nourse, Esq.
Milwaukee: W. E. Smith, Esq.
Detroit: R. Hawley, Esq.
Buffalo: E. P. Dorr, Esq.

A full report of this important gathering was published soon after adjournment, and extensively circulated, so that any statement of the business done there, seems needless in the present report.

That the draft reciprocity treaty formed the principal subject of discussion, is generally known,—and the following resolution was adopted as the result:—

1st. That this Board reiterates its frequently expressed opinion in favour of a Treaty of Reciprocity between the United States and Canada."

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, comme nous venons de le voir, dans ce temps-là nous prenions la protection à défaut de libre-échange complet. Nous concevions que si les Etats-Unis continuaient plus longtemps à inonder nos marchés et nos campagnes de leurs produits, notre population ne pouvait pas prospérer. Mais aujourd'hui, comme je viens de le démontrer, les Etats-Unis désirent faire le commerce avec nous. Devons-nous le leur refuser? La question qui se pose maintenant est celle-ci: Y a-t-il pour nous des avantages réels dans un traité de réciprocité? Nous avons d'abord pour nous guider l'opinion générale des auteurs sur la théorie du libre-échange. Je ne citerai que Adam Smith qui dit entr'autres choses :

To prohibit a great people from making all that they can of every part of their own produce, or from employing their stock and industry in the way that they judge most advantageous to themselves, is a manifest violation of the most sacred rights of mankind.

Nous avons en second lieu l'expérience du passé. Y a-t-il un seul homme, de bonne foi, qui dira que sous le traité de réciprocité de 1854 le Canada n'a pas marché à pas de géant dans le progrès et la prospérité? On peut faire dire aux chiffres tout ce qu'on veut, mais on alignera tous les chiffres que l'on voudra, qu'on ne réussira pas à prouver le contraire de la vérité. J'ai entendu cet après-midi un honorable député de la droite dire à la Chambre, que notre commerce avec les Etats-Unis était de $5,000,000. Et bien! en regardant aux livres bleus, on verra qu'il s'élève au contraire à une somme variant entre $36,000,000 à $40,000,000 par année. Tels sont les faits. Quand même nous passerions des mois et des mois devant les électeurs à leur citer des chiffres, en seraient-ils plus avancés, et plus renseignés? Assurément non. Mais parlons-leur du traité de réciprocité et demandons-leur s'il a été profitable, et tous nous répondront dans l'affirmative. Tous nous diront que pendant sa durée les terres ont commencé à prendre de la valeur, et que leurs produits se vendaient mieux. Il est vrai que dans ce temps-là nos manufactures n'étaient pas encore bien considérables, et que nous ne pouvions pas lutter avec les manufactures américaines; mais quant à l'agriculture, quant aux cultivateurs, la période du traité de réciprocité a été éminemment favorable.

La position est bien simple: un traité de cette nature ouvrirait un marché immense, d'abord à nos produits agricoles, en deuxième lieu aux produits de nos mines, et en troisième lieu aux produits des forêts. C'est-à-dire que les céréales, les mines et les bois recevraient de suite un puissant développement au moyen de la réciprocité.

Une autre raison propre à nous engager à conclure ce traité, est notre situation spéciale sur ce continent. Nous sommes, par la Providence même, destinés à faire affaires avec ceux qui sont nos voisins. Nous n'avons qu'un pas à faire pour traverser cette ligne imaginaire qui nous sépare des Etats Unis.

Il nous faut des marchés, la force des choses l'exige. Il est vrai que la protection a fait surgir chez nous un grand nombre d'industries; mais qu'est-il arrivé? Au bout de cinq ou six ans de production, le marché local est devenu encombré des produits de ces manufactures, et il en est résulté de grandes faillites. Il en est résulté aussi de ces grandes coalitions commerciales appelées combines, dont l'objet et le résultat ont été de faire hausser, au détriment du consommateur, les prix des objets manufacturés. Et je ne crains pas de dire que les seules manufactures qui ont résisté, sont celles qui avaient des débouchés à l'étranger. Entr'autres, la fabrication des cuirs et des chaussures est prospère; mais pourquoi l'est-elle? Parce qu'elle a trouvé un marché aux Etats-Unis et ailleurs.

Nous cherchons partout des marchés, en Espagne, dans les Antilles, etc.; nous frappons à toutes les portes, et nous demandons qu'on veuille bien nous recevoir—excepté en France. Il paraît qu'il ne faut pas frapper là. Mais on nous dit: les manufactures vont être détruites. M. l'Orateur, il y a bien des manières de répondre à cela. J'ai entendu un honorable député de cette Chambre, qui passe généralement, et avec raison, pour un philosophe,—et un philosophe chrétien,—nous dire qu'il voulait bien protéger l'agriculture, mais pas au détriment des manufactures. Je me permettrai de lui demander ce qui fait le bonheur d'un peuple? Est-ce le manufacturier,—dont souvent l'éducation n'est pas tout à fait ce qu'elle devrait être,—ou bien le cultivateur, le vrai chef de famille? Et ceux qui passent pour philosophes et moralistes oseraient-ils venir dire devant le peuple, que les cultivateurs qui sont la véritable force du pays ne doivent pas être protégés, si cela doit être au détriment des manufacturiers?

La force et la vitalité du peuple français dont on parlait tantôt, ne sont pas dues à ceux qui vont s'étioier dans les villes, à ceux qui vont perdre leur morale et leur caractère dans les manufactures des villes, mais elles sont dues au peuple des campagnes qui a conservé cette virilité, cette force, ce caractère moral qui en font aujourd'hui un objet d'admiration dans le continent de l'Amérique du Nord. On en dira ce que l'on voudra ici et on en pensera ce que l'on voudra, mais parlant pour la province de Québec, et mon discours est destiné à la province, je ne crains pas de dire que si le peuple français a conservé de la vitalité, cela n'est pas dû aux employés des manufactures, mais c'est dû aux braves cultivateurs, aux braves colons; aussi ce sont ceux-là qu'il faut protéger d'abord.

On veut prétendre que les manufactures seraient ruinées si nous adoptions la réciprocité. Je ne le pense pas. Un grand nombre, dans tous les cas, ne le seraient pas. Je pourrais citer l'industrie du coton, des lainages, les manufactures de cigares, de cuir, de chaussures, de papier, de pianos, d'orgues, d'instruments aratoires, de meubles, de fromage, les moulins à farine, les raffineries de sucre, de caoutchouc, la confection des hardes, et d'un grand nombre d'autres articles qui sont aujourd'hui assez puissantes pour résister à la compétition des Etats-Unis.

Mais, M. l'Orateur, on nous dit: les manufactures canadiennes vont être ruinées, et vous allez voir cinq millions d'Américains venir ici s'emparer du pays. M. l'Orateur, cinq millions d'Américains, je les aime tout autant que les Métonites. Je les aime tout autant que ces races abruties que l'on nous amène quelquefois de l'autre côté de l'Atlantique. Qu'il en vienne cinq, dix, quinze millions même des Etats-Unis ; qu'ils viennent prendre nos terres et nos manufactures et s'associer avec nous dans le travail de la prospérité, j'en serai fort aise ; cela donnera un marché pour les produits de notre agriculture et de nos manufactures. Je ne demande pas mieux que de voir venir vers nous ce peuple intelligent, ce peuple de génie qui prospère si rapidement qu'il en fait l'étonnement du monde entier. Il y a parmi nous de petites manufactures, ou même de grandes manufactures qui ne peuvent vivre qu'en donnant de petits salaires et qu'au moyen de "combines" et en pressurant pour ainsi dire l'acheteur, il vaut autant qu'elles disparaissent. Je voudrais qu'il s'établisse ici des manufactures de tout genre, correspondant aux besoins des localités, qui prospéreraient tout en faisant la richesse des diverses localités.

Du reste, les manufactures, c'est un peu comme l'eau de la rivière ; cela suit son cours. Quand il y en a besoin quelque part, il s'en établit. Quand nous serons en communication avec les Etats-Unis, nous serons sûrs d'avoir des capitalistes qui viendront aider le talent et le génie de nos jeunes gens pour établir des manufactures, les asseoir sur des bases solides, et répandre ça et là la richesse dans nos campagnes. Nous avons la matière première ; nous avons les pouvoirs d'eau ; nous avons tout ce qu'il faut pour cela. J'ai entendu avec plaisir les honorables députés des deux côtés de la Chambre dire fréquemment que l'homme pour l'homme nous ne craignons pas les Etats-Unis. Eh bien ! si vous ne craignez pas les Etats-Unis l'homme pour l'homme, ouvrez donc vos portes. Si l'homme pour l'homme nous sommes capables de lutter avec les Etats-Unis, laissez donc venir à nous leur argent. Vous avez la matière première, les pouvoirs d'eau, et l'énergie de vos enfants. Alors appelez en compétition les citoyens des Etats-Unis pour assurer le progrès et le succès de chacun.

On nous dit, M. l'Orateur, que le libre-échange, c'est bon quand un pays est devenu riche, énormément riche. A-t-on bien songé qu'il ne s'agit pas de libre-échange ici ? Les Etats-Unis ne sont pas libre-échangistes. Il s'agit de nous associer aux Etats-Unis pour nous protéger contre le reste du monde. Il s'agit de nous associer à soixante millions d'âmes et avec eux de nous protéger par un tarif commun contre les pays contre lesquels nous aurons intérêt à nous protéger. Le vrai principe qu'il y a à suivre dans cette circonstance, c'est le principe ordinaire, c'est de produire et de vendre à profit autant que possible et d'acheter à aussi bas prix que possible.

Il y a encore bien d'autres avantages qui peuvent être retirés d'un traité de réciprocité. Nous éviterions les querelles de douane, qui, à un moment donné peuvent prendre de grandes proportions. Nous éviterions le danger que nos chemins de fer soient boycottés et que le trafic leur soit refusé aux Etats-Unis. Où en serait le Grand Tronc si aujourd'hui les Etats-Unis disaient : vous ne passerez plus chez nous ; vous ne transporterez plus d'effets chez nous. Où en serait même le Pacifique ? Où en seraient nos autres voies ferrées ? Nous éviterions aussi de voir arrêter notre commerce de transit. Les Etats-Unis peuvent à un moment donné nous dire : vous ne passerez plus vos effets chez nous en transit, à moins de payer des droits de douane énormes. En outre, nos compagnies d'assurance pourraient probablement faire des affaires considérables aux Etats-Unis. Pourquoi plusieurs d'entre elles ont-elles succombé en entraînant dans leur chute la ruine d'un grand nombre de familles ? Pourquoi ? C'est parce que leur champ d'opération n'était pas assez large ? Eh bien ! ouvrons-leur le champ des Etats-Unis ; offrons-leur le commerce avec soixante millions d'âmes, et alors nous leur donnerons un champ immense où ils auront l'avantage de faire fructifier leur argent.

Nous donnerons encore une impulsion à notre commerce maritime. Si à un moment donné nous ne pouvons plus avoir accès au commerce maritime des Etats-Unis pour la simple gloriole de leur refuser le commerce maritime chez nous, nous pouvons calculer les millions qui seraient perdus. Mais on est toujours à dire que le Canada est riche, qu'il est grand, qu'il est puissant ? Où est-elle donc cette richesse ? Parcourez un peu nos campagnes ; allez dans nos paroisses nouvelles, qu'est-ce que vous voyez ? Un nombre immense de maisons sur lesquelles il y a un écriteau : partis pour les Etats-Unis. Pourquoi vont-ils aux Etats-Unis ? C'est pour travailler pendant deux ou trois ans ou plus, pour gagner de l'argent, payer les terres et d'autres dettes et revenir vivre sur la terre que l'on a été obligé de laisser. On laisse le pays parce que la culture n'y paie pas ; et la culture n'y paie pas parce qu'il n'y a pas de débouché, parce qu'il n'y a pas de marché pour le cultivateur. Cette prospérité, elle peut être bien belle pour une centaine de manufacturiers qui se combinent ensemble pour exploiter le public ; elle peut être bien belle pour des magnats de chemins de fer, pour des entrepreneurs du gouvernement, mais je dis que pour le peuple elle n'existe pas ; pour le peuple qui travaille, pour le peuple qui se lève avec l'aurore, et qui se couche après le soleil et qui travaille toute la journée, cette prospérité n'existe pas.

Plusieurs honorables DÉPUTÉS : Oh ! oh !

M. AMYOT : Peut-être que ces messieurs n'aiment pas que l'on parle le français dans cette Chambre. Si c'est cela, on ferait aussi bien de le dire.

M. GAUDET : Au contraire, on aime ça.

M. AMYOT : If those gentlemen do not wish to hear one speak French, let them say so, and let them not be sneering at people who speak so. Let them remember that there is a province called the province of Quebec, where we speak French, and they have to pass through that province to communicate with England. We want to be respected here as we respect others. We have the patience to sit here months and months listening to English speeches and we do it with deference and pleasure and we expect others to do the same to us.

La première objection que l'on fait à la réciprocité c'est que les revenus diminueront et qu'il faudra recourir à la taxe directe. M. l'Orateur, je nie cela. Les revenus diminueront un peu sans doute pendant la première année, peut-être durant la deuxième, mais si j'en crois l'honorable député de Muskoka (M. O'Brien), nous n'avons pas grand chose à perdre. Il nous a dit cette après-midi que nous ne commerçons pas du tout avec les Etats-Unis ; que cela ne vaut pas la peine de s'en occuper. Cependant d'autres viennent nous dire : vous allez réduire les revenus ; on a commencé par dire de sept millions, et on a monté à quinze millions et peut-être que si la discussion durait encore quinze jours, on arriverait à 40 ou 50 millions, c'est-à-dire que nous perdrons le double de ce que sont nos revenus actuels.

Eh bien ! nos revenus diminueront un peu, mais ne conçoit-on pas que lorsque l'on entre en relation avec un peuple qui est à se demander par quel moyen il peut dépenser ses revenus, qui ne voit pas de remède à son progrès matériel, que nos achats avec les autres pays, que nos moyens de ressources augmenteraient, qu'ils décuplèrent et centuplèrent bientôt, et que nous pourrions commencer à diminuer un peu cette dette effrayante que nous avons contractée depuis quelques années dans un but que j'indiquerai tout à l'heure. Nous pourrions aussi diminuer les dépenses. Ainsi par exemple, en subventionnant à la veille des élections, quarante ou cinquante chemins de fer de moins ; en achetant quarante ou cinquante comtés de moins. Disons que l'on se déciderait pour une fois à aller devant le peuple les mains vides, simplement avec des arguments, et la vérité des faits ; on sauverait ainsi des dépenses considérables. Ah ! il y a bien des manières de diminuer les dépenses, et si les honorables messieurs qui siègent sur les banquettes ministérielles ne savent pas comment y arriver ils n'ont qu'à s'adresser à la gauche et à lui donner leur place, et je suis certain qu'elle trouvera bien moyen de résoudre cette objection. Les dépenses pourraient être diminuées encore pour les douanes qui existent entre les deux pays. Naturellement, il pourrait exister une ligne de prévention contre les fraudes; cette ligne devra être maintenue.

Mais il y a un moyen dont l'efficacité ne peut être niée : c'est de limiter nos dépenses à nos revenus. Nous tâcherons de mettre à profit l'expérience de la vie ordinaire sur ce point. Puis avec le peuple des Etats-Unis, avec de bons associés nous ferons de bonnes affaires et augmenterons suffisamment nos revenus pour satisfaire à nos besoins. Ainsi bientôt cette objection disparaîtrait. La deuxième objection qui est faite est bien plus sérieuse, et ce formule à peu près en ces termes : nous serions injustes envers l'Angleterre. J'ai entendu l'honorable député de Muskoka, (M. O'Brien), nous représenter l'Angleterre comme une bonne mère et nous du Canada, comme des petits-enfants bercés et dorlotés sur les genoux de la bonne maman. Eh bien ! nous allons voir ce qu'elle a fait pour nous, cette bonne maman. Je vais maintenant, M. l'Orateur, pour vous édifier et édifier le pays là-dessus, avoir le plaisir de citer un peu longuement, il est vrai, — mais enfin il faut que ces choses-là soient connues, — une brochure, dont la reproduction, j'en suis sûr, fera plaisir au cœur de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat (M. Chapleau), puisqu'elle vient d'un homme qui mérite toute son estime ; d'un homme qui a longtemps guidé le parti conservateur dans les élections ; d'un homme dont la plume est aussi abondante que le cœur est généreux.

Je suis certain que l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat reverra avec plaisir ces belles pages ; qu'il sera heureux de voir que les écrits de son ami de cœur, auront été cités devant cette Chambre. Cet ami porte le nom de Arthur Dansereau ; et la brochure qui a pour titre : "Protection et libre-échange," a été publiée en 1879. C'est avec cette brochure qu'on allait devant les électeurs à cette époque, et c'est avec cette brochure que nous y retournerons.

Je dis donc que l'honorable député de Muskoka fait un reproche au traité de réciprocité d'être injuste envers l'Angleterre, "cette bonne maman." Or, voyons ce que disait M. Dansereau, au nom du parti conservateur, et j'attire spécialement là-dessus l'attention de mes amis de la province de Québec qui ont comme moi des aspirations vers le véritable bien être de leur pays : —

Nous irons plus loin, puisque nous sommes en frais d'explications. Nous ferons à l'Angleterre le respectueux reproche de ne pas s'occuper de nous dans ses relations diplomatiques. Elle nous sacrifie constamment en tout et partout. Est-ce qu'elle songe à nous dans ses traités de commerce par exemple ? Si l'Angleterre avait été plus généreuse sous ce rapport, si elle nous avait favorisés comme elle a tâché de se favoriser elle-même dans ses relations commerciales avec le monde entier, peut-être ne serait-il pas question aujourd'hui de tarif protecteur en Canada

Je pourrais ajouter : peut-être ne serait-il pas question de réciprocité en Canada.

C'est quand nous avons vu les marchés de tous les pays se fermer même aux produits naturels du Canada que nous nous sommes demandés ce qu'il nous restait à faire. Autrefois, l'agriculture, la forêt et les industries qui en découlent nous suffisaient. Nous n'aurions peut-être jamais eu l'idée d'aller au delà, si l'on nous avait donné la chance d'en vivre. Mais l'Angleterre n'ayant pensé qu'à elle, le Canada a fini par se trouver à la porte de tous les pays, n'ayant plus rien à leur vendre, mais devant tout acheter d'eux. La pauvreté, l'épuisement nous a amenés à la conclusion la plus simple : prendre notre cause en mains, et travailler d'abord pour nous.

De plus, M. l'Orateur, avec la bienveillante permission de la Chambre, je communiquerai une liste des articles qui sont donnés par M. Dansereau, sur lesquels il donne les droits payés par les nations européennes, sur le marché français, et les droits différentiels contre le Canada :

Les marchandises canadiennes sont soumises à la frontière de chacun des Etats du continent européen à des droits différentiels contre le Canada qui équivalent à la prohibition directe pour une bonne partie de nos produits et à ce qui ne vaut pas mieux que la prohibition pour plusieurs autres articles. Ainsi, tandis que les producteurs de l'Allemagne, de l'Italie, de l'Espagne, du Portugal, de la Suisse, de l'Autriche, de la Suède, de la Norvège, de la Hollande, de la Belgique, de la France et de l'Angleterre peuvent échanger leurs marchandises à des conditions raisonnables, le Canada est virtuellement mis dans l'impossibilité de vendre ses produits dans ces divers pays et ne peut avoir accès à un marché qui alimente 200,000,000 de consommateurs, grâce à un tarif différentiel qui équivaut à la protection.

M. AMYOT,

En prenant pour exemple le tarif français qui se répète dans tous les pays de l'Europe, nous trouvons que les produits du Canada sont prohibés comme suit :

Je puis dire ici, que lorsque l'Angleterre a fait son traité avec la France, cette dernière lui demanda : mais n'allez-vous pas y inclure le Canada ? et l'Angleterre répondit : non, le Canada s'arrangera comme il le voudra. C'est une accusation grave, M. l'Orateur, mais je la porte de mon siège, devant cette Chambre. Et parmi ceux qui m'écoutent, il y en a qui connaissent les faits. C'est une profonde humiliation pour nous de voir que l'Angleterre, quand elle fait des traités avec les autres pays, refuse d'y associer le Canada ; refuse de nous donner la chance qu'elle donne aux autres colonies.

Et M. Dansereau continue :

Un des représentants canadiens à la dernière exposition de Paris, exposait comme suit il y a quelques mois dans les journaux, le résultat de cette politique destructive. Après avoir cité le texte que nous venons de donner plus haut, il disait :

" Cette liste affligeante, déjà trop convaincante, pourrait être continuée de manière à démontrer que chaque homme d'affaires de notre pays en est affecté.

" De fait, nos exposants à Paris ont pu constater par expérience jusqu'à quel point le commerce canadien est affecté par ces droits différentiels. M. Malcolm, de Toronto s'est vu obligé de refuser pour ses selles de qualité très supérieure des commandes qui lui étaient offertes par les sportsmen français, parce que venant du Canada, sa marchandise se trouvait prohibée, tandis que celle de ses compétiteurs plus favorisés, des autres pays, n'avaient à payer que dix pour cent de droit. Une des maisons les plus importantes de Paris faisant le commerce des habilements confectionnés, avait l'intention de commander 6,000 pièces de tweed canadien, mais on dut lui dire que les tweeds du Canada étaient prohibés, quoique les produits similaires des autres pays fussent admis moyennant un droit de dix pour cent. De nombreuses commandes ont été données pour des instruments aratoires. Sur l'une de ces commandes, consistant en 1,000 faucheuses et moissonneuses, M. Elliot, de London, Ont., aura à payer un droit différentiel de $12,400 contre $4,000 qu'aurait eu à payer un manufacturier de n'importe quel pays de l'Europe.

Cette exclusion du Canada dans les traités de la Grande-Bretagne avec les puissances européennes est d'autant plus extraordinaire que des faveurs de ce genre ont été accordées, à la demande de l'Angleterre, pour les laines de l'Australie, de la Nouvelle-Zélande et du Cap de Bonne Espérance, ainsi que pour le jute des Indes qui sont les principaux produits de ces pays.

Les autres pays n'ont pas oublié, eux, d'inclure leurs colonies dans les traités. La France, dans son traité de commerce et de navigation avec l'Angleterre, a stipulé en même temps pour l'Algérie dont les produits sont soumis au même traitement que ceux de la France continentale.

A propos de ce dernier traité voici un article dont la portée ne peut échapper au lecteur attentif :

Le traité franco-espagnol concerne les produits de l'Espagne continentale aussi bien que des îles Baléares et des Canaries.

Le traité avec le Portugal bénéficie aux produits des colonies et des établissements lointains du Portugal ; et à ceux des îles Madère, de Porto Santo et de l'archipel des Açores.

Dans les différents traités de la Turquie sont compris non-seulement la Turquie d'Europe et d'Asie, mais aussi la Serbie, les principautés de Moldavie et de Valachie, l'Égypte et la Régence de Tripoli, en Afrique.

D'autres nations, telles que la Hollande ont aussi inclues leurs colonies dans leurs traités de commerce et de navigation avec l'Angleterre et la France, et c'est encore à ces conditions que se négocient actuellement les nouveaux projets de traités.

Mais il y a plus : dans le traité de commerce entre l'Angleterre et la Belgique, en date du 28 juillet 1862, l'article 15e est ainsi conçu : “ Les produits belges ne seront pas assujétis, dans les colonies anglaises, à des droits plus élevés que ceux qui sont imposés sur les produits similaires anglais.”

Qu'est-ce que cela signifie ? Tout simplement que l'Angleterre impose à ses colonies l'obligation de recevoir les produits des pays étrangers aux mêmes conditions que les produits similaires anglais. Ne pourrait-elle pas également faire participer ses colonies aux bénéfices qui découlent de ses traités avec ces mêmes puissances ?

En étudiant cet état de choses, l'on se convaincrait donc facilement que la politique suivie a été la politique de chacun pour soi. Puisqu'il en est ainsi, puisque personne ne nous tend la main, il nous faut donc “ veiller nous-mêmes à nos affaires.” Tous les ans nous restons en dette de quinze ou vingt millions. Cette pratique nous a ruinés ; il faut changer de tactique et de régime, et voilà pourquoi n'ayant pas été admis aux bénéfices du libre-échange que l'Angleterre pratique pour elle seulement avec les autres puissances, nous sommes devenus forcément protectionnistes.

Le gouvernement anglais, qui comprend bien la position, n'hésite pas à nous donner toute latitude à ce sujet. C'est à nous à en profiter. Il y a bien assez d'autres questions à propos desquelles notre état colonial nous impose ou nous imposera d'autres sacrifices. Ainsi, ne sommes-nous pas constamment exposés à faire, pour le bien général de l'empire, des concessions qui peuvent être parfois onéreuses ; à l'exemple de la Nouvelle-Zélande, qui a contracté une dette de $20,000,000 pour soutenir une guerre déclarée par l'Angleterre et avec laquelle la colonie n'avait rien à faire.

En 1864, la surprise des maraudeurs de Saint-Albans nous coûta quelque $60,000, que les États-Unis réclamèrent de nous pour n'avoir pas su surveiller notre frontière. En 1868, l'invasion fénienne nous coûta un million et demi, que l'Angleterre aurait pu réclamer des États-Unis, en vertu du même principe que les Américains auraient dû garder leurs frontières. Les fénians étaient tous sujets américains ; ils s'étaient organisés ouvertement dans les limites de la république américaine, avaient acheté leurs armes dans les États-Unis. Ils étaient beaucoup plus sous le contrôle de la police américaine que ne l'était l'Alabama en pleine mer, et cependant, jamais l'Angleterre n'a réclamé un sou pour nous des États-Unis, parce que les intérêts de l'empire l'exigeaient.

Lors du traité de Washington il a fallu consentir dans le but de contribuer au succès de la diplomatie anglaise, à ouvrir nos pêcheries, nos fleuves et nos canaux aux Américains. Nous l'avons fait sans nous plaindre, et quoique nous soyons déçus dans l'usage des canaux américains que nous devions obtenir en retour l'Angleterre ne croit pas devoir travailler à amener les Américains à des idées plus larges. En 1783, les Américains ne demandaient que la navigation de la rivière Saint-Jean ; mais la mère-patrie les a accoutumés à obtenir tout ce qu'ils ont voulu avoir. Quand il fut question d'interpréter le traité de 1814, dont les Américains n'étaient pas contents, l'Angleterre en passa facilement par la décision du Czar et consentit à échanger le Canada, en nous faisant perdre une partie du Maine. Mais quand il fut connu que le roi des Pays Bas, l'arbitre choisi par la convention de 1824, pour une nouvelle interprétation du traité de 1783, relativement aux frontières, s'était prononcé contre les États-Unis, ceux-ci refusèrent d'accepter sa décision et continuèrent à taquiner l'Angleterre jusqu'à ce qu'elle leur eût lâché 8,000,000 d'acres. Par le traité de 1782 seulement, elle a cédé aux États-Unis plus de deux cent soixante millions d'acres de terre dans l'Ouest.

Voilà trois fois que l'Angleterre a consenti à tracer la ligne de Pembina. Par le traité de 1814, les États-Unis prirent sur eux de vendre en 1824 la Colombie-Anglaise. Il fallut alors en venir au traité de 1842, en vertu duquel les Américains réclamèrent de nouveau, et nous ne saurions dire s'ils ne nous enlèveront pas encore quelque large portion de territoire, car il faut constamment recourir à de nouvelles commissions. Après les millions et les millions d'acres de terre depuis le Pacifique jusqu'aux grands lacs, y compris l'Oregon, le Wisconsin, etc., après Pembina, l'île St. Juan, ce peut être autre chose.

Ce n'est certes pas dans un but hostile que nous exposons ces faits. Nous voulons tout simplement démontrer que si l'Angleterre fait des sacrifices pour nous, nous en faisons aussi quelques-uns pour elle et nous ne nous en vantons pas, pas plus que nous nous en plaignons. Ce qui est fait est fait ; si cela était nécessaire à la consolidation de la puissance britannique, nous sommes contents d'avoir pu le faire et n'en parlons plus. Mais de grâce, que l'on soit un peu plus discret de l'autre côté de l'océan. Qu'on nous laisse relever nos affaires, comme nous l'entendons. La récente tentative de M. Bright et des fabricants anglais est d'un égoïsme révoltant. Pourquoi veulent-ils nous forcer à aller acheter chez eux, lorsqu'eux ne se gênent pas d'aller acheter leur bois, par exemple, en Norvège ou en Russie ?

L'Angleterre semble s'être étudiée à aller acheter du bois partout ailleurs qu'en Canada. Le tableau suivant en dit long :

Si l'Angleterre tient tant à l'union commerciale avec ses colonies, ne pourrait-il pas donner l'exemple !

Maintenant on vient nous parler aujourd'hui des avantages que l'Angleterre peut nous offrir. Mais quand y a-t-elle songé ? Quelle est la voix autorisée qui dit que l'Angleterre est prête à faire quelque chose pour nous ? Quel est le ministre anglais qui nous le dit ? M. Chamberlain nous dit le contraire. Il s'écrie : si vous voulez commercer avec les États-Unis faites-le, vous êtes libres, le lien qui vous uni à l'Angleterre est bien faible.

L'Angleterre, vu le mouvement qui se fait ici et aux États-Unis, commerce-t-elle à nous ouvrir un peu son cœur ? Je n'en vois pas d'indices. Est-ce par amour pour nous qu'elle nous a imposé, sans nous consulter, le sacrifice d'une des plus belles parties de notre domaine ? Sur ce point je défie la contradiction. N'est-il pas vrai que par le traité d'Ashburton on a volé au Canada une des plus belles parties de son territoire pour le donner au peuple voisin qui venait de se séparer de la métropole ? N'est-il pas vrai que le traité d'Ashburton est un vol commis par l'Angleterre au dépens de sa colonie ? Il y a encore le fait que nous venons d'avoir une conférence à Washington, où on a donné ordre à l'honorable ministre des finances de sacrifier nos pêcheries. Ces pêcheries valaient, il y a quelques années, $4,500,000 pour une certaine période. Ces pêcheries, pour lesquelles nous avons combattu si longtemps, il a été donné ordre, j'en suis certain, nous en avons la preuve quasi-officielle, il a été donné ordre aux plénipotentiaires de les sacrifier pour éviter la guerre. L'Angleterre, cette bonne maman à la tête de 350,000,000 d'âmes, l'Angleterre si puissante a dit à ses plénipotentiaires : allez à Washington, et pour éviter que mes soldats fassent le coup de feu avec les États-Unis, vous leur donnerez les pêcheries du Canada. Il a bien fallu s'exécuter. Voilà la bonne maman qui prend le député de Muskoka (M. O'Brien) sur ses genoux et qui le dorlotte ! Mais qu'il écoute donc un peu les grands enfants qui sont de l'autre côté de l'Atlantique auprès de la bonne maman ; que disent-ils du député de Muskoka et des Canadiens en général : “ You are mere colonists.” Vous êtes de simples coloniaux. Voilà le respect que l'on a pour nous. On nous considère comme des enfants élevés à la cuisine, comme des enfants d'une autre famille ; voilà ceux pour lesquels on veut aujourd'hui sacrifier le bonheur du Canada. Quand un Canadien va en Angleterre, on le regarde avec mépris et on lui lance cette épithète : You are a colonist.

M. l'Orateur, nous faisons des offres aux Etats-Unis, mais je dis que ce sont des offres futiles ; ce ne sont pas des offres sérieuses. La force de l'opinion, le résultat brillant de l'élection d'hier et de l'élection de Missisquoi il y a quelques jours, le sentiment populaire sont tels que ceux qui vivent d'abord pour le pouvoir,—et c'est bien naturel dans le monde, paraît-il,—ceux-là ont été effrayés. Ils ont aussi été éveillés par la voix éloquente de mon honorable ami le député de Northumberland (M. Mitchell), c'est sur son avertissement solennel qu'ils se sont décidés de dégager l'honneur du pays et de passer cet ordre en conseil, auquel ils étaient tenus par le statut de 1879. Je regrette pour mon pays, je regrette pour la Puissance du Canada, pour notre drapeau que l'on ait le triste courage de mettre dans un statut des offres à une grande nation pour ensuite se moquer d'elle.

Mais si quelqu'un aux Etats-Unis peut entendre la voix du parlement du Canada, il saura qu'il y a, dans ce parlement, un grand nombre de députés qui protestent contre cette conduite, qui sont indignés de la négligence du gouvernement, qui sont indignés du refus de dégager la parole donnée. Des centaines de millions de piastres peut-être ont été engagées par les Etats-Unis sur la foi d'un statut. C'est une supercherie de notre part ; nous le déplorons autant que nous le pouvons. Je rends hommage au député de Northumberland (M. Mitchell) qui représente un beau parti en cette Chambre, d'avoir, le premier, élevé la voix, et je rends hommage aussi à l'opposition de l'avoir secondé. Je suis heureux de voir que le peuple du Canada va enfin pouvoir élever la tête et dire au peuple américain : si vous avez été trompés, ce n'est pas notre faute à nous tous.

M. l'Orateur, dès 1869, il était question du traité de réciprocité, et dans un document que j'ai en main—je ne sais pas s'il a déjà été cité ; c'est un document du 3 septembre 1868, signé par John Rose, ministre des finances,—il était dit :

"In conclusion, the undersigned trusts that as the circumstances of political exigency and the important national considerations which, as stated by Her Majesty's Government, led to the concluding of the former Treaty of Reciprocity with the United States, still exist—and even in a greater degree than previous to the date of that Treaty—and as the interest of Canada continue to be seriously affected, Her Majesty's Government will not refuse to give the same weight to these considerations as before ; and that in any future negotiations between Canada and the United States, in reference to their trade relations, the Dominion will receive the cooperation and influence of Her Majesty's Government."

Cependant, M. l'Orateur, quelques mois après que voyons-nous ? C'était fort bien pour la montre ; mais quelques mois après, le 4 janvier 1869, nous trouvons une lettre signée par l'honorable premier ministre actuel dans laquelle il dit : il faut attendre que les Etats-Unis fassent le premier pas. Tout de même, dans ce temps-là, on pouvait dire que la réciprocité était bonne sans, pour cela, passer pour rebelle. Voici les paroles mêmes de Sir John Macdonald le 4 janvier 1869 :

"Should the United States Government express any desire for the renewal of the treaty, Canada will be prepared to send a delegation to Washington to act in concert with the British Ambassador on the subject. Meanwhile, Council think that it would be unwise for Canada to make any statements in advance of what she will be willing to do, and that the negotiations should be entered upon at Washington, without either party being hampered by any previous engagement or offers of any kind."

Mais je n'ai pas besoin d'aller si loin pour voir les offres que nous faisons aux Etats-Unis, au sujet de la réciprocité. Il me suffirait de rappeler la séance de cette après-midi, alors que l'honorable ministre des finances (sir Charles Tupper) qui jouit de l'estime générale, déclarait que, d'après lui, ce qui était contenu dans un statut même sous forme facultative, était impératif de nation à nation. Il nous a dit, de plus, que c'était le désir des deux grands partis politiques du pays d'avoir la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. D'un autre côté nous voyons nos voisins, le chef du gouvernement (sir John A. Macdonald) nous dire formellement tout le contraire ; nous déclarer que la réciprocité serait ruineuse pour nous. Eh bien ! qu'est-ce qui vient de se passer ? Le 31 mars 1887, M. Bayard écrit :

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Ceci, M. l'Orateur, était adressé à sir Charles Tupper, et que répond ce dernier ?

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

On ne veut donc pas les régler, ces difficultés des pêcheries ? Voici le ministre des finances qui nous dit qu'il n'y a qu'un moyen pour les régler : c'est de régler en même temps toutes nos relations commerciales. Comme de raison on ne donne pas dans ces lettres les détails du projet ; cela ne se fait jamais ainsi ; mais on y énonce un principe, on y jette la base d'un arrangement ou traité. Ainsi, d'un côté on nous dit que la réciprocité est impossible, qu'elle nous ruinerait, et l'on trouve toutes espèces d'excuses, et de subterfuges pour ne pas l'obtenir. Mais d'un autre côté il y a division, dans le ministère même, certains ministres désirant la réciprocité. Mais voyons ce qu'a fait l'honorable ministre des finances (sir Charles Tupper) avant son départ de Washington à la suite de la confection du projet de traité concernant les pêcheries. Il a fait une dernière offre, le 3 décembre 1887 :

"That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the Fishery Articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

Ainsi, M. l'Orateur, vous voyez que je n'ai pas besoin de remonter bien loin pour trouver que nous voulons presque tous la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. Malheureusement, l'honorable ministre des finances a fait ces offres, il les a faites tout en ayant probablement reçu instruction de livrer quand même nos pêcheries. On avait déjà livré la navigation du Saint-Laurent ; nous en avons pour garant la parole de l'honorable premier ministre ; on nous avait antérieurement dépouillés d'une partie de notre domaine ; il restait à sacrifier nos pêcheries. Qu'est-ce qu'elle ne nous ôtera pas, cette bonne maman du député de Muskoka, puisqu'elle nous ôte nos terres, notre poisson et notre navigation ? Viendra-t-elle aussi nous ôter notre pain et nos enfants ? Quelqu'un en a peut-être le projet.

J'attirerai l'attention de cette Chambre sur l'importance qu'il y a pour le gouvernement d'agir bien sincèrement dans l'application de la loi de 1879. Je trouve dans le "Bradstreets' Journal" publié à New-York, pour l'année 1887, les statistiques suivantes.

L'importation des principaux articles de commerce pendant les trois dernières années fiscales apparaissent au tableau suivant :

Ces chiffres font voir l'énorme quantité d'effets que nous vendons aux Etats-Unis et que nous ne pourrions pas vendre si les droits prévus par l'acte de 1879 n'étaient pas enlevés.

Je pourrais encore vous parler du traité de réciprocité proposé par l'honorable George Brown, car il est connu de tous que depuis que le traité de réciprocité a pris fin, tout le monde, tous les partis politiques, comme le disait l'honorable ministre des finances, ont demandé la réciprocité. Mais vous me demanderez pourquoi nous ne l'avons pas puisque tout le monde le désire... C'est ici que j'attire spécialement l'attention de la Chambre, c'est encore l'honorable premier ministre qui va m'en fournir la véritable cause.

Vous avez entendu parler depuis quelque temps, M. l'Orateur, de ce grand projet de fédération impériale. Vous avez vu des assemblées se tenir à Toronto; il doit y en avoir une bientôt ici, à Ottawa, et même il y a une proposition à ce sujet sur les ordres de cette Chambre. Or, que disait Sir John A. Macdonald, à Montréal, le 24 novembre 1875. Voici ce qu'il disait, et je le lirai en anglais afin que tous les honorables députés puissent le comprendre :

"Gentlemen, I look forward to a permanent union, and I look forward to it not as a mere Utopian speculation, but as the practical result of our connection with Great Britain. It is not an idea of to-day; and if you would so favor me, if you think it worth your while to look over the debates on Confederation in 1865 at Quebec, you will find that what I am now stating to you I stated then as being the hoped for future of Canada. It is this:—That England would be the central power (applause), and we auxiliary nations; that Canada, as one Confederation, would by degrees have less of dependence and more of alliance than at present; and that we would be all united under the same sovereign, all owing allegiance to the same Crown, and all inspired by the same British spirit; and that we would have a close alliance, offensive and defensive. You see now the progress of events in carrying out this scheme. You see South Africa about to form a great Confederation. The position of the Australian Colonies is such, strewn as they are around the edge of that vast continent, that they may not be able to form a Confederation so closely allied as our Provinces of Canada, but a Zollverein and arrangements by Treaty amongst themselves, by which their quota of land and sea forces, and their several subsidies for the purpose of doing their share in the defence of the Empire is quite probable. Now, gentlemen, twenty-five years is but as a day in the life time of a nation; let us go on as peacefully and happily as we are now going on, and twenty-five years, I fully except, should see the solution of that question. Great Britain, by that time, will have forty millions; Canada, ten millions; Australia, her millions; and these latter with South Africa, capable of unlimited extension; and New Zealand, nearly as large as England, will be separate auxiliary countries, all ranged around the Central Power, England. I do not look for Colonial representation in the Imperial Parliament, because the Imperial Parliament, with such representation, would claim the right of taxation, but I look for the alliance of these auxiliary Powers with the Central Government under Treaty arrangements similar to the existing arrangement between England and Canada. The arrangement at this moment is that we are pledged to expend a certain sum of money on our militia in response and return for the pledge obtained from England that the whole military power of the Empire shall be used for our defence; make an extension of that arrangement by providing that the Central Power shall contribute so much, that each of the auxiliary nations shall give their quota; and then when any nation goes to war with England she will go to war with half a dozen nations. (Hear, hear, and applause.) It will give an assurance of peace to the world, and it will give an assurance of peace to us when it is known that if one extremity of the vast British Empire is attacked, British subjects and soldiery from every extremity of it will rush to the rescue. (Hear, hear.) Then, gentlemen, so powerful will be England that she will be safe from all attack (applause), and instead of being a source of anxiety and a source of weakness to the British Empire, we will find ourselves standing by our grand old mother, become a defence, a fortification, an outwork, instead of being a weakness and a source of expense. (Cheers; hear, hear and prolonged applause.) Remember, too, that Canada has already the fourth commercial navy in the world, and a large population of hardy seamen, and that all the Sister Colonies I have named must, from their position, become Maritime Powers. So that the Sovereignty of the Seas seems assured for all time to this United Empire. To this I look forward. It is a grand scheme, and it is a scheme quite capable of being carried into practical operation, and when carried out, gentlemen, it will not be too much to expect that the great nation, our congeners on the other side of the line, seeing that all the different peoples who speak the English language, but themselves, are formed into one great nation, as it were, for the purpose of operating as a moral police, and of keeping the peace of the world—it will not be too much to hope and expect that our congeners, speaking the same language, and being of the same race, will assist in the great work of keeping the peace of the world, and if necessary, gentlemen, of enforcing it. [Applause]. Gentlemen, in the great war, when Napoleon, by the power of his arms, had forced the nations of Europe to close their ports against England and English shipping, even then, gentlemen, although England's colonies were few and feeble, she fought that battle, and carried it to a victorious conclusion, and drove the tyrant from his throne, with the aid of the domestic commerce she had with her own colonies. And when all these become great nations, having one head, and being one people, and having one interest, England if all Europe were in arms against her, with her trade, her commerce, and her wealth, with the waves rolling about her feet, would be still secure, living in her children, and her children blessed in her. [Loud and continued applause]. One word more. While independence is generally annexation in disguise, some speculative philosophers, who look into the distant future, seem to believe that it will be our fate and our advantage to walk alone as a separate nationality. Mr. Goldwin Smith is one of those. I would fain hope that the future that I desire for the empire and its auxiliary kingdoms, might strike his imagination and be accepted as a substitute for independence. If this policy could only enlist his magic pen in its behalf, it would be an infinite benefit to the good cause."

Voilà le secret de la situation. L'honorable premier ministre nous dit que dès l'origine de la Confédération il a voulu annexer le Canada à l'Angleterre; il a voulu annexer toutes les colonies anglaises à l'Angleterre et faire ce qu'il appelle aujourd'hui la fédération impériale. De sorte que quand la bonne maman viendra en guerre, elle appellera tous ses petits enfants du Canada et d'ailleurs, et elle leur dira : venez combattre pour moi, mes petits enfants. Elle dira à ses bons petits fils des colonies : souscrivez pour me défendre, moi, votre bonne maman. Voilà la portée du projet de la fédération impériale; c'est pour y arriver que les Canadiens vont être privés de commercer avec soixante millions d'âmes. Eh bien ! quant à moi je déclare que je ne suis pas pour cette fédération impériale, et je crois que mon comté partage mes vues. Nous ne voulons pas épouser les querelles de l'Angleterre avec l'Irlande. Nous ne voulons pas aller combattre au delà des mers, jusqu'aux Indes, chaque fois que l'intérêt du commerce anglais l'exigera. Nous sommes chez nous, en Amérique, sur un sol de liberté, et nous entendons y rester. Que l'on ne dise pas que ce projet n'est pas sérieux. Et le gouverneur qui nous vient est reconnu comme favorable à la fédération impériale. Il porte le drapeau de cette fédération impériale, et voyez ceux qui s'agitent; voyez les principaux amis de l'honorable premier; voyez son voisin de droite (M. McCarthy). C'est un de ses hommes dévoués, son homme de confiance. Eh bien ! il l'a lancé en tête du mouvement à Toronto; il le lance ici encore dans la cité d'Ottawa; il lui fait même mettre une motion dans nos votes et délibérations. Et l'honorable premier qui est un génie politique expérimenté, je l'admets—j'ai pour lui tout le respect possible—l'honorable premier ministre qui a conçu ce projet, l'exécute à pas lents, mais sûrement. Il a commencé par annexer les provinces, la Nouvelle-Ecosse, le Nouveau-Brunswick, l'Île du Prince-Edouard, le Manitoba et le Nord-Ouest. Il a dit aux vieilles provinces : prenez 200 ou 300 millions et faites un grand chemin de fer qui reliera l'Angleterre à ses possessions de l'Asie. Nous avons fait le chemin de fer et aujourd'hui que fait-il ? Il nous dit : achetez l'Île de Terre-Neuve; elle ne vaut rien pour vous, mais prenez des millions et des millions et achetez-la, afin que nous puissions, comme un tout compact en bloc prendre le Canada et l'annexer à l'Angleterre. Et il fait venir pour couronner tout cela, d'Angleterre, un gouverneur qu'il sait favorable à la fédération impériale. Je lui reproche une chose; puisque c'est là son intention, il devrait le dire franchement et ouvertement ; il devrait avouer qu'à un moment donné il dira au Canada : tu es endetté de $100,000,000 que tu n'es pas capable de payer : l'Angleterre va les payer pour toi et va t'annexer. Voilà pourquoi le traité de réciprocité qui est désiré par les deux partis, nous dit, l'honorable ministre des finances,—désiré par tout le pays et qui ferait le bien du Canada et de l'Amérique,—voilà pourquoi, dis-je, ce traité nous est refusé. Je sais que l'esprit de parti va essayer d'empêcher ce traité de réciprocité de réussir cette fois. Je ne blâme pas les honorables députés qui ne pensent pas comme nous. Ils sont soumis à la discipline ; ils n'entendent pas autre chose que la voix de leur vieux chef ; mais il y a de ces moments solennels où les liens de parti devraient disparaître devant le bien public. Lorsque ces députés reviendront devant le peuple, peut-être que le peuple, qui, lui, a moins de liens de parti, qui a les yeux plus ouverts à ses véritables intérêts, leur répondra qu'ils ont oublié l'intérêt du pays.

Pour le moment, je le déclare à ma province et à mon pays : l'objet qu'a en vue l'honorable premier ministre c'est la fédération impériale ; il y travaille depuis vingt ans. Il achève de terminer cette chaîne de provinces avec laquelle il nous enchaînera ensuite s'il le peut ; il veut nous confédérer à l'Angleterre, il veut que nous épousions la cause de l'Angleterre. Quel rôle jouerions-nous là ? Je dénonce ce projet, et je lui dis que ce projet ne sera pas accepté par la Puissance. Il nous a dit bien souvent ces mots : Le Canada pour les Canadiens. Est-ce bien le Canada pour les Canadiens qu'il veut aujourd'hui ? Non, c'est le Canada pour l'Angleterre. Eh bien ! nous lui répondrons : non ; et s'il le veut, s'il le faut absolument, et c'est le sens des premiers mots que j'ai employés en parlant du drapeau américain,—s'il veut que le Canada soit pour l'Angleterre, nous lui dirons, nous, en réponse : le Canada pour l'Amérique.

J'avais l'intention de dire quelques mots sur les montants que nous allions perdre par le bill appelé le Retaliation Bill proposé à Washington, mais comme le gouvernement nous a déclaré cet après-midi qu'un ordre en conseil allait être publié samedi conformément à la loi de 1879, je n'en parlerai pas.

Je terminerai ces remarques, trop longues pour ceux surtout qui n'entendent pas notre langue, par deux ou trois mots de réponse à ceux qui m'ont précédé. J'espère qu'un temps viendra où les Anglais du Canada trouveront, comme les Anglais d'Angleterre, que le français est la langue de la diplomatie comme l'anglais est la langue du commerce ; qu'ils apprendront cette langue et alors nous aurons encore plus de plaisir à les rencontrer.

On est toujours à nous dire : nous avons hâte d'aller devant le peuple sur cette question de la réciprocité. Libre à eux, M. l'Orateur, ils n'ont qu'à signer un document, et nous irons de suite devant le peuple ; nous sommes prêts. Nous ne pouvons pas dissoudre les Chambres nous ; mais nous avons hâte, nous aussi, soyez-en sûrs, de consulter le peuple.

On a introduit dans la discussion l'échafaud de Régina. Ce doit être un grand génie celui qui a fait cela. Je crois que c'est encore l'honorable député de Muskoka (M. O'Brien), ce bon fils qui est tant bercé dans les bras de la maman. Un autre nous a parlé du parti national. Je puis leur dire que le parti national est né d'un mouvement du cœur, d'un mouvement patriotique. Le mouvement national, on l'a appelé d'abord un feu de paille ; il brûle encore, et que l'on ne croie pas que ceux des nationaux qui vont se détacher de nous sur la présente question sont complètement passés de l'autre côté ; ils demeurent avec nous et nous sommes tous les mêmes. Je ne voulais pas parler de cette question ici, mais puisqu'on l'a introduite j'y réponds, en disant que c'est le mouvement national qui fait augmenter les majorités dans les comtés qui nous appartenaient et qui nous en font gagner d'autres que nous n'avions pas. C'est le mouvement national qui nous a donné le pouvoir dans la province de Québec, et c'est lui qui nous donnera le pouvoir aux prochaines élections fédérales. Il est basé sur la vérité ; nous nous sommes indignés parce que nos ministres nous ont trompés et nous ont humiliés comme peuple, nous ont sacrifiés au fanatisme de quelques-uns. Mais il n'est pas question de cela dans cette affaire de réciprocité, que je n'ai pas traitée au point de vue de parti. J'en fais une affaire beaucoup plus grande que cela ; une affaire de pays, de richesse nationale. J'en fais une affaire de résistance à cette grande lutte qui commence en faveur de la fédération impériale. Il est temps que le peuple y voit ; il est temps que le Canada ait l'œil ouvert. Je le répète, on veut nous annexer à l'Angleterre en nous disant toujours : dépensez des millions, ne craignez rien, car le Canada est pour les Canadiens ; en nous affirmant toujours que nous allons nous enrichir. Voilà qu'arrive le moment où elle va s'engager, cette lutte. On nous dira : vous devez tant ; vous ne pouvez pas le payer, voici l'argent, l'Angleterre le fournit à condition que peuple et pays vous passiez de l'autre côté ; on nous livrera à l'Angleterre sous la férule de laquelle nous serions à l'avenir ; c'est ce qu'on appelle le Canada pour les Canadiens. Eh bien ! en terminant, je répète : quand l'on voudra dire le Canada pour l'Angleterre, nous répondrons : le Canada pour l'Amérique.

Mr. MASSON. A great deal of time has been occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite in trying to prove what perhaps they might have taken almost for granted, namely, that the members on this side of the House, the leaders of the present Government and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, had in times past a favorable opinion of reciprocity, and that, even at the time of the introduction of what is known as the National Policy, that was looked forward to as the thing to be aimed at, and that the National Policy was only a means to that end. I take it for granted that, at that time, all parties and all classes in this country looked forward, as a great boon to the country, to the attaining of reciprocity with the United States. There are many reasons why all classes of the various communities of which this great Dominion is composed looked to that as a very great boon. One of the principal reasons for that is that they looked back on the time of the old reciprocity from 1854 to 1866 as having on the whole been a very prosperous period, and, judging that the prosperity had been caused almost entirely, if not entirely, by the reciprocity then in force, they very naturally came to the conclusion that reciprocity would again bring about these fortunate and prosperous times. But, looking at the prosperity of those twelve years, I think it is often lost sight of that that prosperity, especially in regard to agricultural pursuits, was not due entirely to the reciprocity then in existence. During that period there were great public works being constructed in this Canada of ours ; we find that the Grand Trunk Railway was being built, that the Great Western was being built, that the nation of which we form a part—and of which we form no insignificant part, be it said—was engaged in several great wars. During the earlier part of this period we had the Crimean war ; following that, we had the East Indian mutiny ; then, shortly afterwards, our neighbors across the border were engaged in their civil war ; and all this tended to enhance the value of farm produce in this country. When we look back at those prosperous years and think only of reciprocity, we forget to take into account these great public works and these great wars which contributed more to our prosperity than the treaty itself. During this period of reciprocity, when the nation was comparatively at peace, before the effect of the Indian mutiny was felt in Canada, and after the result of the Crimean war had ceased, we find the year 1857 one of the blackest periods in the history of Canada ; indeed the oldest resident cannot recollect such an universal bankruptcy and universal distress as was felt in the year 1857, yet that year was in the very period during which this reciprocity is supposed to have been making the whole of Canada rich. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite may be pardoned for having a preconceived idea that reciprocity would be beneficial, but when they seek to bolster up these ideas by evidence, they should be careful to present it in a straightforward and honest manner, and not attempt to present only one side of the proposition, and leave the other side unrepresented, in fact almost to falsify the figures that they are quoting from. However, as that part of the subject has been so fully dealt with, I shall not attempt to go into statistics relating to it, but I will try for a few minutes to show what I consider has been the effect of the National Policy on the agricultural interest of the country. Now, when we advocated the National Policy, we are often charged with having made the assertion that the adoption of a protective tariff and applying it to agricultural products, would have the effect of increasing the price of these products. Now, Mr. Speaker, as one who took part in the debate before the country at that time, one who was a strong advocate, in the election of 1878, of that policy, I may say that that assertion contains a certain element of truth. Statements were made that would be the effect, that relatively the price of grain would be increased. Some gentlemen, in speaking of it, have not used the word "relative," but they speak of a general increase in the price of farm produce, whereas we must always take into consideration the relative increase as compared with the various markets of the world. Now, Sir, the market of Liverpool at that time was acknowledged by both parties as being the ruling market in respect to wheat. Now, wheat is by no means an insignificant article of export from this country; it is really the largest, both in the number of bushels and in flour, of any article which the farmers have to dispose of, especially the farmers of Ontario. Now, hon. gentlemen told us that the markets of Liverpool then gave the price of wheat, and that they now establish the price of wheat. Well, I agree that the Liverpool market at that time did govern the price of wheat, but that is no longer the case. At that time the difference between the price in Liverpool and the price in Toronto averaged about 50 to 55 cents, often much more, seldom much less. The difference between New York and Toronto then averaged about 20 cents, often 30, seldom less than 20. Now, what was the effect of the National Policy on that one product? We find that the difference between Liverpool and Toronto gradually sank from 50 down to 40, 30, 20—in fact at the present time it is actually under 10. Now, there is, under the National Policy, a relative increase in the price of wheat. Hon. gentlemen opposite refer to the markets of those years, when, for many reasons, the price of wheat was higher in Liverpool, and higher in New York, and they will compare the prices then with the prices now. But that is not a fair comparison. If wheat is low in Liverpool and low the world over, how can any policy make it high here? The only question is, can we make it relatively higher? And that, I claim, has been done. There is no other reason to give for the fact we are now within 10 cents of the Liverpool market, while formerly we were 50 cents from it; there is no other reason to give why we are within 5 to 8 cents of the New York market, when formerly we used to be from 20 to 30 cents. Nor is wheat the only article to which these remarks will apply. What I have said in reference to wheat applies with equal strength to every other grains that the farmers produce, barley alone excepted. Now, one article of grain produced by the farmers is that of oats, and in that we find a difference ranging from 15 to 25 cents between Toronto and New York. It is stated by some hon. gentlemen that the present time is about the only exception, whereas we find many exceptions, and if we trace back during the last eight years, we will find that there has been six exceptions to the average price which I have stated. Now, we are told that it requires an exception to prove the rule. I fancy that six exceptions out of eight must prove the rule the other way. It may be said that the assertion that this is due to the National Policy, is only an assertion on our side. I take that question up in this way; I say there is a reason for all these changes, and if we trace these reasons down we will see whether they are due to the National Policy or not. If we look at the Trade and Navigation Returns of these former years, we find that we were importing six, seven and eight millions of bushels of wheat, either wheat or flour into Canada, a wheat-producing country; we were importing nearly one-third of our annual product, and we were exporting at the same time a much larger quantity. But, now, all that has changed, a duty has been placed on the importation of wheat, and it has decreased so that now, the importation of wheat and flour, instead of being eight million bushels, is under two. Our exports at first decreased, naturally they would, we had not enough to fill our own markets, and therefore, we had to fall off in our exports; and hon. gentlemen would argue that that was an objection to the National Policy, because, forsooth, it increased our import and decreased our export trade. Why, the very object was to prevent the importation of things that were a rival to our home productions, and the result of preventing importation, the result of increasing home consumption, all tended to decrease in like manner the export of the same articles. Now, we find that the National Policy has given good ground for another rise in price—it has increased our home consumption, we are producing more and yet we are exporting more; we are increasing our home consumption, we have increased our home production, our towns are larger, our cities are larger, and villages are increasing in number. These cities, towns and villages have to be supplied with bread from the farmers, and every hon. gentleman will admit that the consumption of breadstuffs must be greatly increased. But we are told that the examples given by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in relation to the markets of the present day are wholly exceptional. A careful perusal of all the reports of the markets, as given by the Globe, which hon. gentlemen opposite no doubt will accept as correct, show that during the last eight years the prices as between Toronto and Buffalo have been more frequently in favor of Toronto than the other way. But I do not intend to go over the ground in regard to those markets, because they have been dealt with before; but I have what I consider a market which affects the interests of a part of the Province I represent, not only my own constituency, but all that portion of the Province similarly situated. I refer to that portion of the Province situated on the shore of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, and what affects those counties must necessarily affect Ontario to a considerable extent. I wish, therefore, to refer to the market of Chicago. I take the market of Chicago as compared with the market of Toronto, or, perhaps, what might be even a more fitting comparison, with the market of Owen Sound, between which there is water communication and the cost of transportation is well known and firmly established, and it is easy, therefore, to make a comparison. I take first the market of Toronto. We find on wheat there is a difference between Chicago and Toronto of from ten to twelve cents, the price in Chicago being that much lower on the average, not for a year or two, but for six or seven years, that it is so now and necessarily will continue so long as our present policy is in force. The cost of transportation is not over four cents at the outside. The cost from Chicago to Owen Sound is from two and a half to three cents and the cost to Toronto may be placed at four cents, so there is a difference of from ten to twelve cents on wheat. Oats in Chicago on an average stand fifteen cents below Toronto prices, twelve cents being as near as it ever comes, and I may say that it stands in exactly the same relation to the market of Owen Sound, in fact it is very rarely within twelve cents of that market. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite what would be the effect on the markets of Owen Sound, Goderich, Sarnia or any places bordering on the shores of Lake Huron or Georgian Bay if the duty were taken off those two staple articles? They could be purchased in Chicago at ten or twelve cents below our price and they could be delivered in our market for three or four cents per bushel, the natural consequence of which would be a drop in our markets of about ten cents a bushel all round. That is only now prevented by the National Policy by the imposition of the duty; remove the duty and American oats would come into our harbors as they did in 1877. I well recollect in the spring of that year when oats were ranging in Owen Sound at 42 cents a bushel, American oats were brought in by steamer loads, and the result was that the price fell in one day from 40 cents to 28 cents. All that section of country does not depend so much upon the markets of Buffalo and New York or even the markets of Liverpool for the price of grain. They are confined to home consumption almost entirely, they have their markets at their own doors. The whole of the northern country to which they have access furnishes a large home market for oats and coarse grains generally, and we have to-day, notwithstanding the duty, to compete with Americans in these markets. I hold in my hand a letter from one John Andrews, of Spanish River, in the employ of the Spanish River Lumber Company. That gentleman writes to me, not for the purposes of this debate, a letter unsolicited, in which he asks to have a custom house established there, and he gives figures, which I will take the liberty of using. The three lumbering companies established on Spanish River have imported during the last year \$13,000 of American goods in competition with our Canadian goods. Those importations comprised lumber supplies, pressed hay, oats, corn and pork. We have to compete with the Americans there. We could not sell one barrel of pork, one bushel of oats, we could not sell one car load there if the duty was removed; that market would be taken away from our farmers entirely, and they would be placed upon the level they occupied prior to the adoption of the National Policy, and they would be forced by necessity to seek distant markets. And it must be remembered that what would apply to this section of the Province would apply with more or less effect to the whole Province, and what affected Ontario would affect the whole Dominion. During the navigation season last year there passed through Owen Sound about 3,000,000 bushels of western grain. When wheat in Chicago was twelve cents a bushel lower than in Owen Sound, and oats were fifteen cents lower, they were fortunately passing through in bond; but for the fact that they were in bond and that we have a duty imposed of ten cents per bushel on oats, our oats would not have remained fifteen cents a bushel above Chicago price but on a par with it or at most about two cents over. The local market on the north shore can be reached by the Americans about as cheaply as we can reach it, and it is the duty alone that keeps up prices upon those articles. I consider it is not a question as to what hon. gentlemen on this side of the House or hon. gentlemen opposite thought of reciprocity in the past, but it is what the effect of reciprocity would be at the present time. That is the question we have to consider; it is the live question, and it is immaterial as to whether we thought reciprocity a benefit or otherwise ten or fifteen years ago. How would it affect us at the present time, and what affect would it have on our markets? I am satisfied that the introduction of wheat and of oats and of grain free of duty would lower the prices of those commodities in Canada, and just in that connection let me ask what would become of our pea crop? The pea crop of the Province of Ontario is considered one of the most valuable crops. It is true that some farmers say it has an objection, as the straw is not so useful for many purposes as the straw of other grain. But, on the other hand, it is grown by many farmers to clean their land, and grown upon naked soil turned over for the first time when other crops there would be by no means certain. The very best crops of peas are grown in that way, and for our farmers generally, I believe it is a very good crop. What has been the effect of the western grain on the pea crop of the Northern and Eastern States? Why, it has driven peas out of the country. Take any paper in America, and look at the Detroit, Buffalo and other American markets, and you will find that they do not even mention the pea crop at all. What is the cause of that? Those countries grew peas as well as we do before the extensive cultivation of grain, but they found that they could not produce grain and peas. They have not been able to compete with the western producer of grain. The consequence is that the pea crop is entirely annihilated, and in the event of introduction of American grain free into Canada, what would become of our Canadian pea crop? It would vanish as the pea crop of the Northern and Eastern States has vanished. I ventured to remark, a few moments ago, that in the researches of the hon. gentlemen opposite for evidence in support of their contentions, they have sought to present to the House not all the evidence in the case, but, like prejudiced detectives who, having obtained what they considered a clue, they follow up only one class of evidence and ignore the remainder. They even go to the extent of suppressing evidence which will crop to the surface in spite of them when it does not suit their case. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McMillan), in a very elaborate speech for which I give him credit for having gone very carefully into his side of the question, has set before us with great care all the evidence he could find to bolster up his statement that the National Policy was injurious to the Canadian producer. He enumerated a number of articles in support of his contention and I will refer to those articles which he named. He referred to horses, horned cattle, sheep, poultry, eggs, potatoes, vegetables, straw, hay, barley, beans, apples and wool. Strange when he was selecting these that he should omit other and far larger products of the farm. Strange that he should have selected some which are mere bagatelles; but stranger still that when he was referring to horned cattle he should have made an exception to them as regards the manner in which he treated other articles. He referred to poultry, eggs and potatoes by their value, as well as all the other articles except horses. I did not notice in particular whether he gave us the value or number of horses, but it is not very material. He tried to show that the trade of the United States was far more important to the Canadian farmer than the trade with England, and selected horned cattle as proof of this, but instead of referring to values as he did in the other cases he referred to numbers, and when asked from this side of the House "What about the values?" he went off on a tangent, so to speak, upon another subject, leaving the question of values unrevealed. I will therefore try to supplement what the hon. gentleman said in that respect by referring to the value of horned cattle as he referred to the numbers. He wanted to show, and he stated in plain language, that horned cattle exported to the States was 39 per cent., while to Great Britain the percentage was 54. Now, that may be a correct calculation as to numbers, but as to value it is entirely wrong. The value of cattle, as taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns, where the hon. gentleman got the values of the other articles and the numbers of the horned cattle, shows that the value of cattle exported to Great Britain was \$5,300,000, while the value of cattle exported from Canada to the United States was only \$887,000, or instead of being 39 per cent. on one side and 54 on the other, it was 82 per cent. on one side and 13½ on the other. I may say that the export of horned cattle alone to England was greater than the export of all the other articles he mentioned, to the United States, except barley. Leaving barley out of the table which he gave us, the value of cattle exported to Great Britain was greater than the value of all the other articles he referred to. I do not think that it was a fair selection to present to the House when he selected a lot of trivial articles. Potatoes would rank pretty high in the list, but Prince Edward Island gave almost the entire quota of that export. The other articles given here as evidence of what a great boon trade with the United States would be were trivial in value. As I said before when he referred to horned cattle he spoke of numbers instead of value, omitting to state that the value of that export to Great Britain was greater than the value of all the others. Why did he not give us the quantities of butter sent to Great Britain, as compared with the United States? We find that we sent \$757,000 of butter to Great Britain, while we only sent \$17,000 worth to the United States. Why did not the hon. gentleman refer to cheese when he was dealing with cattle and the other various products of the farm? Because he would have to admit that we export to Great Britain \$7,065,000 worth, while to the United States we only exported \$30,000 worth. Why did he not refer to oats? Because he would have to admit that we exported \$509,000 worth to Great Britain as against \$12,000 worth to the United States. Why did he not refer to peas? Because he would have to admit that there were \$2,000,000 exported to Great Britain as against \$300,000 worth to the United States. Why did he not refer to wheat? Because he would have to admit that there were \$4,278,000 worth sent to England, and only \$265,000 worth to the United States. I think that when hon. gentlemen opposite profess to give evidence they have obtained in this matter and when they profess to seek their evidence they should give us the whole truth. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also gave us some strange information. He gave us here a quota, which must be from imagination, because if a farmer produces the articles and the quantities that he says he produces on a 70-acre farm he must be an astonishing farmer and he must deal in many grains and articles entirely different to other farmers. He gave us a story about a colt, one yoke of steers, twelve lambs, three hundred bushels of barley, five tons of hay and thirty bushels of potatoes. Strange, very strange indeed, that that farmer had no wheat; strange, very strange indeed, that he had no oats; most extraordinary for an Ontario farmer that he had no peas and no pork. I think that farmer must be in the land of speculation, and not a genuine farmer. But he said that on that colt he would have got \$20 more. How so? What proportion of our horses go to the United States? The hon. member for East Huron tells us that that there were 18,779 horses exported from Canada, or about one to every 60 voters in the country; or, to be generous to him, give two votes for every farmer and it would mean that one farmer in every thirty has one horse to export. Now, we are told we must pay the duty on them. If we had the United States only as our market for horses, and there were no cities in Canada furnishing markets for the surplus of our farmers, then only would we pay the whole duty. The question who pays the duty depends on who seeks the market. In some cases it is difficult to apply that rule, but when it is properly applied the answer will be correct in every case. Will the hon. gentleman tell us that this country produces only 18,000 horses in the year? By no means. Our farmers do not go into horse breeding by any means as a paying business. Horses are bred in Canada more as a luxury than for making money, and the farmers go into that business in so small a way that they do not count the cost; but any farmer who has attempted it on an extensive scale has come to conclusion that it does not pay. Still, 18,000 horses for the whole Dominion of Canada are a mere bagatelle compared with the number our farmers raise in their own economical way. Therefore it is unfair to say that the Canadian farmer in all cases pays the duty on horses. I think it was at Rochester that Mr. Wiman told the Americans, "you pay \$150 for a horse, and but for the duty you would get it for \$120." At Dufferin Lake he told the same story, applied to the Ontario farmer. "It is true, you sell your horse for \$120, and but for duty you would get \$150." I leave Mr. Wiman to settle with Mr. Wiman which is right. But isolated cases can never decide this question. We find there is but this small surplus, and it is not fair for any hon. gentleman to say that we must pay the whole of that duty when the surplus is so insignificant. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said one yoke of steers sold at \$40. Well, were those steers exported to the United States? Usually fat cattle which are fit for exportation are sent to England \$5,000, 000 worth of them, as against \$80,000 worth to the United States. Is it fair to represent that those cattle, which are sold to the butcher and slaughtered in a town within a few miles of where they were raised, and consumed by the inhabitants of that town, are charged with any duty? The National Policy has done a great deal to increase the local market for beef. In the town I have the honor to represent and the country surrounding it there has been a very good market for fat cattle during the last eight years, the prices having ranged higher than the Toronto prices during those years. At the same time we had cattle coming from Toronto and passing through our town for shipment to the north, and we had the Canadian Pacific Railway in course of construction and various other circumstances to improve the price. I do not claim all the benefit of the increased prices in those localities for the National Policy; I state frankly that the construction of the railway and the development of the North-West country gave us a much larger market and enabled us to compete with the Americans. Consider the quantity of cattle shipped to Duluth and Port Arthur and there distributed all along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The railroad gave us the market, and the National Policy preserved it to a very great extent to the farmers of Ontario. The farmer mentioned by the hon. gentleman had 12 lambs. In all probability they were raised in North Wellington and were slaughtered in the adjoining towns. Is it fair, then to say that any duty was paid on them? Then he spoke of the question of barley. Strange, very strange indeed, from my knowledge of North Wellington, that in that county the only grain the farmers raised to sell was barley, which is in demand in the United States, and for which a high price is paid there. But this farmer had five tons of hay, a very large quantity, and we are to suppose that he shipped that hay from North Wellington to the United States, and paid the duty on it. Is it fair to assume that any portion of that hay was exported? We know that hay cannot be shipped any great distance. We find that in towns twenty miles apart, there is often a difference of \$2 per ton in the price of hay. I have known a local crop in the neighborhood of a town to decrease the price there. Therefore, in the article of hay, the farmers have to rely almost entirely on the immediate home market. Then he had thirty bushels of potatoes. I will not occupy the time of the House in going over more of these details, but I say that of the \$70 duty which the hon. member for North Wellington taxed his farmer with, in all probability there was not a cent of duty paid. If hon. gentlemen desired to be fair in comparing the Canadian trade with the United States, with our trade with Great Britain, they would have found figures readily at hand in the Trade and Navigation Returns. If they look into our trade in agricultural products, they will find that out of a total of \$'8 000,000 exports, only \$7,000,000 worth went to the United States. They will find that in animals and other products, out of a total export of \$24,000,000 only \$7,000,000 worth went to the United States and nearly \$17,000,000 to Great Britain and other countries. In the products of the fisheries they will find that out of a total export of \$6,800,000, we send only \$2,700,000 to the United States. So that in their comparisons, hon. gentlemen opposite have not been as fair in presenting the evidence as the nature of the case requires. I agree heartily in the opinion that the discussion on this question should be entered into dispassionately and a calm consideration should be given to the evidence on both sides. I quite agree with hon. gentlemen opposite that on the decision of this question depends the future of Canada. I am willing to admit that our very existence is at stake, and that we are called on to decide whether we will continue to deal here with our own finances, or whether we are to look to the White House at Washington for the direction of our fiscal policy. I do not intend to go very deeply into the statistics I had prepared, as at this late hour I do not think it would be wise to further trespass upon the time of the House. I admit that in 1878 I looked upon reciprocity as of very great value to this country; I will admit that up to a year or so ago, when this great question was first brought prominently to our attention, I was inclined to think that reciprocity would be of great service to our agricultural population. I was inclined to think that the resolutions of our statutes should be carried out to the letter, and reciprocity to the fullest extent in natural products be entered into. I therefore entered on the search for evidence with the same preconceived ideas that hon. gentlemen opposite have on this subject, but I did not shut my eyes to the evidence on the other side, and the result has been that the more I have searched into that matter, the more I have compared the markets of this country with those of the United States, the more I have compared the position of the farmers of this country with that of the farmers of the United States, the more I have been convinced that the duty on our natural products is necessary and important in the interests of the farmers of Ontario. As early as 1874, the Hon. Geo. Brown, in presenting the Canadian memorandum, in conjunction with Sir Edward Thornton, admitted that the result of the repeal of the reciprocity treaty has not been an unmixed evil. He referred especially to such products as wheat, flour, and provisions, of which the United States have a surplus as well as Canada, and he said the effect of the United States putting on a duty on these articles had been to turn Canadian products through Canadian channels, and to force the people of Canada to find markets in the Maritime Provinces, the West Indies, and Great Britain, via Canadian routes, instead of the same markets via New York and Boston. He went on to say that although it had a disastrous effect upon our traffic with the United States for a time, yet that during the seven years which had elapsed then since the abrogation of the treaty, our exports had reached the sum of \$235,000,000, or \$75,000,000 more than the highest amount they had reached during the existence of the treaty. What has been the effect since? We find that what was true then is true now; we have found more profitable markets for our products and an easier method of reaching them. Then the National Policy came to our assistance and gave us a home market, which is the best market of all, because it brings the consumer and the producer closer together, and the nearer you can bring the consumer to the producer, the better it is for both. I have occupied more time than I intended, but before taking my seat, I will just briefly refer to some of the arguments, or rather assertions, Mr. Masson, that have been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity or whatever they may choose to call it. They tell us that the country is not prosperous, and what remedy do they propose? They propose a policy that would lower the prices of our natural products and ruin our cattle trade which we have been at such great expense in creating. They propose a policy that would destroy our cheese and butter trade with Great Britain, that would close our factories, that would depopulate our cities, towns and villages, that would destroy our home market and render less profitable farming operations in this country. They tell us that our population is leaving us, but how do they propose to keep it here? They propose a policy that would assist the United States in offering greater inducements to our young men to cross the border; they propose a policy that would increase the trade of the United States, that would build up their cities, and hold out a greater bait to our young men to leave this country. They would open the door for a larger exodus, they would close our factories, they would turn our men out of employment, they would shut down every manufacturing industry in the country, they would drive out the people whom we are now trying to retain—that is the remedy that they propose for the evil which they say now exists in our population leaving us. They tell us that our farmers would sell their produce well, and they would open all our ports so that the cheap produce of the United States could pour in all along our border in consequence of the cheap carrying trade which is now established, so that the market of Chicago would be the ruling market for the Province of Ontario. They tell us that we are cursed with combines, and they calmly propose to cast us helpless into the lap of the mother of combines. They tell us that our railways are only paying $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on their investment, and they would tap our railways at every point, so that even the $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. profit would be turned into ruin. Some of them tell us that our manufacturers are monopolists and are rolling in wealth; others tell us that they are not prospering. What then? We will take the view that they are rolling in wealth. If that is an evil, will that be bettered? How do they propose to remedy that? Destroy them. Let in the Americans. Let in wealthier manufacturers. Destroy those that we have, because they are rolling in wealth. But, if we take the other view, that they are not prospering, what do they propose to do? Create a trade which would drive men from our cities, take away our home trade, destroy our manufactures, close up our factories, silence our looms, close every forge in the country, in fact ruin our country in order to add to the manufactures of our neighbors across the border. I do not think any such remedies are called for. I do not think it is necessary for us to seek such assistance or to go begging to the United States to take us in. I think we have a glorious country of our own, and I might quote the remarks of the Rev. Father Coffey on that subject, in which he says:

"I fear not to call myself an admirer of America and American institutions. But while I do admire America, while I revere her people, and glory in her history and her achievements, I cannot forget that in the 22 years of national life that Canada has already enjoyed, this great though youthful country has made a progress, moral and material, without parallel in the world's history. * * * Not even the American republic with its proud record of development and progress can point to so many and such gigantic achievements as Canada has in so short a time accomplished. Of this country we have every reason to feel proud. To Canada we owe a debt of loyalty and devotion that cannot be too fully repaid. We have a country with free institutions, with every protection for all classes of citizens, with civil and religious liberty guaranteed to every section of the population, and its people in the enjoyment of a fairer distribution of wealth than obtains in any other portion of the world. Before the rising generation of Canada devolves the duty of doing its utmost to make Canada that which God and nature intended it should be—a truly great nation. A great nation must Canada become if its people continue to prove true to the Canadian principles that lie at the foundation of all true growth and progress. That they will so prove is my firm belief as it certainly is the sincere trust and prayer of every lover of this brave land—the crown and the glory of the proud and fearless north.”

I think it is a spirit such as that, to love and praise our country, that we should endeavor to cultivate. We should enhance the value of our country at home and abroad, and not cry out ruin and desolation, and point to our weak points; but hon. gentlemen opposite are prone to point to all our failings, to all our losses and misfortunes, and at the same time they are prone to praise all the benefits of our neighbors across the border. If they must praise one country and depreciate the other, in the name of all that is sacred why do they not sound the praises and tell the benefits of our Canadian homes, and point to the discrepancies and the drawbacks of the Americans? But no, they tell us of the wheat fields of Dakota, and they do not tell us of the blizzards and the cyclones. They tell us of the rich pastures of another State, but they say nothing of the bug and the grasshopper. But, when they speak of Canada, it is only upon the evils that they can dwell, it is only the losses and the discouraging features of the case that they refer to. If they could but unite, as it is the duty of all loyal Canadians to unite, in pressing everywhere the claims of the country in which they live, so that in every land our praises may be set forth, we would not have the portrait of any hon. member of this House forming the frontispiece of an American pamphlet. We have many communities and many nationalities in our land, and all we want is that a united stand should be made, all we want is for the men of every Province and of every nationality in the various Provinces to unite firmly and to press forward the general work in the interests of the prosperity of our common country. If they will do that, Canada cannot fail to prosper, Canada must prosper. She is a land of rich resources, she is inhabited by noble races. Why, then, should she not prosper? I say that:

“English, Irish, Scotch and French together here combine
To emulate the deeds their sires have done in Auld Lang Syne;
Let's lay their failings all aside, their virtue and truth maintain,
And in this new Dominion they shall bring forth fruit again
Then as long as the old St. Lawrence rolls its course towards the sea,
So long shall Canada remain the glorious and free.”

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House at any great length at this late stage of the debate, but I desire to give some reasons which influence me in voting for the resolution of my hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Before doing that, I desire to refer to some of the statements which have been made by the last speaker. He made some very extraordinary statements or, at least, they seemed so to me. He said that formerly, before we had the National Policy, the Liverpool market regulated the price of wheat, but that now the National Policy regulates the price of wheat. If the National Policy had secured for our farmers a market sufficient to absorb the entire product of our wheat, the hon. gentleman's statement might have had some shade or shadow of truth in it, but from the Trade and Navigation Returns we find that we export some five million bushels of wheat and 500 barrels of flour, and, as long as we export wheat and flour—it does not matter whether we export two million bushels or five million bushels or ten million bushels—so long as we have an export trade the foreign market must regulate the price. Then he seemed to be very much exercised with the idea that, if unrestricted trade were adopted with the United States, it would annihilate the pea crop of the farmers. I do not exactly see how that result would follow. Then he tries to point out what he alleges to be the weakness in the argument of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), when he stated that 45,705 cattle were exported last year to the United States. According to the idea of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) the hon.

member for East Huron should have given the amount realised for these cattle instead of the number; because the amount realised per head for the cattle exported to the United States was not as great as the amount realised per head for the cattle exported to Great Britain, he thought there was a weakness in the argument. Now, I know from certain knowledge that the cattle which we exported to the United States were mostly grass cattle, were store cattle, cattle that were exported for feeding purposes. Why did our farmers export these cattle? Because they found it more profitable to export their peas and barley instead of feeding it to the cattle, and if we had free trade with the United States in raw products, so that our farmers could obtain cheap corn as they did formerly under the Reciprocity Treaty, then they could have sold their barley and peas and they could have bought cheap corn and fattened these cattle and sent them to Great Britain and secured a much greater price for them. Another statement of the hon. gentleman was that it is a great advantage for our farmers and others to be able to sell our products in the nearest market. He laid down the principle that the nearer you can bring the producer and the consumer together, the better it will be for both. Now, that is exactly what we are proposing to do in trying to get reciprocal trade with the United States. We desire to bring the consumer and the producer as near together as we possibly can. Now, without referring any further to the arguments of that hon. gentleman, I will proceed to state to the House some of the ideas which present themselves to my mind on this question. The question of free trade between Canada and the United States has occupied the attention of the people of this country to a very large extent ever since the abrogation of the last reciprocity treaty. I think both political parties in this House and in the country are agreed that it is highly desirable that we should have freer trade relations with the United States than we have had at present. It seems to me that the only difference of opinion which exists is as to the form which these trade relations ought to take, as to the extent to which we ought to secure free trade with the United States. Well, if we could secure reciprocity in raw products, if we could gain free access to the United States for our farmers, our miners, our lumbermen, our fishermen, and all the producers of raw materials, that, in my opinion, would satisfy to a very large extent the desire for free trade in the Dominion of Canada. But the Government of the United States, as I understand it, have clearly and distinctly told us that for the present, at all events, they will not trade with us on that basis, and consequently it is our duty to see whether we can find some other basis on which they will be willing to trade with us. Failing to secure free trade in raw products, the strong desire which exist in this country for some kind of trade relations with our neighbors, has given rise to the discussion of several other projects. One scheme which has been discussed during the past year is known by the name of commercial union or Zollverein, and the proposal now before the House is known under the name of unrestricted reciprocity—free trade, without the complications which might arise in connection with commercial union. Under commercial union, as I understand it, the tariff to be levied upon foreign goods would have to be agreed upon between the two countries, it would necessarily have to be a uniform tariff, but under unrestricted reciprocity, as proposed by the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that is not necessary. Under that arrangement Canada can levy her own tariff, and the people of the United States can levy such a tariff as would suit them. The tariff would not necessarily require to be equal, and consequently our revenue would not have to be interfered with so much as some hon. gentlemen would have us believe. The principal objection urged by hon. gentlemen opposite against this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity is that, as they allege, it will lead to annexation. That seems to be their strongest position. They declare, one and all, that it would lead to annexation. Now, if I believed for a single moment that it would have that effect I would hesitate before I voted for it, but I do not believe it would have that effect. I do not believe that it would have a tendency in the slightest degree to produce an annexation sentiment in the Dominion of Canada. Let us examine this statement for a few moments. No doubt hon. gentlemen are all aware that immediately preceding the introduction of the reciprocity treaty in 1854, there existed in Canada a very considerable feeling in favor of annexation among certain classes, but so soon as a reciprocity treaty was adopted, so soon as we obtained free trade in raw products with the United States, that feeling died away and we heard nothing more of it. Now, then, if, during the twelve years from 1854 to 1866 the farmers of Canada had free trade with the United States without becoming annexationists, the lumbermen had free trade with the United States without becoming annexationists, the fishermen had free trade with the United States without becoming annexationists, the miners had free trade, and our artisans had the benefit of free trade, indirectly, through the greater prosperity of the farmers upon whom they are dependent for their prosperity, while our laborers have always been permitted to transfer their skill and their labor from one side of the line to the other free, and they have not become annexationists—if all these, and the class which I have enumerated, constituting by far the larger proportion of the population—I think I am quite within the mark when I say that they constitute three-fourths of our entire population—if such a large proportion of our population had free trade before, and did not become annexationists, why should they become such now? Then the question arises, Who are going to become annexationists under this arrangement? From what classes are the annexationists to come? There is only one other class left, and that is the petted and pampered manufacturers, those who have been enabled, during the past eight or ten years under the operation of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, to enrich themselves at the expense of the public, they are the only class left—and I do not believe that any considerably proportion of that class would become annexationists if these special advantages were withdrawn from them, and they were placed upon the common level of ordinary business men. It seems to me that we have not been so successful as we could have wished in establishing interprovincial trade between the different Provinces; although we have expended large sums with a view to secure that result. Unfortunately for Canada its fertile sections are situated so far apart, the geographical difficulties are so great, that we have not been as successful in cultivating interprovincial trade as we would desire. Those geographical difficulties do not exist between Canada and the United States. Our American neighbors ought to be our most profitable customers under any arrangement such as is proposed by this resolution, and it is quite clear that the nearer we can bring the customer to the producer the better it will be for both parties, and trading with our near neighbors is more profitable and more sensible than trying to find markets lying at a greater distance. The cost of transporting our goods or products to consumers in the United States is not so great as transporting them to more distant countries and returns are obtained more readily. Dealers can meet from time to time and arrange matters with regard to trade, and the difficulties which exist in connection with trading with distant countries do not prevail to the same extent with a country lying nearer home. The benefit and the great convenience of trading with our near neighbors is illustrated by our coal trade. We have endeavored by carrying coal from Nova Scotia to Quebec and Ontario even at a loss to encourage that trade, but in spite of all that has been done to foster the trade, Ontario has all along brought her coal from the United States because the cost of transportation is less, and it was more convenient to purchase that article from our near neighbors. But the Minister of Marine tried to controvert the argument made on this side of the House in favor of trade with our near neighbors by trying to show that the nearer market was not in many instances the best market, and another statement made by that hon. gentleman was that our most profitable trade can be done with those nations which do not produce at all or only in limited quantities the articles we have to sell. I do not think that always follows. The hon. gentleman referred to France, and stated that if the near market was the best France ought to be the best customers for British goods and by implication he stated that the distant market of India and other foreign countries was more profitable for British productions. I find by the Statesmen's Year Book of 1885, that the trade of Great Britain with France, a nation which competes to a very great extent with Great Britain in foreign markets in manufactured goods—the imports from France to Great Britain in 1883 were $190,000,000, while the exports from France were $85,000,000, or the exports from Great Britain to France amounted to $2.25 per head, while the exports to India were only 86 cents per head, taking the population at the lowest number given in the census return. Then take two other countries lying very near to Great Britain, Belgium and Holland. Those countries are among the most profitable and largest customers of British goods, and there is this remarkable circumstance connected with those countries, that Belgium and Holland seem to manufacture and produce precisely the same class of goods which they purchase to a very large extent from Great Britain. I find that Belgium, a country lying very near to Great Britain, with a population of five millions and three-quarters, exported to Great Britain in 1883, $80,000,000 worth and took in exchange from Great Britain $40,000,000 worth or $7 per head for the whole population. Holland, with a population of four millions and a quarter, exported $124,000,000 worth and took British goods in exchange to the extent of $45,000,000 worth, or $11 per head. So those countries lying near to Great Britain, and producing even the same classes of goods, were purchasers to the amounts of $7 and $10 per head, according to the population respectively. There is one very remarkable feature connected with the trade between Great Britain and those two countries, a feature which I think has some bearing upon the trade, which we think can be done under reciprocal trade between Canada and the United States. I find, for instance, that Belgium exported to Great Britain woollen yarns to the amount of $7,000,000, and that Great Britain in return sold to Belgium in 1883 woollen goods to the value of $6,000,000. Belgium, during the same year, sold to Great Britain flax and cotton goods to the value of $6,500,000, and Great Britain in return sold to Belgium $11,000,000 worth of cotton goods. I find also that Belgium sold to Great Britain in the same year iron goods to the value of $3,500,000 and Great Britain sold to Belgium in return iron goods to the amount of $2,100,000. So the House will see that there exists between those two countries a very large reciprocal trade in the class of manufactured goods which both countries produce; so it does not always follow that we can always sell most profitably to the country which does not manufacture or produce the goods we have to sell. The trade between Great Britain and Holland is of the same character. Holland exported iron and steel goods to the value of $6,000,000 and Great Britain sold back to Holland $5,500,000 worth. I find also that Holland sold Great Britain woollen goods to the value of $8,000,000 and Great Britain sold back to Holland $6,300,000 worth of the same kind of goods during the same year. Holland sold to Great Britain $4,000,000 worth of cotton goods and Great Britain sold to Holland $13,500,000 worth. So here are countries lying near to Great Britain manufacturing the same kind of goods as Great Britain and those two nations exchange the same kind of goods to a very large extent. And if that can be done between those two countries I do not see any reason why we in the Dominion of Canada under reciprocal free trade with the United States should not be able to sell a large quantity of manufactured goods to our neighbors as well as to purchase from them. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is admitted by every one that free trade with the United States in the produce of the farm, would be of great benefit to the class of our people engaged in that industry. I think it is admitted by every one that our farmers would be largely benefited by freedom of trade between Canada and the United States. It is, I believe, a fact, which cannot be denied, that the British market is not as valuable at the present moment to our farmers as it was five years ago, and I think if we take into consideration the large increase in the production of wheat and cattle in other countries of the world which has taken place during the past five years, we must come to the conclusion that the depreciation in the value of the British market to our farmer, has become permanent. Therefore, I think, it is the duty of this House and of the Government to secure as valuable a market for our farmers with our American neighbors as is possible. Even under present circumstances and with a heavy duty against us our farmers sell a very large proportion of their products in the American market. I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that in 1878 we sold 13,851 head of cattle to our neighbors, in 1880 the number had risen to 21,317, in 1885 it had increased to 30,593 and in 1886 we exported 45,765. Again in 1886 we exported 18,225 horses and 363,046 sheep, and poultry to the value of $98,719. Of eggs we exported 13,000,000 dozen, valued at $1,821,364; wool, $1,297,876; of barley we sent 9,437,000 bushels; peas, 405,000 bushels; and potatoes, 1,276,000 bushels. Now, if our farmers can find their best market in the United States for such a large proportion of their products with a heavy duty against them, I think we have every reason to believe that they would sell them to much better advantage if the duty were removed, and to show you still further the value and importance of the American market to our farmers I would just quote our total export from the Dominion to the United States last year. They were as follows:—Ontario exported $20,271,000; Quebec exported $4,394,000; Nova Scotia exported $2,733,000; New Brunswick, $1,763,000; Prince Edward Island, $667,000; Manitoba, $212,000; British Columbia, $2,230,000, making a total export from the Dominion to the United States of $32,273,033, as against $38,714,331 to Great Britain. So that you see, Mr. Speaker, that even under present circumstances the American market is quite as important as the British market to our farmer. Now then, the question comes up if the duty were removed, and if we were to secure free trade with the United States, would the price of the products of the farm increase at the same time, or would the taking off of the duty reduce the price so that the farmer would get no more than he does now. If it can be shown that the removal of the duty would not enhance the price to our farmers, then there is no practical object in getting the duty removed. I think it could be clearly shown that the removal of the duty would not reduce the value of our products in the United States market, and that consequently our farmers would just get as much more, or nearly as much more, as the duty amounts to. I find from the United States statistics that the farmers produced last year 61,000,000 bushels of barley, and that we sold to them 9,000,000 bushels. Now then, does anyone pretend to say that if the duty were taken off the 9,000,000 bushels exported to the United States it would have the effect of reducing the price of the 61,000,000 bushels on the other side. The people of the United States require not only their own production but they require our 9,000,000 bushels as well, and consequently I do not believe that the price of barley would be reduced by a single cent per bushel if the duty were removed. Then speaking of our horses. There is a very large demand for horses in the United States. I think I am quite within the mark when I say that at least 95 out of every 100 horses sold in the United States are raised by the American farmer, and as everyone knows, there is no duty against their own horses. The remaining five out of every 100 is exported from Canada to the United States. Suppose the duty were to be taken off the horses exported from Canada to the States, does anyone pretend to say that the taking off of the duty from the five horses out of every 100 sold there would have the effect of reducing the price on the remaining 95 raised in their own country. I do not think it would have that effect. The demand for horses and the price for horses—would remain the same in the United States and the result would be that our farmers would get from $20 to $30 more for every horse exported to our neighbors. Even if the Canadian farmer did not get the whole benefit of the removal of the duty, it is quite clear that the $20 or $30 duty would be divided between the farmer and the trader, and I think the farmer would get by far the larger share. Now it has been alleged by some speakers on this side of the House that in consequence of the reduction in the market price of the farmers' produce the price of land in Canada has fallen within the last five years. It seems to me that it is hardly necessary to discuss this question. Everyone who has investigated the matter for himself in his own neighborhood, cannot help but come to the conclusion that the price of farming land has depreciated very considerably during the past five years. My own observation leads me irresistibly to that conclusion. It is evident that the loaning companies of the Province of Ontario do not loan as large an amount per acre on farm property to-day as they did five years ago, for the reason that they know very well that farms are not worth as much in the market as they formerly were. In my own county of Waterloo, where farming lands have held their value better than in most other counties, there is a very considerable depreciation in the values of farms. I know of one farm, for instance, in the township of Wellesley, which was sold two years ago for $5,500, and about two months ago it was sold again for $4,200, not by a forced sale, but on very favorable terms. I know another in the township of Wallace which was valued by company valuers five years ago at $9,000, and which was sold two months ago for $7,300. I know of a considerable number of farms in my own riding which could have been readily sold five years ago, but for which purchasers cannot now be found at the old figure, so that their owners, being unwilling to reduce the price, are unable to sell them. Some of the speakers who have preceded me have dwelt considerably on the question of the prosperity of our farmers. It is alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite that our farmers are just as prosperous now as they were ten years ago. I do not agree with that statement. I think we have very conclusive evidence all around us that our farmers are not as prosperous as they were five or ten years ago. I know that in my own county our farmers are under the necessity of borrowing money from the loan companies much more largely than they did five years ago. Until within the past two years it was impossible for any of the loan companies to secure a loan in the north riding of Waterloo. I am connected with a company in Waterloo, which lends money to a pretty large extent, and until very recently we were unable to secure any loans worth speaking of in our neighborhood; but within the last two years we have placed more loans on farms in our immediate neighborhood than we did for ten years before: The reason of that is quite plain. While our farmers were getting better prices than they are now, they always had plenty of money, and there is no part of the country where the farmers have as much money as they have in North Waterloo. Previous to the great reduction in prices they had so much money that they were accustomed to lend it to neighboring farmers who wanted to borrow; but during the last two years they have not had any to lend, and the consequence is that the farmers who need money have to go to the loan companies for it. On this point I will just read a single extract from the Trade Review published at Montreal:

"It cannot but be concluded that Ontario is possessed of that important element, an enterprising population; but comparing the two periods, 1873-79 and 1879-85, it is found that the ratepayers and rural municipalities increased by 40,367, or 16½ per cent. in 1873-79, and only by 13,360, or 4½ in 1879-85. For the two periods the area of assessed lands in 1873-79 increased by 1,001,233 acres, or 5 per cent.; in 1879-85, by 622,978 acres, or 3 per cent. It may and must strike the reader that the comparison which has been made, demonstrates that Ontario has been going back instead of advancing."

The emigration of our people to the United States is another question which has been considerably discussed during this debate, and I think it is admitted on both sides that the emigration has been for years past and still is very large—much larger than any of us desire to see. I think it is generally admitted that the adoption of reciprocal free trade with the United States would benefit every class of people in this Dominion, except, as some hon. gentlemen opposite allege, our manufacturers. It is stated by the opponents of this resolution that our manufacturing industries would be wiped out, as they could not compete with those of the United States—that the result of the adoption of this policy would be that our markets would be filled with American goods, and that we would not be able to sell an equal quantity among our American neighbors. Now, if I believe that it would have the effect of wiping out our manufacturing industries, or even seriously injuring them, I would not cast my vote in its favor, because I quite agree in the importance of having manufacturers in our country as well as farmers. But I am inclined to the opinion that it would not seriously injure any considerable number of our manufacturers, while I believe it would benefit a great many. One hon. gentleman, I think it was the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), said this afternoon that he was satisfied that at least 99 out of every hundred of the manufacturers in this Dominion were opposed to reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR. So they are.

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not agree with that statement. I believe quite a respectable number of our most intelligent, our most progressive, our most enterprising and successful manufacturers are in favor of this resolution. I have had some opportunities of acquainting myself with the opinions of the manufacturers of my own riding; and I think that I am quite within the mark when I say that there are no two towns of the same size in the Dominion in which there are so large a number of manufacturing establishments in operation as there are in the towns of Berlin and Waterloo. Our manufacturers, as a rule, have been very successful, more successful, perhaps, than they have been in some other parts of the country, and I am happy to be able to inform this House that some of them, at least, are in favor of this proposition. It is quite natural, however, that some of our manufacturers in my part of the country should be opposed to this resolution just as they are in other parts of the country, but we have in my riding a large number of millers who believe that under reciprocity they could compete with the United States millers in their own markets. Take the town of Waterloo as a centre. Within a radius of twelve miles of that town there are no less than twenty flour mills, some of very large capacity. A number of them are owned by some of the most enterprising and progressive millers of the Dominion, who were the first to introduce the new process of milling, and who sold a large quantity of flour to our American neighbors during the period when the Reciprocity Treaty was in force, and even during the earlier years of the protective tariff. Of these twenty millers, I know that at least fifteen are strongly in favor of reciprocity with the United States. Then we have two factories in the town of Waterloo, who manufacture agricultural implements on a pretty large scale. I have not taken the trouble to ascertain the views of the proprietors of one of them, but the leading proprietor of the other told me a few days ago that he was quite willing to accept reciprocal free trade with the United States, as he could sell his wares among our neighbors to a much larger extent than he can at home. Then we have in Waterloo one of the most successful and largest woollen manufactory in the Dominion of Canada. It may sound like boasting of the capacity of our own people, but I will say that there is not another woollen factory in this Dominion, the proprietors of which have made as much money on their capital invested as have the proprietors of this Waterloo establishment. Its president and foreman, on two occasions, visited some of the leading factories of the United States, examined their machinery, methods of operation, cost of management, and products, and they both declared most emphatically that they are fully prepared to compete with the United States manufacturers. The president said to me a few days ago: Give me access to the American markets, and I will then run four factories just as well as I do one now. Another enterprising and successful firm in Berlin, Messrs. Brown & Erb, is engaged largely in upholstering. I asked Mr. Brown the other day his opinion on this question, and he said: I go in for free trade with the United States, and if I can get free access to the American markets I could have half a dozen travellers out through the Western States selling my goods. We have another industry in Berlin and Waterloo, which is not represented perhaps in any other part of the Dominion, that of the manufacture of buttons. One of these manufacturers, the manufacturer at Waterloo, has recently commenced to ship his goods to Buffalo, while the other, the largest manufacturer in the town of Berlin, has, during the past ten years, sold in the United States markets no less than $120,000 worth of buttons, paying the duty upon them, and the managing proprietor told me that with such a duty we now have in Canada on German buttons, he is prepared to take his chances in the American market. It matters not what may be said on this question, the fact that they have been able to sell this large quantity of buttons in the United States during the last two years is the best evidence we can have that they can compete with the Americans. One objection urged against the adoption of this resolution is that under free trade with the United States, our manufacturers would have to change their methods of operation, and that instead of manufacturing a large number of articles in different lines they would have to confine themselves to one or two lines, and that large factories would have to be established to compete with those in the United States. The effect, it is argued, would be that our factories would all be centred in the large cities, and that the smaller towns would lose the industries they now possess. I do not believe this policy would have that effect. It has not had it in the United States. We find the largest manufacturing establishments in the United States are not to be found in the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other large cities, but in the smaller towns, in places that were scarcely towns at all until those establishments were located there. A similar result would follow here. I believe that our manufacturing establishments would remain just where they are, largely located in such towns as Guelph, Galt, Berlin and Waterloo, and not in the larger cities. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have great faith in the resources of our great Dominion. Whenever we speak about reciprocity with the United States, they begin to speak of our great resources. Hon. gentlemen on this side place just as high a value upon the resources of this Dominion as they do. We appreciate just as highly as they the great natural resources we possess, but we desire to adopt a policy which will enable us more successfully to develop these resources. We desire to adopt a policy which will give us a free market in the United States for our lumber, coal, fish, and other products. We desire a policy which, by enabling the people of Manitoba and the North-West to buy and sell in the nearest, the most convenient the most profitable market, will do more to develop that magnificent country than the policy of restriction, monopoly and disallowance of hon. gentlemen opposite has done in five or even ten years. We desire to adopt a policy which will give a free market to the farmers of Ontario and Quebec and the fishermen of the eastern Provinces. We desire a policy which will enable us to develop the resources of our Dominion and make of Canada a peaceful, prosperous and independent nation; and for the reason I have just given, it is my intention to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. McKEEN. This discussion has taken such a wide range and has extended over so many days, that perhaps there is little new that can be said on the resolution before the House, but the subject is so wide a one, embracing as it does our national and industrial interests of every kind, that, while the resolution is before the House, it should be thoroughly investigated from every standpoint. To my mind, the best way of doing this is for the representatives of this country to show how the industries with which they are more practically acquainted would be affected by the proposed changes. Evidence of that kind is likely to tell more powerfully than glittering theories, or what are called broad views. There is, of course, a wide difference of opinion on this whole subject in this House, a good deal of which may arise from the different views that are taken of the actual condition of the country. We have been told by the hon. and learned member from South Oxford, in his able speech on the resolution under discussion, and his utterances have been, more or less, endorsed by the hon. members supporting him, that business is depressed; that there is an exodus of our population; that we are hopelessly in debt, and that irretrievable ruin must inevitably follow a continuance of our present policy, and I notice there is a disposition on this side of the House to denounce those who talk in this deprecating strain, as disloyal and pessimistic; but I submit, Sir, that there is some excuse for these gloomy views, and that in justice this ought to be considered. We should remember that these gentlemen are Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, and that, in their way, they are doing some service to the country; we should also remember that these hon. gentlemen have, time and again, told the electors that the Government of this country would be more honestly, economically and efficiently administered if entrusted in their hands; and that ruin, desolation, moral and financial bankruptcy must follow, should confidence be placed in the present Administration; and yet the country has, again and again, refused to listen to their denunciations or entrust them with power. Let gentlemen on this side of the House place themselves in the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I venture the assertion that their tone will be less jubilant than it is at present. In fact, when they were out of power for a short time, the wail over the condition of the country was almost as loud as it is now, but the wail then came from some of those who now see nothing but blue skies. Everyone knows that there was cause for lamentation then, and so the country decided. The misery and starvation consequent upon that great depression, led to the adoption of a policy which has developed our own resources, which has made us commercially independent, and which has won for us the respect of our neighbors, on both sides of the Atlantic. But just as much of the lamentation cry might have been discounted during the lean years, to which I have referred, so I am sure that reasonable men on the opposite side will admit that much of what we now hear as to the country being depopulated and on the verge of ruin, must be taken subject to a heavy discount. Were these hon. gentlemen sitting on the Government benches, they would speak in more cheerful tones, they would then show us the other side of the shield. I claim that the exodus referred to is not peculiar to this country. There has always been, and there is now on a larger scale than ever before, a movement of population from northern to southern and western countries; from countries with a limited varieties of industries to countries which are more populous, and which offer more avenues to wealth. There is an exodus from northern to southern and western Russia; from Norway and Sweden, which are not at all over-populated, to southern and western countries; from New England to the south and west, and if Canada became part of the United States, it is not improbable that this exodus would not only continue, but would proceed with increased volume, as travelling facilities become greater. It has already been shown by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me that there has been for years past a movement of population from the northern and eastern States towards the west and south, and to such an extent has this been going on, that, as has been demonstrated by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), and others, that the Eastern States similarly situated as to climate, soil and production with our own Maritime Provinces, show a much less decennial increase in population, than do the Provinces. Allusion has been made to Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, which have been compared in point of increase of population with the Maritime Provinces. For example the official census shows that the State of Maine in 1870 had a population of 626,415, and in 1880 had a population 648,936, an increase of 22,521, equal to an increase of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the decennial period. Now take Nova Scotia, which had, in 1871, a population of 387,800, and in 1881, 440,572, an aggregate increase of 52,772, equal to an increase per cent. of 13.6 against 3.5 in Maine. Again, looking at the State of New Hampshire, which had in 1870 a population of 317,277, and in 1880 had 346,991, giving an aggregate increase of 29,714 or 9.3 per cent.; compare this with New Brunswick which had in 1871 a population of 285,594, and in 1881 had increased to 321,233, being an aggregate increase of 35,639, equal to 12.5 per cent. as compared with New Hampshire giving 9.3. Once more, take the State of Vermont, which had in 1870 a population of 330,575, and in 1880 it numbered 332,286, giving an aggregate increase of 1,711, equal to $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent.; now contrast this with the tight little Island of Prince Edward, which had in 1871 a population of 94,021, and in 1881 a population of 108,891, making an aggregate increase of 14,870, equal to 15.8 per cent., against $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. in Vermont. But flattering as these comparisons are to our own old Maritime Provinces, there exists cases of still greater disparity in favor of Canada. Take for example the following cities of the United States: Bangor, Maine, a city regarded as of considerable importance, had in 1870 a population of 18,289 and in 1880 it was 16,856, or a decrease, in ten years, of 1,433. Burlington, Vermont, had in 1870 a population of 14,387 and in 1880 it had gone down to 11,365, a decrease of 3,022, and yet these two cities have had for the last 120 years unrestricted trade with the whole United States, so with other numerous towns in the Eastern States, such as Belfast, Camden, Ellsworth, and others of Maine, Adams in Massachusetts, Burlington in Vermont, and Fond du Lac in Wisconsin, &c. Not only in the old Eastern States but away to the west and south all over the Union are there dottings of this character. Whilst speaking of cities, supposing we compare Portland, Maine, with Halifax, similarly situated, and, at the present moment, to some extent rival ports. Well, in 1870, Portland had a population of 31,213, and in 1880 it was 33,810, a total gain in the decade of only 2,597, equal to 8.3 per cent. Halifax city had in 1871 a population of 59,582, which in 1881 had increased to 36,100, a total gain of 6,518, and equal to 22 per cent., against an increase of 8.3 per cent. of Portland in the same period. But, Sir, is it not a little singular that whilst our friends opposite appear only to find depletion and exodus of the population of Canada as they estimate it, they never appear to take into account the compensations which Canada receives in continuous additions to her population by immigration, whether it is that our friends knowingly ignore this important factor to the credit side, or unintentionally neglect it, I cannot say; but the fact remains, that we have in Canada very much more than compensation for the outward movement of population. For example, I find from the official statements of the Department of Agriculture that for the calendar year of 1887, 3,354 subjects of the United States came across the border and settled in Canada; and Canadians who had lived, and apparently settled, in the United States for a number of years, returned to their native Canada during the same year to the number of 19,677; and in this way Canada has drawn off from the population of the United States to herself, 23,011 persons. Nor is this all; for in addition Canada has received from Europe, by immigration, for the year mentioned, 84,526 settlers, who have added to the wealth of the country by bringing with them \$3,879,908. All these circumstances, highly satisfactory as they are to all Canadian people, are by no means the only, or even the greatest or most important, factor by which the population of Canada is being surely and steadily augmented, neither need there be any alarm at an alleged exodus. In point of natural increase our families are much larger in Canada than in the United States. We can spare thousands annually, and yet increase in numbers and wealth. Besides, the thousands who go do a work for their native land. The example of their industry, frugality, intelligence and virtue inspire our neighbors with respect for the country that rears such sons and daughters. The point for us to consider is, not how many go, but how many remain. It is a certain fact that the population of Canada is increasing. The financial position and public debt of the country has been a fruitful subject of deprecation with our friends of the opposite side, and the matter has been so fully discussed pro and con that I do not intend to impose on the indulgence of the House by adding materially to the array of figures already presented on both sides. It must be admitted that the debt of our country has increased, but the points to be asked are, have we not value for it? and, is it not wise, at times, to incur debt? We have the grandest canal system in the world; railways connecting the whole country together, such as no other country with so limited a population ever constructed; lighthouses; public works of all kinds which have developed the country. Our most progressive farmers borrowed money at 6 per cent. or 7 per cent. to improve their property, may it not be wise that the country should borrow at half that rate for the same purpose? Of course there is a limit here that should be regarded. Comparing our financial status with that of other countries, Canada occupies the proud position of standing at the head of the list of all countries whose securities are sought for in the great money markets of the world. Comparing, in like manner, our public indebtedness with that of our neighbors, it does not appear to be the terrific, grinding, destructive volume our friends have, year after year, been seeking to make it.

Mr. McKEEN.

Compared with other countries, it is found that the debt of England represents exactly $110 per head; the debt of Austria $60 per head; the national debt of the United States, to which our friends opposite bid us look with admiration, is $30 per head, to which has to be added the State debts of $17 per head (debts which, in Canada, are provided for in behalf of the Provinces of the Dominion) which brings the debt of the United States up to $47 per head. In Canada the gross debt (not the net debt) is $45 per head, against $47 in the United States. In addition to this, the municipalities of the United States are burdened with very much heavier debts than are the municipalities of this country. Again, the debt of the Australian colonies is $195 per head, against $45 in Canada. Then, looking at our public debt, comparatively, in relation to its percentage on the national wealth, it is found that the debt of the United Kingdom is 9 per cent. of the wealth of the country; in France it is 11 per cent., and the public debt of France and Spain amount to 24 per cent. of the national wealth. Now, Sir, contrast these with the debt of Canada, which is a fraction below 6 per cent. of the country's wealth. In addition to this the additional and very important fact is to be added, that in no country in the world is the aggregate of wealth and the comforts of life so equally distributed amongst the whole people as in Canada. Then, Sir, it must be conceded that this country of ours is on the whole a most desirable country to live in, and a country most attractive to freemen of industrious habits. I invite the most casual observer of passing events to contrast the happy peacefulness prevailing amongst the industrial classes in this country, in comparison with the working classes of the United States, and the amity and good feeling which prevail in Canada between capital and labor, in comparison with these relationships in the former country, as demonstrated by the almost continuous, huge strikes and dangerous strifes that prevail there. Permit me to invite the attention of the House for a few moments to the condition of affairs in Nova Scotia. What undoubted evidence have we as to its actual condition? Without recalling what has already been brought forward by hon. members who have preceded me, I quote from authorities which hon. members of the Opposition cannot but regard as conclusive. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued under authority of the Government of Nova Scotia in 1886, and being official in character, should be a sufficient guarantee as to the facts it assumes to furnish. The extract from this official publication quoted by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) in the course of this debate, shows that Nova Scotia is a most desirable country for farming enterprise, and that practical farmers with small capital may easily possess themselves of good and comfortable homes, and by energy, industry and enterprise, may make for themselves fortune and position in that country in a few years, such as they could not obtain in a lifetime in Great Britain. And in addition, the same high authority informs intending emigrants from Europe, as follows, on page 27:—

"The information contained in the foregoing pages may be relied on as a correct and unexaggerated description of the Province of Nova Scotia, and will, we believe, be found sufficient to enable any man of ordinary intelligence to form a very good idea of the general character of the country, its climate, resources, &c., and to see that for a man of energy and industry, combined with a small amount of money capital, no other part of America offers the same inducements, or presents the same advantages."

And yet, again, in reference to the condition of laborers' wages in Nova Scotia it says, on page 28:—

"Skilled labor is in demand in the Province, no matter whether it consists in the art of digging a ditch properly, or in manufacturing and putting together the most delicate kinds of mechanism. All classes of working people who understand the particular business in which they have been educated, either theoretically or practically, may succeed here if they are willing to put their knowledge to practical use. In short industry in any business will, in Nova Scotia, meet with a sure reward."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this witness is true, there is a reasonable amount of prosperity in Nova Scotia, the unskilled laborer, the farmer, the miner, and mechanic and the fishermen have good prospects ahead. The witness is true, and the people, like people everywhere else, desiring a larger measure of prosperity are fairly well satisfied. The people of Nova Scotia and of the Island of Cape Breton, in particular, have proved pretty conclusively, that they are satisfied, and that the Government is doing its best to promote their prosperity. But we have been told by the hon. member for South Oxford and by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., that the people of Nova Scotia were bribed by the hon. Minister of Finance, that were it not for the large Government grants given to this Province, he, the hon. Minister of Finance, would not have a corporal's guard supporting him in this House. Sir, I admit having listened to the speeches of these hon. gentlemen with a good deal of interest, and am willing to make large allowance for statements made in the heat of debate or hastily spoken; had these charges been made last year, when these gentlemen were suffering from the disappointment of defeat, when the causes of their defeat and their consequent inability to provide the position and offices which had been so freely promised their supporters had to be explained to the country, they might fairly have been regarded as of trifling moment; but now, Sir, the slanders are becoming monotonous, and judging from the recent records of the election courts can only be characterised as Pharasaical. We are reminded of the old adage, "that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones." I, cannot, however, in justice to the people I represent allow such gross aspersions to pass unchallenged; in so far as these reflections bear upon the people of Nova Scotia proper they have been fully met and dispelled by the hon. junior member for Halifax, who in the course of his eloquent speech told this House that the gold had never been coined that would buy the people of Nova Scotia. In so far as the people of the Island and County of Cape Breton are interested, a little sober reflection would, I think, have shown both these hon. gentlemen, that they had fallen into a grave error, gross and groundless aspersions of bribery which they have thrown at the people of Cape Breton. Will these hon. gentlemen inform the House, what was the bribe that bought the people of Cape Breton Island in 1882? When after four year's experience of the present Administration and the National Policy, they sent up to Ottawa a solid phalanx to support the Government? Can they point to any particular or especial grant then made to seduce the electors? What were the bribes by which the people were seduced in 1887, when after another four year's experience they sent up four supporters of the Government's fiscal policy against one in Opposition? Do these gentlemen refer to the railway then in course of construction through the Island. Why, Sir, this was a public work which had been before this House for years, even so far back as the administration of hon. gentlemen Opposite, and when it was being openly requested upon the consideration of this Government and the House, the claims of Cape Breton to a railway received the sanction and support of no less than the hon. absent leader of the Opposition, who said, that he fully sympathised in the justice of Cape Breton's claim to a railway. Was that bribery of the people of Cape Breton? And did the hon. leader of the Opposition propose to take a hand in this bribery? Surely not, and if the Government found that in this matter they had the rather extraordinary occurrence of the support of the gentlemen opposite to the measure they, the Government, could have no better assurance of the entire concurrence of the country. Sir, if the Government was guilty of bribing the people of Cape Breton with a railway, it does not lie with the hon. members for South Oxford and Queen's to expose the association of their own side in that bribe. I might here confidentially state to those hon. gentlemen the bribe by which the allegiance of the people of Cape Breton was charmed away from the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs to supporting the present Government. This bribe, Sir, was the National Policy, which is giving our people increased prosperity, which has given us comforts and comparative plenty instead of misery and starvation. This, Sir, is the bribe, if bribe it may be called, which has won from our people their support to the present Minister of Finance. Now, Sir, what are the principal facts regarding this public work? The Island of Cape Breton, one of the oldest colonies of North America, having an area double that of Prince Edward Island, has within its limits the most valuable coal deposits in the Dominion, valuable mines of iron, copper and other minerals, some of the finest harbors in the world, and the nearest ports of the Dominion to Europe, and an extent of coast line and fisheries unsurpassed by any physical division of equal area in the world. This island, Sir, has not to-day, with all these natural resources, and a thrifty industrious population of 90,000, has not, I repeat, one mile of Government railway within its bounds in operation. True, it has about sixty-five miles of private railways engaged in operating the collieries, but not one mile of public railways. So, unconscious are we in Cape Breton of having yet received what is our just dues that our people of all shades of politics are at this moment petitioning this Government and Parliament, and also the Provincial Government, and Legislature of Nova Scotia, to grant us subsidies such as will enable us to extend the present line in course of construction from Canso to Sydney south-eastwards, so as to form connection between all the working collieries and the Government railways, and between these and the winter port of Louisbourg on the south and the magnificent harbor of East Bay to the west. I may here add that the extension to Louisbourg will give to this country the use of the most easterly winter port in the Dominion, for communication with Newfoundland and Europe. In short, we have won but an instalment of what should have been given to the Island long ago, and which both parties in this House have admitted to be justly due us and in the interest of the country. Now, Sir, in view of these facts I wish to ask if the hon. members for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and Queen's (Mr. Davies) are prepared to re-assert that nine-tenths of the entire clergymen of Cape Breton County, who supported the Government in the last general election, gentlemen whose mission it is to elevate the standard of morality and truth, were bribed by consideration so contemptible. The question is now being asked to this House would not unrestricted reciprocity with the United States improve the present prosperity of this country? As being personally interested in the coal industry, and in which also the interests of the County of Cape Breton, which I have the honor to represent, are largely involved, I propose to show from figures under my hand how this industry will be affected by the proposed change. In this matter we have already had experience of the operation of a free market with the United States which was open to us under the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 to 1865. We have also an opportunity of contrasting the trade of this period, with periods preceding and subsequent to these dates; and also contrasting both with the development of the coal trade under the present National Policy. First, I propose giving the figures of our coal trade with the United States under each of these periods. Taking the four years preceding the treaty, that is, 1850 to 1853 inclusive, we exported from Nova Scotia to the United States a total of 442,753 tons or an average annual export of 110,638 tons. Taking the first seven years of the treaty, 1854-60, which preceded the civil war in the States, we exported a total of 950,586 tons, or an annual average of 135,788 tons equal to an increase average of 22½ per cent, over the preceding not treaty period. During the civil war, 1861 to 1865, we exported a total of 1,492,534 tons or an annual average of 298,507 tons for the five war and last treaty years, equal to an average increase of 119 per cent. on the non-treaty period. It is important to note here that increase of sales in the war period was abnormal and not due to any ordinary course of trade, which is proved by contrasting with the increase of the first seven years of the treaty. The year 1865 closed the treaty and also the war, and from 1866 to 1871 our coal entering the United States markets paid a duty of $1.25 per ton. And in the sixth year period, 1866 to 1871, we sold to the United States a total of 1,561,972 tons or an annual average of 260,329 tons, being a decrease of only 13 per cent. on the sales of the war period. It is here important to bear in mind that under that high tariff of $1.25 per ton the United States bought more largely of our coal than at any time, either before or after, except in the war period, and was, as we have seen, but a comparatively small reduction on that. Again, in 1872 they reduced their duty to 75 cents per ton, and in the first three years of this reduced tariff, viz., 1872 to 1874, our total sales to them amounted to 557,187 tons or an annual average of 185,729 tons, equal to a reduction of 28½ per cent. in these first three years of a reduced tariff, as compared with the higher tariff period of $1.25 per ton. Now, taking the period of 12 years following, that is from 1875-86 inclusive, still under the lower tariff, our total sales to them in these 12 years aggregated 1,018,584 tons, or an annual average of 84,882 tons, equal to a decrease of 54 per cent. as compared with the preceding three years, 1872-74, and compared with our sales to them under a duty of $1.25 per ton these 12 years under the lower tariff show a falling off in sales equal to 67 per cent. How do these incontrovertible facts and figures strike our friends opposite? How do they propose to account for these circumstances in relation to our coal sales to the United States. With the hon. member for South Oxford in 1878 tariff was nothing, and they were helpless to aid the depressed commerce of the country. Evidently they must find the solution of the circumstances which I have enumerated in something else than tariff, and I will here take the liberty of informing them that the solution is to be found in the wondrously rapid development of the coal production of the United States following the close of their civil war. Let me invite the attention of the House for a few moments to this. First, I find in looking over the coal areas possessed by different countries that the area in Great Britain is 11,900 square miles, in Nova Scotia, 18,000 square miles, and in the United States, 195,403 square miles, and, moreover, that this enormous deposit in the latter country is very fairly distributed over the entire face of the country, being found divided amongst 31 States and Territories out of a total 47 States and Territories. Now, I invite attention to the development of this rich possession of our enterprising neighbors. In 1864 the total coal production of the United States was 16,472,410 tons, and in 1870 it was 32,863,690 tons—an aggregate increase of 100 per cent. in the first six years following the close of the war. In 1871 their production was 34,081,415 tons, and in 1873 this production reached 49,130,584 tons; that is to say, in the 13 years from 1871 to 1873, inclusive, their aggregate increase was 63,399,049 tons, equal to 195 per cent. increase over that of 1871. Then in the next eight years, 1879 to 1886 inclusive, we find that the production in 1879 was 59,808,393, and that this went up by yearly bounds of tens of millions until in 1886, for which I have been able to procure returns, the production attained the overwhelming volume of 106,730,033 tons, an aggregate increase in these eight years over the preceding eight years of 57,650,449 tons, or an increase of over 117 per cent. And again, from the official figures just quoted, it is seen that the increase of the production of the coal mines of the United States for the year 1886, as compared with the production of 1864, gives an aggregate of 90,307,623 tons, equal to an increase of 548 per cent. in 23 years. This wonderful development of the coal production of the United States, taken in connection with the increased railway facilities to the Eastern or coast towns and cities in the Union, proves conclusively that these markets are wrested from us beyond hope of recovery. But if further evidence of this fact be required, I beg to call the attention of the House to the recent statements of Hon. Congressman Scott, reputed one of the largest coal operators of Pennsylvania, who in his advocacy of having all coals placed upon the free list, said, that the coal owners of the United States could afford to admit provincial coals into their markets duty free, because for every ton of theirs thus displaced, they would sell ten tons in the markets of Canada. In addition to this, I have the opinions of the United States mercantile houses, which for the past 30 years have handled all the provincial coal sold in their country. I have recently been in communication with these firms and they are unanimous in the expression of the opinion that under any conditions of trade it is impossible for us of the Province of Nova Scotia to regain any important footing in their markets. Sir, with the permission of the House, I beg to read a letter which I hold in my hand in further confirmation of this, from one of these firms which is an authority on the subject. This letter was written in reply to one from a friend of mine, asking what would be the effect of the admission free of coal from Nova Scotia into the United States. It is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—You ask my views respecting the effect of a removal of the duty upon Nova Scotia coal upon the trade in the United States.

"At present the importation of coarse coal from Nova Scotia amounts to nothing. I think it was less than 1,000 tons during the year 1887 at this port, and very little, if any, at other ports, excepting at Portland, from the Bay of Fundy Mines, for the Grand Trunk Railroad.

"The prices of our domestic bituminous coals are so low that they practically shut out all the product of the Provinces, even without a duty.

"Cumberland coal from Baltimore, Clearfield from Philadelphia, and West Virginia coals from Norfolk and Newport News, are all of superior quality for our uses to any coal from Nova Scotia, and will bring 50 to 75 cents per ton more in our markets. At the same time, the cost at ports of consumption has been less than the cost of the best coals from Nova Scotia delivered here. At New York, and all ports south and west of here, the margin of cost is in favor of domestic coals, and against the cost of Nova Scotia, as freights would be lower for the former and higher for the latter than for Boston and Eastern ports.

"Take for example Cumberland coal in 1887:—

| | Per ton. |
|--|----------|
| Cost f. o. b. at Balto..... | $2 60 |
| Current freight through the shipping season..... | 1 10 |
| And discharging..... | 0 25 |

From vessel here—cost..... $3 95

"The Clearfield and Kanawha coals sell at 15 to 25 cents per ton lower. Large season contracts were made last year to fit consumers' wants, at $1.75 to $3.90 per ton, delivered.

"In contrast with the above—

| | Per ton. |
|---|----------|
| Acadia coal (the highest cost in Nova Scotia), f. o. b. at Pictou..... | $2 50 |
| Current freight in 1887..... | 1 90 |

Cost here.... $4 40

"Albion costs $2.25 f. o. b. (and is worth at least 25 cents less), costs $4.15 here. The Cape Breton coals contain more sulphur than any of the above-named coals, and the former trade here from that quarter was for gas purposes, which is now monopolised by the rich gas coals from Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The removal of the duty would not secure that trade. For other purposes Cape Breton coals will not bring so much in our markets by 50 to 75 cents per ton as our domestic coals.

| | Per ton. |
|---------------------------------|----------|
| Cost at Cape Breton—lowest..... | $1 50 |
| Current freight in 1887..... | 1 75 |

Delivered here..... $3 25

The small quantity brought here (mainly culm at 30 cents per ton duty) comes forward by small trading vessels at low freights. Sales of say, fifty thousand tons here, would require tonnage outside of the ordinary trading vessels, and would enhance freight 25 to 50 cents per ton, to be added to the foregoing figures.

"In my opinion, the removal of the duty would furnish a market for a limited quantity only, say not over 50,000 tons, and I cannot at present see where half that quantity could be disposed of. I wish it were otherwise, as my long connection with the Nova Scotia coal trade, more than forty years, would increase the business of my firm very much if sales from your quarter could be made, and would give us an advantage over all our competitors in the coal trade.

"Another view of the case: The removal of the duty here by reciprocity would necessitate the same action by the Canadian Government, and admit our domestic coals from Pennsylvania and Ohio into Canada, to the exclusion of your coals, and very seriously impair trade from your mines.

"A large quantity of coal is at present sent into the Upper Provinces, paying a duty of 60 cents per ton. If made free of any duty, such shipments would practically monopolise the trade in the Upper Provinces. If the free trade were made to apply to English coal, as would naturally be the case, a considerable quantity would be brought out in trading ships and steamers at ballast rates, and the sales from your mines would be confined to the local trade in the Lower Provinces."

This demonstrates that, in so far as the coal trade between this country and the United States is concerned, the relative circumstances of the two countries are entirely changed since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty; and the enormous production of the latter country has forced this change, not only upon the coal trade but apparently upon other industries as well. For instance, the official returns show that the total export of farm produce from the United States in 1860 was but $40,000,000, while in 1886 this class of exports reached a value of $500,000,000. It therefore does not appear very likely that any very extended market will be found in the United States for Canadian farm produce in opposition to their own enormous surplus. However this is a branch of the discussion which I leave entirely to the hon. members who have a more practical acquaintance with it. Now, if hon. gentlemen will bear with me a little while longer, I will give a short sketch of the Nova Scotia coal trade during the period of reciprocity versus that of the National Policy. For the five years, from 1869 to 1873, our total sales were 3,343,510 tons, or an annual average of 668,702 tons. For the five years, 1874 to 1878 inclusive, our total sales were 3,480,705 tons, or an annual average of 696,141 tons, equal to an increase in the latter period over the former of 4 per cent. Then, again, taking the eight years, 1879 to 1887 inclusive, our total sales were 10,635,489 tons, or an annual average of 1,329,436 tons, giving an average increase for the eight years under the National Policy, compared with the preceding four years, equal to 91 per cent. And comparing the Reciprocity Treaty, under the peculiarly favoring abnormal circumstances, with the National Policy period, we find that the sales of the former period give us an increase of only 46 per cent. as against 91 per cent. under the National Policy period, so that this makes it clear as noon day that reciprocity under more favorable circumstances than now exist, failed in giving us anything like the prosperous results which the National Policy has produced upon this industry, and perhaps the best feature of this increase is that under the National Policy our coal sales to the upper Provinces have increased from 80,000 to 650,000 tons, being 50 per cent. in excess of what we sold to the United States under reciprocity. Now, Sir, with this large increase of up-borne interprovincial trade, who will venture to assert that there has not been something like a corresponding downward trade? These facts should disprove the assertion which has been made by our opponents in Nova Scotia, that we buy $10,000,000 worth of goods from the upper Provinces which are paid for in gold said to have come from the United States. And yet, Sir, in the face of such incontrovertible facts as these, we have hon. gentlemen opposite assuring us that the National Policy has not increased our coal sales by a single ton. Now, Sir, at the risk of trespassing on the time of the House I would refer to another point which has been urged as showing that the National Policy did not assist our coal sales inasmuch that more coal is imported into Canada than before it. Now, Sir, I have already shown that our inter-provincial coal consumption has increased largely from our native resources; and if there be an increased importation of the article, what does this fact point to? Why, Sir, it can lead to one and but one conclusion, that is; that as coal is mainly consumed as a motive power, the National Policy, as a financial reform, has accomplished all that is claimed for it. It has already been shown that it took a number of years for the United States, under a high protection tariff, to drive our coal out of their markets. Now, Sir, is it too much to assume that, with the further and more rapid development of our mines, under the protection extended to us under the National Policy, and by the increased facilities of transportation of our coal through canals, and the opening up of railways, in a few years hence we may capture from the United States the large and important export trade they now have with us in coal, and which they are strenuously exerting themselves to increase? We find them competing with us in our own markets, quoting prices at Montreal and other points of competition at rates less than I am led to believe they sell for in their own country, after deducting cost of transportation. In closing my remarks under this head, I may say that, upon the ground stated, I believe our coal industry, under unrestricted reciprocity, would be seriously injured, and this injury would be felt by all classes, particularly such as the farmers of Prince Edward Island, who find one of their best home markets for their produce in our mining towns on the coast of Cape Breton. I may say here that we are also importing largely of farm products, such as hay, butter, oats and cheese from the Montreal markets to supply the requirements of our mining population. There is another industry on which I shall touch but slightly, as it has been dealt with ably by hon. gentlemen who preceded me and who are better acquainted with it than I am, and as it will be also treated by hon. gentlemen who will follow me. I refer now to our fishing industry, which is one of the most important of this Dominion. It has been said that this industry has been seriously injured, that it is becoming demoralised, and that our fishermen are unable to obtain remunerative wages, owing to the present depression of trade. If you will allow me I will quote a few figures from the Fisheries report, showing the number of men employed, the capital invested and the values of the products of Nova Scotia for the years 1882 to 1881 inclusive:

| | | $ | $ |
| 1881 | 27,526 | 1,959,259 | 6,214,756 |
| 1882 | 28,503 | 2,127,589 | 7,131,418 |
| 1883 | 29,100 | 2,360,989 | 7,689,375 |
| 1884 | 29,997 | 2,670,938 | 8,763,779 |
| 1885 | 29,905 | 2,545,255 | 8,283,923 |
| 1886 | 27,490 | 2,370,537 | 8,415,361 |

If we take the last two years of free fishing to the United States fishermen within our three-mile limit, viz, 1883 to 1884, we find that, taking the value of the fishing product and the number of men engaged, it amounted in 1883 to $ 61 per man, and in 1884 to $292 per man. Then, take the year 1886, the first of Canada's protecting her shore limits, and when a duty was simultaneously imposed upon our fish in the United States. It is found that the fishery product of Nova Scotia is $306 per man engaged, showing that the protection afforded our fishermen is already being realised. The above figures, which have but recently been brought to my notice, bear out the views of intelligent fishermen with whom I have conversed upon this subject in my own county, and who are emphatically of the opinion that the protection to our three-mile limit is of more value to them than free American markets ever can be. I very much regret that the Fishery report for 1887 is not yet published, as I have strong reason to believe it will show superior results to the years above quoted. We find from the trade returns that the exports of fish and fish products from Nova Scotia from 1882 to 1887 inclusive, were as follows :

| Year. | United States. | Great Britain. | West Indies and other Countries. | Totals. |
| | $ | $ | $ | $ |
| 1882..... | 1,353,773 | 635,437 | 2,448,454 | 4,437,364 |
| 1883..... | 1,883,546 | 564,582 | 2,639,370 | 5,087,498 |
| 1884..... | 2,145,622 | 555,739 | 2,614,696 | 5,316,057 |
| 1885..... | 1,990,309 | 633,085 | 2,120,482 | 4,743,876 |
| 1886..... | 1,180,103 | 608,621 | 1,984,942 | 3,773,666 |
| 1887..... | 1,358,024 | 717,485 | 1,823,568 | 3,899,077 |

Now, let us summarise this and it is found that in the last two years of our fish being admitted free into the markets of the United States that the product of our catch yielded $261 per man, and in 1884, $292 per man, and that 1886 gave a product equal to $386 per man engaged, and against $292 in 1884, so that there is little cause for the statement that our fishery industry is becoming unremunerative. Again the value of the fishery product for 1885 is to the value of the fishing material employed, viz., vessels, boats, nets, &c., in the ratio of 325 per cent. In 1886 the value of the fishery product is to the value of the material employed in the ratio of 355 per cent., that is a return of 355 per cent. in 1886 as against a return of 325 per cent. in 1885. Thus, these two facts, the dividend per man engaged and the amount value realised for the capital engaged, proves conclusively that as our coal sales in the United States increased largely under a duty of $1.25 per ton, whilst our neighbors had not a supply of their own product equal to the demand, and that our coal sales fell off rapidly under a duty of only 75 cents per ton, precisely is this repeated in the case of our fish, which is increasing in value to our fishermen, in spite of the duty, and will continue to do so, as long as the Americans have not a supply equal to the demand, within their own borders. In conclusion, looking at the proposed unrestricted reciprocity from another point of view, have we any substantial reasons for supposing we can obtain unrestricted reciprocity if we ask it? Have we not time and again in the past made overtures for reciprocity, and every time received nothing better than diplomatic snubs in return for our humility? Hence, may we not reasonably conclude that if our neighbors would now listen to a proposal, such as contained in the resolution before the House, it would only be on account of the changed condition of circumstances within themselves. That it would be because of their now enormous surplus of production in the lines of almost every industry and art known to civilisation. They would reckon upon controlling our markets as well as their own in all things, and make our people their customers, not they ours. Nay, further, suppose the great extensive trade which the advocates of this scheme picture us under their proposals become reality, and that our exports went out from us, and imports reach us under an unrestricted reciprocity, what of our revenue necessary for public purposes? With the loss of income from customs, how is the public revenue to be sustained? Evidently but by one method, and that is by the old time and universally hated method of direct taxation. Upon this point I entirely concur with the hon. senior member for Halifax, Mr. McKEEN.

when he says that no party in this country would stand twenty-four hours if they went to the people with direct taxation on their banners. And I say deservedly so. Judging from what I have heard of this debate, I am quite persuaded that we could not enter upon this proposal of unrestricted reciprocity without demoralising our manufactures and general industries, and dissipating the capital invested in them. Those industries which have been built up and established by years of patient toil and in the face of strong opposition. It would endanger the sweeping away of these numerous enterprises that give happy homes of plenty to thousands of industrious toilers and their families. Industries, Sir, which have given Canada a place in the front ranks of civilised nations. I say, Sir, let us beware how we pull down the house which it has taken ten years to build. For my constituents and for myself we stood by it in laying the foundation stone, and speaking for them as I know them, I say we will stand now by its defence and security.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At this hour, I do not object to the adjournment, especially as I take it, from my hon. friend's moving the adjournment, that we will have the pleasure of hearing him to-morrow, and I should like to hear him at his very best, and I know what that very best is; but I think it is time that we should be getting to an end of this debate. I think this is the fifteenth day, and we have—and I do not regret it—set aside all other business in order to discuss this question exhaustively. Still, the Session is creeping on, and we are getting to the busy season, and I should be glad if the hon. gentleman could come to some arrangement by which we could close the debate to-morrow night.

Mr. LAURIER. All I can say is that we are just as anxious on this side of the House as the hon. gentleman is on his side, to come to an end of the debate, but I do not think I would be justified in pledging myself and pledging this side of the House that we shall come to an end to-morrow. We shall endeavor to bring the debate to as speedy a close as possible, in all probability I can say this week—not to-morrow, but the day after to-morrow, at all events. We shall do our best to have as busy a sitting to-morrow as possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course we must have a long sitting to-morrow. We have been very careful of our health thus far, and I think we can afford to sit late to-morrow. I would like very much to come to an arrangement by which the debate shall be closed to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, we will try and do what we can. I would be very happy to communicate with the hon. gentleman to-morrow, and see if we can come to a conclusion, but I would not like to pledge myself at this moment, without knowing how many of our friends on this side desire to speak.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman is not able to come to an arrangement of that kind, because it would compel us to sit late, as we must get on with the public business. We have given the whole time, for the last fortnight or three weeks, to this question, and we did that in consequence of the importance of the motion itself, especially, in consequence of its being moved by a gentleman holding the high position of the hon. mover. If we had not done so, the debate would have gone on during the opening days of the Session, and we would have done a great deal of business. Therefore, I think I can appeal to the hon. gentleman opposite to assist us in closing this debate.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure we all fully recognise that the Government have given all the assistance we could desire in this debate, and so far we are grateful, but at this moment I do not feel justified in promising definitely. At all events, I will do my best.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like very much if the hon. gentleman would cross the floor to-morrow and give us some information as to what can be done.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

27-1888-6

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, knows pretty well how many members on that side still desire to speak?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that, but I dare say the hon. gentlemen who sit behind me, if we came to an arrangement, would respect that arrangement.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.50 a. m. (Thursday).

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Thursday, April 5, 1888.

No. 28.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 5th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE GLENGARRY ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court a certified copy of the judgment of the said court in the election of a member to the House of Commons for the Electoral District of the County of Glengarry, wherein Patrick Purcell was appellant, and Alexander Kennedy was respondent, the appeal being allowed, and the ruling, finding and determination of the Hon. Mr. Justice Rose were reversed and set aside.

Upon the Orders of the Day being called,

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. I wish to enquire who is responsible for the delay in the distribution of the French version of the Debates of the House. At the present moment there are 542 pages of the English version, whereas only 176 pages have been translated into French. I am informed upon reliable authority that last year, at the same date, not a single page was in arrear. New translators have been appointed, but whether they are responsible for that, I do not know.

Mr. SPEAKER. The chairman of the Debates Committee ought to answer this question. The House well knows the publication and printing of the Debates in English, as well as their translation into French, are in the hands of a committee.

WRIT FOR THE RUSSELL ELECTION.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the First Minister whether a writ for the election of the County of Russell has yet been issued, and whether a returning officer has been appointed, and who he is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The writ has been ordered, and I have no doubt it has been issued by this time.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to enquire of the Government if it is their intention to lay upon the Table of the House the report that was made by the Minister of Customs in reference to the reduction of duty on those articles upon which the duty had been removed by the American Government? I understand that, some time ago, the American Government, through their consul, made a report—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will please make a motion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will attend to that when I get through.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was really speaking to a question already.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, you cannot, now.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have only a few words to say, Mr. Speaker, on that motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a point of order. The Orders of the Day have been called.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, the Orders of the Day were called.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879, and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other, and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, There is one feature which has universally characterised this debate, in so far as it has been participated in by our colleagues on the other side of the House. Again on this occasion, as on every other occasion, whether in the time of Reformers who have passed away or whether in the time of Reformers still living, the cry for reform has been met with the cry of disloyalty. It might be tempting to retaliate, and to show what is the true inwardness of that exuberant loyalty which ever gushes forth from the other side of the House when facts or arguments are deficient to meet the case at issue. It might be tempting to retaliate and to show that the loyalty of those monopolists who to-day clamor the loudest has no other foundation except the selfish one that the contemplated reform would put an end to, a state of things, which, however lamentable it may be to the country, is eminently profitable to some individuals. It might be tempting to show that loyalty has always been, is, and always will be the last refuge, the supreme argument of those ingrained Tories who imagine themselves born to rule, and who, having long been associated with Government, cannot contemplate the displacement of what Government means for them, patronage, office, subsidies and monopolies, without thinking such a displacement would be rank treason. On the other hand, I have no reason to doubt the sincerity of those prophets of evil who, at every step taken forward by this young country, never fail to see an impending rupture of British connection, and which a long series of sinister predictions, hitherto not fulfilled, have failed to make wiser or braver. Sir, I consider it would be perfectly useless to attempt any argument upon those monopolists or ingrained Tories whose supreme end and object in politics is to enjoy the fleshpots of office and whose loyalty springs from the stomach, but to those well meaning though timid men who incline to advance and still dread change, I would at once say: You who object to reform because you fear the good results will be accompanied by some evil result—are you satisfied to say of this country that nothing is to be risked for its advancement? Is it your opinion that if there be to the south of us inexhaustible fields of wealth, we should be deterred from the ennobling spirit of enterprise by the cowardly consideration that possibly increased prosperity would seduce us from our allegiance? Is yours the position of the man who would starve himself to death lest by eating food he might swallow poison? I also appeal to loyalty. I appeal to the loyalty of all we owe to our origin, to the blood that flows in our veins, to the example of our ancestors and the memories they have left behind them, and he I say who will stand truest to those examples will also stand truest in his allegiance to Queen and country. Let us remember that the great nation from which the greater number among us derive their origin and from which we have the institutions on which we pride ourselves, is so great to-day because at all periods of her history her people never shrank from performing the duty which the hour demanded of them, without fear of the consequences to themselves or to the country. Let us remember that our country, if it has attained the proud position which to-day it occupies, owes it to the unceasing efforts of Reformers of former days, whose every effort was assailed with the same taunt of disloyalty that meets us to-day. Let us look at our position such as it is, let us look at our position squarely and manfully, and if the result is that our position to-day demands reforms, let us, I say, strike for reforms, determined in advance that if in this as in every other matter evil is to be mixed with good, it will be time to grapple with the evil when the evil arises. Once more I say let us look at our position, not such as it ought to be, but such as it is, not such as it is when depicted in the speeches of the Ministerial orators, but such as we hear it every day depicted in the unvarnished talk of the people. With a varied and fertile soil, with a healthy northern climate, with tremendous agricultural resources, with abundant wealth, with unsurpassed lumber facilities, with the most productive fisheries in the world, this ought to be a land of universal prosperity and contentment.

MR. LAURIER.

What is the position to-day? I said a moment ago we have good reason to be proud of our country, proud of her people, proud of her history, proud of her institutions, proud of the position which she has already obtained among the nations of the world; but blind would he be who would fail to see that there is in her otherwise young and healthy body a deep wound that is depleting the very sources of life. When we contemplate that this young country with all her capabilities is losing her population, that every day a hundred of her sons are leaving her shores to seek homes in a country not more favored by nature than our own, the conclusion is inevitable something is wrong which must engage the attention of every one for whom patriotism is not a vain and empty word. Yet with these facts full in view the Government, speaking by the mouth of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, invites Parliament to declare that there is absolutely nothing to do but to keep on the policy under which such a state of things is possible, and we have seen member after member of Parliament rise in his place and declare indeed that there is nothing to do, that everything is for the best. I will not lose one single moment in discussing that point, but I place the assertions made on this side of the House against those made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and leave the decision to the judgment of the people of the country, in the judgment of all the people without exceptions, and all, with the exception, perhaps, of the monopolists, will say that there is something wrong in the condition of this country, that there is something which demands the attention of Parliament and of every one who claims to be a patriot. We have been told, and it is insisted on, that we are a prosperous country, that we are a happy country; and one hon. member, my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), if I remember aright, in dwelling on the great prosperity of this country stated we had no starvation amongst us. Well, Sir, prosperity is a relative term applied to nations as well as to individuals. A man in private life may have affluence in a certain condition of life and yet be in want in a certain other condition of life, and so it is among nations. If you judge us, if you gauge the condition of this country by the standard of older continents I would be quite ready to admit you may be a prosperous country. I grant at once, (and gentlemen opposite are welcome to the admission if they can find any comfort in it) that we have no starvation in this country. We have not any threat of famine, we are not in the condition of China in which country four provinces, some years ago, were carried away by hunger, and we are not in the condition of Ireland. We lose our people, but still we have not lost one-third of our population, as Ireland did in the space of two years. But, Mr. Speaker, the objection and the answer do not meet the point nor do they meet the charge. We have a young, healthy, and energetic and active population on this continent and it is not sufficient that they should be above starvation. Their aim is higher. The charge is not, Sir, that there is a scarcity of natural production, but the charge is, on the contrary, that there is an abundance of natural production, but that there is no issue and no outlet for the surplus beyond what the people consume. The charge is that while the produce is sufficient for our small and limited requirements, it is yet far below the producing capacity of the people. Sir, the people of this country have a right to expect that every child belonging to this country will, when he comes to manhood, find the same labor, and returns for his labor, that he will find on the other side of the line. The people of this country, especially the tillers of the soil, have a right to expect that their labor will always have command of the highest market obtainable in the best and most favored markets of the world. They have a right to expect that the money which, by the necessities of their vocation, they are forced to invest in real estate will return its value, and when we find that there is no labor for every child born in this country, when we find that their labor is insufficiently remunerated, when we find that real estate does not keep up its value but decreases in value, when we find that notwithstanding all attempts made we have not yet succeeded in having any more than 5,000,000 of people on this continent, and when we find that at least 1,000,000 of Canadian born children are to-day citizens of the United States, or are working in the United States, I say again that we must come to the conclusion that there is something wrong somewhere which has to be remedied. Under such circumstances there is to-day a sentiment of irritation and discontent which must be checked, or it may become very serious in a short time to come. We have been told by gentlemen on the other side of the House that what we say to-day is not new. The hon. the Minister of Interior, speaking on that subject in answer to my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), stated that the statements made by my hon. friend were not new and that they had been made in the election of 1882 and 1887. Sir it is perfectly true that those statements are not new. They have been made in 1882 and they have been made at the election of 1887, and my hon. friend might further have added that they were made in the elections of 1877. He might have added that he and his friends came into power because from 1876 to 1878 they blamed the Government of the day, of that time, for the emigration which I admit was then taking place. They blamed the Administration of my hon. friend on my left and stated that if they came to power they would put a stop to this emigration, and when they came to power they were pledged by their own words and their own writings to put a stop to that emigration. Now, Sir, in order to make that point more clear let me refresh the memory of gentlemen on the other side about their speeches anterior to 1878, and I cannot do better than to quote the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and the leader of the Opposition of that day, delivered at Parkdale in the month of July, 1878. These are his very words :

"Here we are not only suffering depression in every trade and industry but our people are leaving the country to seek employment in the mills and manufactories of the United States."

An hon. MEMBER. Read that again.

Mr. LAURIER. I will not read it again, but I will continue :

"Was it not a crying shame that though this country had a fertile soil, a healthy climate, a strong and well educated people and good laws, 500,000 of our own people should have crossed our borders in those years and take up their abode in the United States because they could not find employment here for their skill and energy and enterprise in consequence of the false policy of our rulers."

Sir, if it was a crying shame in 1878 that 500,000 of our fellow men should have crossed our borders to the other side of the line, by what epithet strong enough can we characterise the policy of those men who, bound to put a stop to that sort of thing and bound to stop that exodus, have brought it from 500,000 to 1,000,000. I do not say this, Mr. Speaker, with any view of recrimination. I speak to say that the evil is one of long standing, which must tax our energy and for which we must find some remedy. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that there is discontent prevailing in this land. The causes are at once political and economical. There can be no doubt at all that, in the political aspect, when discontent prevails it is largely due to the manner in which Confederation was forced on such and some sections of the country, and to the manner in which Confederation has been made a tool and an instrument in the hands of gentlemen on the other side to embarrass and to harass some sections of the country. There can be no doubt that in the east of this Dominion one Province at least was dragged into Confederation against her will, and in the hearts of the people of that country the yoke after twenty years is as galling as it was the first day. There can be no doubt at all that in the west the unjust, the unfair and the tyrannical manner in which the Constitution has been abused and violated by the Government, in order to force upon the people of that section of the country an abhorred monopoly, has created a bitterness in the hearts of those people which would have had the most fatal consequences perhaps if, fortunately, the Government, acting as they did yesterday in the matter of the admission of American importations upon the free list, did not in that other instance also burst that policy and adopt a new one and surrender. There is no doubt at all that in the Province from which I come the numerous attempts made by the Government upon the political autonomy of the Province has created distrust and disappointment in the minds of the people. And at the same time there can be no doubt, and we can readily believe it, that if the country had been as prosperous as it should have been, or as prosperous as it is represented to be, a good deal of the discontent which now prevails would have been alleviated, for political causes alone seldom produce serious discontent, unless they affect injuriously the economic condition of the people. If our country had been as prosperous as it is represented to be, if Nova Scotia had found in Confederation the prosperity which was promised to be her lot in it, she would long ago have been reconciled to Confederation. If Manitoba had continued to enjoy the prosperity with which she opened her career, she would have been to-day as cheerful a member of the Confederation as she was ten years ago. But our efforts at increased prosperity have always been baffled. We never have had the measure of success which we expected from our efforts, and what is the reason? The reason is that we have not yet found the economical position necessary to make the country as abundantly productive as it should be. The consuming power of the nation is not adequate to its producing power; and we have not yet found a channel for the increased energy and activity of our people. Under such a condition, when the labor of the people will never yield as much as it would yield under a different economical condition, it is impossible to expect that there will be contentment in the land, or pride in the institutions of the country. The lumberman, the farmer and the manufacturer toil, but their efforts are comparatively barren; and if you ask them what is the economical condition they want in order to make their efforts as fruitful as they should be, they will tell you that it is space—a broader field in which to operate. The fisherman will tell you that if he could send his fish free to Boston and Portland, he would ask nothing more; the farmer will tell you that if he could send his productions to the cities and towns on the other side of the line, which are almost within arm's length, he would ask nothing more; the lumberman will tell you that if he had access to that immense range of territory which needs the products of our forests, he would ask nothing more; and the manufacturer will tell you—the genuine manufacturer, not the monopolist—that all he asks is a fair field and no favor, and that if you remove the barriers which stand in his way, he is ready to compete with the Americans in their own market. During the last summer Mr. Butterworth, who is well known in this country, and who has taken the same view that we take as to the trade relations that should exist between Canada and the United States, speaking on this question in Detroit, made a remark which seemed to me at the time to be singularly true historically. He said this :

"The history of all nations has been a record of efforts to broaden the area of their trade and commerce."

The more we think of this remark, the more we shall be convinced that it is eminently true. Does not the record of mankind show that as soon as a nation obtains its freedom, the energy of the people which had hitherto been consumed in political agitation, is at once turned to labor and industry. At first the producing power of the people exceeds their consuming power, and from that time the nation seeks to broaden its area of trade and commerce. Such was the history of the Italian nations after they obtained their freedom. They gradually extended their trade beyond the walls of their cities until it covered all the lands washed by the Mediterranean and the neighboring seas. Such was the history of Holland in the seventeenth century. After she had freed her neck from the yoke of Spain, although having a population of only 2,000,000 she gradually extended her trade. Such was the case with England. For many years the English people were absorbed in political agitation, and during those years her trade did not increase; but having at last curbed the power of the Throne, asserted the supremacy of Parliament, and secured her political freedom, from that time the history of England became a record of the broadening activity and energy of the British people. The trade of England increased its area until it subdued continent after continent, and to-day it has no limits but the limits of the earth. The history of other nations has been our history. For years and years our people were absorbed in a political agitation for our freedom, and during those years the country made but little progress; but when at last we obtained responsible government and our legislative independence, what took place elsewhere happened here. The energy of the people, which had been previously absorbed in fruitless political agitation, was turned to toil and labor, and from that moment we had to seek for channels and outlets for our surplus energy. The forest, the mine and the sea are the fields to which the labor of our people has been directed. Ours is above all an agricultural country; and as we have abundance of lands at our disposal, vast tracts were every year added to the cultivated soil; and as the number of the tillers of the soil increased and the bulk of our productions became enlarged, there arose correspondingly a demand for new channels and outlets, and from that moment the history of this country became a history of efforts to broaden the area of our trade and commerce. If there is one fact which more than any other has characterised Canadian politics since the concession of responsible government, it is that it has always been the effort of the Canadian people to find new outlets and channels for their increasing energy. I do not mean to say that those efforts have been systematic or premeditated. On the contrary, they have been irregular and spasmodic, now in one direction, and then in another, but they have been a continual and instinctive aspiration to pass from an unnatural to a natural economical position, just as a man who finds himself in a vitiated atmosphere will turn in every direction to get a breath of fresh air without which he cannot live. As soon as the agitation for responsible government abated, as soon as our friends, the Tories—who, loyal in those days as they are in these days, endeavored by riot, bloodshed and fire to intimidate Lord Elgin and prevent the establishment of the new regime—had been forced to submit to the inevitable, the first act of the Government of the day—and it was a Liberal Government—was to seek new channels for the productive energies of the people. The Government found the natural channels of trade blocked and closed. There was to the south of us a great and progressive nation of kindred birth, from which we were separated by mountains of prejudice and a thousand artificial barriers; and the efforts of the Government were directed to removing some of the prejudice and breaking down some of the barriers, and the result was the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, which, although limited in its operation and scope, everyone will admit during its duration marked the golden age of our trade and commerce. That was our first effort towards broadening the area of our trade and commerce. It was eminently successful. However, the treaty was of short duration. As soon as the limit of its term was reached, the American Government gave notice that they would not continue it. Why? Was it because the treaty was not equally advantageous to the Americans? No; it is admitted that the treaty was just as advantageous to them as to us. The notice was given simply on account of the irritation caused in the United States by the unfriendly attitude maintained by England and Canada towards the United States during their great struggle for national life. That the repeal of the treaty was a blow to our commerce, no one has denied, and it has been the constant and unvarying effort of Canadian statesmen ever since to obtain a renewal of that treaty. Indeed, so much is that the case that, at a later day, when protection was adopted as the policy of this country, one of the reasons for its adoption was that thereby we might force the Americans to give us reciprocity. The resolution which formulated the policy of the Government upon that occasion has often been quoted, but it will bear being quoted again, because it is pregnant with meaning in the face of the amendment of the Government on the present occasion. The resolution is as follows:—

"That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home."

How far the policy has been successful we all know, but no doubt hon. gentleman opposite will say it has been in that respect eminently successful.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It only sent a million away.

Mr. LAURIER. The resolution goes on as follows:—

"That will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade, and moving—as it ought to do—in the direction of a reciprocity of tariff with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

Now, if I give an unfair construction to the words of my hon. friend, I will ask him to correct me in due time, but if words have any meaning, what was the meaning of the concluding paragraph of this resolution? Did it mean anything else but that, however desirable protection might be for Canada against other countries, reciprocity, so far as the United States were concerned, was the thing which was desired and desirable. Now, Sir, in view of this resolution, I say that the amendment moved by the Government is not logical. What is the object of that amendment? Its object is to keep the National Policy intact in its entirety. The final object of the National Policy, as declared in the resolution I have just read, was to obtain reciprocity. It is evident that in this object it has not succeeded, and therefore the conclusion is unavoidable that something else must be tried. So ended our first effort to broaden the area of our trade and commerce. But at that time we had something else in contemplation. When notice was given of the abrogation of the treaty, the country was engaged in the discussion of the great question which ended in the Confederation of the Provinces, and there is no doubt whatever that in the minds of those who participated in the bringing about of that great event, the hope existed that Confederation would prove, not only a great political reform, but a great economical reform as well. It was urged on the floor of Parliament at that time that the Provinces, by adopting among themselves free trade, and it was proposed they should, would find an adequate outlet and channel for their surplus energy. The Hon. George Brown, who was at that time a member of the coalition Government, enlarged upon that idea at great length and with great force. After having stated in the debate that the first object of Confederation was to effect a great political reform, he went on to say :

" * * * But secondly, I go heartily for the Union, because it will throw down the barriers of trade and give us the control of a market of 4,000,000 of people. What one thing has contributed so much to the wondrous material progress of the United States as the free passage of their products from one State to another? What has tended so much to the rapid advance of all branches of their industry, as the vast extent of their home market, creating an unlimited demand for all the commodities of daily use, and stimulating the energy and ingenuity of producers? Sir, I confess to you that in my mind this one view of the Union—the addition of nearly a million of people to our home consumers—sweeps aside all the petty objections that are averred against the scheme (What, in comparison with this great gain to our farmers and manufacturers, are even the fallacious money objections which the imaginations of hon. gentlemen opposite have summoned up?) All over the world we find nations eagerly longing to extend their domains, spending large sums and waging protracted wars to possess themselves of more territory, untitled and uninhabited. Other countries offer large inducements to foreigners to emigrate to their shores—free passages, free lands, and free food and implements to start them in the world. We, ourselves, support costly establishments to attract immigrants to our country, and are satisfied when our annual outlay brings us 15,000 or 20,000 souls. But here, Sir, is a proposal which is to add in one day near a million of souls to our population—to add valuable territories to our domain, and secure to us all the advantages of a large and profitable commerce, now existing."

Now, everybody will admit that every word spoken here was perfectly true, that not one iota can be taken out of this passage as containing a single error. Still the theory he here advocated did not succeed, and it failed, not because of any error, but because of other circumstances which were overlooked at the time. I have quoted this in order to show that as far back as 1865, one of the master-minds which this country has produced, was of opinion that it was essential to the trade of the country that we should add to the consuming power of our population. The same idea was enlarged upon by Mr. Galt in the same debate, and he stated, with all the authority which at that time attached to his name as Minister of Finance, that in Confederation he expected to find a substitute for the American markets, which we lost by the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. He said :

" * * * If we require to find an example of the benefits of free commercial intercourse, we need not look beyond the effects that have followed from the working of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. In one short year from the time when that treaty came into operation, our trade in the natural productions of the two countries swelled from less than $3,000,000 to upwards of $20,000,000 per annum, and now, when we are threatened with an interruption of that trade—when we have reason to fear that the action of the United States will prove hostile to the continuance of free commercial relations with this country—when we know that the consideration of this question is not grounded on just views of the material advantages resulting to each country—but that the irritation connected with political events exercises a predominant influence over the minds of American statesmen, it is the duty of the House to provide, if possible, other outlets for our productions. If we have reason to fear that one door is about to be closed to our trade, it is the duty of the House to endeavor to open another; to provide against a coming evil of the kind feared by timely expansion in another direction; to seek by free trade with our own fellow-colonists for a continued and uninterrupted commerce, which will not be liable to be disturbed at the capricious will of any foreign country."

Here, again, there is nothing to say against the theory that was then advanced, but the great expectations which were then entertained did not turn out to be true. Although every Government since that time has endeavored to bring together the East and West of Confederation, to bring about the interchange of the commodities of the east with those of the west, to-day we have not succeeded in developing any trade except a very insignificant one between the east and the west, and the glowing pictures which the men of 1865 drew as to what was to follow their endeavors to bring about that interchange of trade, have remained pictures. What was it that was left out, what was it that was omitted from their calculations? The fact which was omitted was, as has often been pointed out since, the geographical position of the different Provinces of the Dominion. The men of 1865 forgot that no legislative act, no executive decree could suppress the long distances which separate the east from the west; they forgot that nature had interposed, against profitable trade relations between the east and the west, obstacles which no legislation could overcome. Sir, experience is the test of all theory, and, in the view of the experience which we have acquired during the last twenty years, let me show how deluded the men of 1865 were in regard to the hopes which they then entertained. Mr. McGee spoke in the same debate, and he emphasised the same idea which had been already expressed by Mr. Brown and Mr. Galt, and he particularised his meaning by instancing a particular trade, the coal trade of Nova Scotia. After having depicted, in his glowing language, the coal fields of Nova Scotia, he went on to say :

" These exhaustless coal fields will, under this plan—which is in fact our Reciprocity Treaty with the Lower Provinces—become, hereafter, the great resource of our towns for fuel. I see the cry is raised below by the anti-Unionists that to proceed with Confederation would be to entail the loss of the New England market for their coals. I do not quite see how they make that out, but even an anti-Unionist might see that the population of Canada is within a fraction of that of all New England put together, that we consume in this country as much fuel per annum as they do in all New England; and, therefore, that we offer them a market under the Union equal to that which these theorists want to persuade their followers they would lose."

There is not a word to be taken from that. It is quite true that the population of Canada was as great as the population of all New England put together, and that Canada consumes as much fuel as the whole of New England put together, but Mr. McGee had overlooked the fact that the market of New England was at the doors of Nova Scotia, and that the market of Western Canada was too far away to be of any service to Nova Scotia county; and if the valuable life of Mr. McGee had been spared, he would have lived to see Nova Scotia coal, protected by a duty of at least 50 per cent on the price of that coal at the pit's mouth, carried from the east to the west, carried on Government railways at favored rates, in fact at a loss, and he would have seen that not one lump of coal from Nova Scotia ever reached Toronto. We have been told that some few days ago some small quantity did reach Toronto, and that therefore we have developed an inter-provincial trade between the east and the west. I deny it. [I deny that we have succeeded in developing that trade between the east and the west.] We carry some small amount of merchandise between the two sections, but is that the result of Confederation, is it the result of the Union? It is not. [What trade we have between the east and the west is not a natural trade, but is due entirely to the fact that the country has to pay for the freight required to take it between the east and the west. You cannot legislate against nature, and nature has interposed obstacles in regard to the interchange of trade between the east and the west which no legislation can overcome;] and, as year has followed year, it has become more and more evident that the anticipations formed by the men of 1865 were mere delusions, that there could never be any profitable trade between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island on the one side, and the Provinces beyond Quebec on the other. Then, seeing that our efforts had been baffled, seeing that the channels were not opened for trade which we expected, for the first time protection became a practical issue in this country. The advocates of the new idea fondly hoped and, indeed, resolutely asserted that the promulgation of a high tariff would stimulate the creation of so many manufactures that it would bring in a large amount of immigration and would stop our own emigration, that we would find the markets here that we were hoping to obtain elsewhere. And although, during the agitation which took place in 1877 and 1878, all classes were promised that they would profit by the adoption of protection, the farmers were the class who were promised the greatest benefit. Indeed, the National Policy then was made to do duty all round, like the celebrated magic bottle in the hands of the juggler, which supplied wine or spirits, or beer or water, just as the man was a water drinker or a wine drinker, or desired beer or desired whiskey. So the farmers were told that, if we had protection, they would find a market for their products at their doors. The leader of the Opposition at that time, in a speech which he made at Parkhill in July, 1878, said:

"By having all kinds of industries, we would have a great country; the industries would be twice blessed, our sons would be prevented from going to a foreign country to add to its wealth and strength and skill. The fruits of their labor would be exchanged for the fruits of the soil, cities would multiply, and not only would there be a demand for the larger products, such as wheat, flour, cattle, and everything we could raise, but for cheese, butter, eggs, roots and other kinds of small produce. Why was it that land around villages was more valuable than land away from the villages, land about towns more valuable than land in villages, and land about cities more valuable than land in towns? Land about Toronto was not so good, from an agricultural point of view, as it was 30 or 40 miles away from the city, and yet it was more valuable. The reason was because the farmers living near Toronto could get a market for everything they could raise. They were not obliged to send it away to a distance. The nearer the farmer was to the market the cheaper it was for him to send in his goods, and that single illustration would suffice to show how dependent the workmen, manufacturer and farmer were upon each other."

In so far as this language went, it tended to prove that the adoption of protection would develop a large manufacturing industry, and in so far as the hon. gentleman meant to say that a large laboring population is the best market for the agricultural classes, I agree with him. England to-day not only absorbs all her own agricultural products, but drains the agriculture of many other countries besides. New England is very much in the same position. It not only consumes its own agricultural productions, but it absorbs those of many other States and it draws largely from Canada, although the Canadian farmer has to pay a heavy toll on the frontier. But the prediction of the hon. gentleman did not come true. The country was not overrun with the manufacturing class. There was no great increase in immigration. Emigration was not stopped. Many dreams were dispelled, many dreams turned out to be mere deceptions, for it is a matter of fact that many of the principal advocates of protection who prophesied those great results were the victims of their own preaching. In their great anxiety for the success of this new idea, they represented the country as being overrun by manufactures, with magnificent buildings and tall chimneys growing towards the sky as the result of protection. They had represented cities and towns growing out of the ground, and teeming with artisans who would consume everything the farmer could grow, but these expectations did not come out true, and here again there was a failure. What was the cause? Why was it that the great expectations which were entertained of the future of the National Policy, were not realised? Because the agitators of 1877-78 completely lost sight of the fact that modern industries cannot thrive in limited markets. Modern industry in order to thrive must operate in large markets. The principle of modern industry is this, to minimise to an infinitesimal figure the profit upon manufactured articles, and then to increase the aggregate production to an unlimited quantity; in fact the profit upon a single article is always decreased in proportion as the aggregate production is increased. Under such circumstances no one can manufacture to advantage unless he manufactures in large quantities, and he who can manufacture in the largest market is always the cheapest manufacturer; and at the same time the man who can reduce the cost of production by ever so small an amount, will always drive his competitors from the field and will overcome all the barriers opposed to him. That is the reason why the National Policy did not succeed, that is the reason why the manufacturers did not multiply. Why, Sir, our manufacturers, burdened as they are by the tariff, burdened on account of their coal, burdened by their raw material, cannot prosper because they cannot meet the products of free trade countries. They are limited to their own market, and within our own market there is a population of less than 5,000,000; they cannot expand and therefore they cannot thrive. Take the single article of cotton. It was expected that under the favor of the tariff all the great water powers from Kingston to Montreal would be lined with cotton mills, that we would have legion of cotton spinners and cotton weavers. Yet to-day, Sir, we have only 23 cotton mills, with an aggregate of 597,683 spindles. These figures may seem large at first blush, but they are in reality insignificant. In the year 1871, England alone had over 22,000 cotton mills and 34,000,000 spindles; and at this very moment, in the town of Cardiff, one single company is erecting 30 mills with a capacity of more than 650,000 spindles. Therefore our figures are perfectly insignificant; our 23 cotton mills and 600,000 spindles are a mere drop in the ocean. But, Sir, after the manufacturers of cotton started out, they found themselves very soon with an immense surplus which they could not dispose of, and under such circumstances what did they do? They combined, they agreed to reduce the production, they reduced the working hours, they dismissed their employees, and reduced production simply to the requirements of the country; and upon the capital which had been invested, they agreed to pocket the large profits which the tariff gave them over foreign competitors. Yet, as I understand, those profits upon the large capital invested, are not large. Although we have but 23 mills and 600,000 spindles, yet these are too much for the requirements of the country. Not one of these mills is working to its full capacity to-day; they are all working on half time, or at least, not on full time. What is true of cotton is also true of woollens and other industries of the country, so the conclusion is inevitable that the National Policy has not realised the expectations which were entertained at the time. The National Policy has not developed our native industry, and has not created the home market for our agricultural products, as we were promised. But, Sir, the necessity of widening the area of our trade and commerce is so great that we have been looking around in this direction and in the other direction to find new outlets and new channels for our trade. In the debate on the Address during the present Session, the mover of the Address told us with pride that the Government had sent a commissioner to Australia in order to obtain the trade of that country; he told us that they had opened communication with the Argentine Republic in order to establish a trade with that country. What will come of these efforts? What has come of all similar efforts? What has come of our sending commissioners to Brazil, to the West Indies, and to Spain? Nothing, for the very obvious reason that, burdened as we are by our protective tariff, we cannot meet free trade England in those markets; so that the conclusion is inevitable that all the efforts we have made so far to develop our trade and commerce, and to broaden their area, ever since 1867, have been a succession of failures. What, then, is to be done? Is the problem without solution? Is the situation without hope? Is there nothing to be done but to fold our arms and to wait, and to wait, and to wait until something unforeseen and unexpected turns up that will, perhaps, do for us what we have failed to do for ourselves? No, there is a course open to us, and it is to revert to the only means which, in the past, have not failed—it is to adopt the resolution of my hon. friend to my left (Sir Richard Cartwright), it is to open as wide as we can all the avenues of trade between us and the 60,000,000 of people to the south of us. And here again let me recall the language of Mr. Brown. He expected the greatest possible results from the accession of 1,000,000 souls to our market. Here are his words:

"But here, Sir, is a proposal which is to add not only nearly a million of souls to our population, but to add valuable territory to our domain, and secure to us all the advantages of a large and profitable commerce, now existing."

Sir, these expectations would have been realised if natural obstacles had not interposed. But what we expect to-day from the resolution of my hon. friend, is not only the accession of 1,000,000 of souls to our market, it is the accession of 60,000,000 of the most wealthy people on the face of the globe, with not a single molehill to separate us. Yet the Government will not accede to our proposition. The Government have no objection to send commissioners to the antipodes, but they will not send commissioners to Washington. They have no objection to open communication with the Argentine Republic and its 5,000,000 of souls, but they will not open communication with the great nations to the south of us whose trade is a thousand-fold the trade of the Argentine Republic. But they have their reasons for it. They do not act on mere caprice. They have their reasons; they have a standing offer upon the Statute-book that they are ready to open our market, to a certain extent, to the United States if that country will open its market to us. But beyond that they will not go, they stand upon their dignity and they will not budge an inch. I say the offer which is made by the Government to the United States is an offer of a limited character, in natural products only. It is not what we ask for. It is not an offer of unlimited trade, such as is asked for by my hon. friend to my left. My hon. friend has proved, at least to the satisfaction of everyone who will take a calm view of the matter, that unlimited reciprocity is preferable to limited reciprocity. Now, if the Government had secured the limited reciprocity which they have offered to the American Government, we would have been glad to accept it, and the Government would have been entitled to the thanks of the country. But the Government have failed in their efforts. That standing order has been on the Statute-book for nine years now and the Americans have not yet chosen to bite at the bait; but it is not a bait, and I claim that such is an improper expression. It was a threat, it was intended as a threat to the American Government to make them see what evil consequences might fall if they refused to open their doors to us. The bait, however, has been ineffectual, and we must try something else. Now, limited reciprocity may be looked upon as an impossible thing. I have not heard one single voice raised on the other side of the line in favor of limited reciprocity, while eminent statesmen, members of Congress, influential merchants, boards of trade, have again and again pronounced emphatically in favor of unlimited reciprocity, and to-day there are before Congress two measures in that direction. This sentiment, which is evinced by the propositions of members of Congress, is not of yesterday. It dates as far back as 1861. In that year the Board of Trade in the city of New York petitioned Congress in favor of an enlargement of the Reciprocity Treaty which existed at that time. That petition to Congress was acted upon. In 1864 Congress considered a resolution from the Committee on Commerce in favor of an extension of the treaty and a widening of its provisions. That resolution was passed in March, 1864; it was laid over till December of that year, but nothing came of it I am sorry to say. And why? Because of the events which took place in the year 1864, because of the unfriendly attitude maintained by England and by Canada towards the United States in the great struggle in which they were engaged at that time. The Alabama cruisers, fitted out in the port of London, the St. Albans' raid, prepared in Montreal, so far embittered American public opinion that it would not allow that resolution to be carried any further; but of the sentiments which were entertained at that time by the Administration of Mr. Lincoln we can obtain an idea by a letter which was written by Mr. Adams, who was at that time Minister to the Court of St.

James, and which was addressed to Lord John Russell. It was dated November, 1864, and he said this:

"The welfare and prosperity of the neighboring British Provinces are as sincerely desired on our part as they can be by Great Britain. In a practical sense they are sources of wealth and influence for the one country only in a less degree than for the other, though the jurisdiction appertain only to the latter. That this is the sincere conviction of my Government has been proved by its consent to enter into relations of reciprocal free trade commerce with them almost as intimate as those which prevail between the several States of the Union themselves. Thus far the disposition has been to remain content with those relations under any and all circumstances, and that disposition will doubtless continue, provided always that the amity be reciprocated, and that the peace and harmony on the border, indispensable to its existence, be firmly secured."

Those were the sentiments of the Administration of Mr. Lincoln in 1864, those are the sentiments of the Administration of President Cleveland in 1883. Of the sentiments of the Administration of Mr. Cleveland upon this matter we have ample evidence in the correspondence exchanged between Mr. Bayard and Sir Charles Tupper, in the letter addressed by Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles. Although that letter has often been quoted, I quote it again because it seems to be pregnant with meaning. Mr. Bayard, after having alluded to the necessity of settling the disputes arising out of the fisheries question, proposed a settlement in this manner:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations."

These words are pregnant with meaning, but their precise meaning is fully made out by what follows. Mr. Bayard continues:

"The gravity of the present condition of affairs between our two countries demands entire frankness. I feel we stand at 'the parting of the ways' In one direction I can see a well assured, steady, healthful relationship, devoid of petty jealousies, and filled with the fruits of a prosperity arising out of a friendship cemented by mutual interests, and enduring because based upon justice; on the other a career of embittered rivalry, staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility."

What is the meaning of his language, "staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility?" What was in the mind of Mr. Bayard? The only way to settle this question was to remove those causes which threatened "a career of embittered rivalry, staining our long frontier with hues of hostility." I am glad to find that the gentleman to whom the letter was addressed, and who, unfortunately, is not in his seat to-day, Sir Charles Tupper, fully reciprocated those sentiments, and he said in his answer to Mr. Bayard:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Those were the sentiments of two of the gentlemen who were afterwards engaged as plenipotentiaries each for his own respective Government. The American plenipotentiaries made propositions to the British plenipotentiaries. What were those propositions? We have not yet been able to find out, for reasons which have not been explained, the proposals made by the American plenipotentiaries, and those proposals have been kept from the public. But what can they have been? We can imagine what they were; and what else could they have been except a reflection of the sentiment expressed by Mr. Bayard himself, the Secretary of State, when writing to Sir Charles Tupper, what else could they have been but proposals to settle the question upon a basis which would remove from our long frontier the danger of "staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility." What could they be but proposals for the abolition of customs between the two countries? I fail to find they could be anything else, and unless we are shown at a future day that I was in the wrong, and that they were not such proposals, I think we can fairly infer that such were the proposals emanating from Mr. Bayard. Did the British plenipotentiaries answer in that spirit? No. The proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries, and which we have before us, are not in the same spirit which dictated the answer of Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Bayard. Sir Charles Tupper in that answer said that he hoped also that the question would be settled by a "straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries." What was the new proposition by the British plenipotentiaries? Was it for an entire settlement of the question upon that line? No; the proposal was simply an arrangement for greater freedom of commercial intercourse. Sir Charles Tupper's proposal to settle the question was by an entire discussion of the trade relations, but the proposition of the British plenipotentiaries was simply for greater freedom of commercial intercourse than now exists. I say the hands of the British plenipotentiaries were handicapped by some power, either by the British Government or the Canadian Government; but it is manifest that the intentions of Mr. Bayard were not reciprocated by the British plenipotentiaries at the discussion of the treaty. So that, Mr. Speaker, the time is eminently well chosen now to move in the sense indicated by my hon. friend on my left, and send a commissioner to Washington to confirm the principle, if he sees it is possible to confirm it, which would remove hostility from our frontier line. But the Government will not have that. Even if it were offered, as I believe it was offered in the negotiation of the treaty, they will not have it. They will not have unrestricted reciprocity. They maintain their line of restricted reciprocity; they maintain their line upon the offer they have made upon the Statute-book, of giving reciprocity in natural products only. What is the reason that they give for this? The reason they give is that, at present, unrestricted reciprocity would be fatal to our manufactures. Well, Sir, as to that argument, "unrestricted reciprocity would be fatal to our manufactures." But, Sir, it is admitted that unrestricted reciprocity would include reciprocity in natural products, and gentlemen on the other side are ready to give reciprocity in natural products. They admit thereby that reciprocity in natural products would be favorable and would benefit the growers of natural products, or, in other words, that it would benefit the farmers. They say that the interests of the farmers in this instance and the interests of the manufacturers are antagonistic. They admit unrestricted reciprocity which included reciprocity in natural products would favor the farmers, but they say at the same time that it would injure the manufacturer. I do not admit the argument whatever, for I think reciprocity would be useful all round. But if it comes to this that we are forced to choose between the growers of natural products and the manufacturers, for my part my choice is made, I stand by the industry which numbers 70 per cent. of our population. I stand by the industry without which no other industry can live. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not admit the argument at all. I do not for a moment admit that reciprocity in manufactured goods would be unfavorable to the manufacturers. What is the objection? The objection is that our infant industries, as they are termed, are not yet strong enough to compete with the industries of the American people. Sir, it is a peculiarity of these infants, called industries, that they never grow. They are monsters, whilst they lose their stature their appetites are insatiable, and yet they have not got strong. They have to be kept on the feeding-bottle all the time. You have to carry them in your arms all the time, and if you put them on their legs they moan most piteously and are too weak to stand. The poor things are in fact so very weak that they combine amongst themselves to extort from the country, not only what the country will give them willingly, but even what the country will not give them. I can well understand that the monopolist will not have unrestricted reciprocity. He has the market to himself; the market is not large, it is true, but he has it all to himself without competition, and furthermore if there were competition he would have to exert his brains and muscle in order to live as any one else has to live by exerting his nerve, his hand or his muscle. But, Mr. Speaker, the genuine manufacturer not only is not afraid of unrestricted reciprocity but will hail with joy the day that the American market is open to him. What is it that modern industry wants in order to thrive? It wants space, and nothing else but space; and give to our manufacturers that broad market of 60,000,000 of men, and every one with a heart in his bosom and a head on his shoulders will tell you that he is ready and eager to compete with the American manufacturer. My hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) stated the other day that he was opposed to the present movement because he thought unrestricted reciprocity would destroy our manufactures, and he spoke from a local point of view. I am glad that on this occasion I have to sever from him on this question. He said as follows:

"We know in the cities of St. Hyacinthe and Montreal the number of consumers of agricultural produce is largely increasing and our farmer goes to this market. Every week dealers go through our district buying eggs, poultry, animals, fruits and other articles of farm produce, and where do those articles go in much larger quantities than in the past? They go to the markets of St. Hyacinthe and Montreal, where there are a larger number of consumers than in the past. Destroy by unrestricted reciprocity the manufacturing industry of those two cities, throw out of employment the thousands of workmen who gain their living in those manufactories, and what would be the result? Our markets for the agriculturists' produce would lose its importance."

Sir, I will say to my hon. friend that the opinion which he expresses on the result of unrestricted reciprocity with regard to the manufacturers of St. Hyacinthe is not the opinion of the manufacturers of St. Hyacinthe. My hon. friend the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) is a manufacturer and he is in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, and I hold in my hand here a telegram from Mr. Boaz, who is a large and well-known manufacturer of St. Hyacinthe and who says if you give him the American market to-morrow, the day after to-morrow he will treble his establishment. This, Sir, is the opinion of a genuine manufacturer. It stands to common sense, and it stands to reason, that the larger the field is at the present day for the manufacturer the larger will be his exertions and the larger his profit and his trade. But, Sir, there is another objection, and a most serious objection upon the face of it. We are told that unrestricted reciprocity would largely affect our revenue. Under present circumstances the importations from the United States yield in revenue an annual amount of $7,000,000. There is no doubt whatever that if unrestricted reciprocity were adopted we would lose that revenue. Sir, I say at once and I say emphatically that the prospect has no cause of alarm to me. The prospect would be a serious cause of alarm, Sir, if the revenue of the country had been kept to the legitimate expenditure of the country, and if the revenue of the country had been kept to the figure indispensable to carry on the legislative business of the country. Then, Sir, the necessity of providing the deficiency of such a large amount to be levied every year upon the people of the country would be a serious problem. But, Sir, under the present high rate of taxation the revenue has been swelled far in excess of the legitimate requirements of the country. The equilibrium has been maintained by the Government between a large revenue and expenditure. But, how? By decreasing the revenue? No, but by illegitimately increasing the expenditure. But, Sir, this fact that we are illegitimately increasing the expenditure of the country beyond the natural requirements of the people is a serious matter which should grow on the consideration of the gentlemen of this House. It is fruitful of evil consequences. The United States to-day suffer from the same state of things. They have also an abnormally large revenue, and although the expenditure has been kept down to a legitimate expenditure, still all the evils that we have to-day from a large revenue and a large expenditure have also arisen in the United States. In a recent number of Harper's Weekly the editor of that most valuable, able and high-toned paper, after having reviewed the policy of President Jefferson—who favored a large expenditure and in order to have a large expenditure would maintain a tariff providing for a surplus—goes on to speak in this way, and this language I commend to everyone who thinks of those matters in this House :

"Experience, however, has proved what Jefferson could not foresee, that the course he favored leads to over-taxation, class legislation, a general derangement of commerce and industry, and political corruption."

All of these evils we have in this country. We have had class legislation, we have over-taxation, and we have political corruption—political corruption so bold that it does not even seek at this day to hide its shame. Let me in this connection quote the words spoken only a few weeks ago by the Premier of this country in the city of Quebec. At the dinner given there to the Minister of Militia, he uttered these pregnant words:—

"Sandfield Macdonald, a Scotchman, and like all Scotchmen but myself, exceedingly economical, took great pains to save up a surplus. The Opposition abused him, and said he had not the heart to spend the money, but that when they got into power they would divide it. So that he was literally bought out with his own money. No Grit successor of the present Government will find much surplus left after us to spend among his supporters. Our opponents say that we bribe the constituencies, but we bribe them with their own money."

Sir, this is the level to which the politics of this country has been lowered by the false system which we have been pursuing for so many years. Sir, I will hail with joy the day when it will no longer be in the power of this Government or any other Government to bribe the people of this country with their own money. I will hail with joy the day when no more money will be extorted from the people of this country than is absolutely necessary to carry on the business of the country; and if unrestricted reciprocity were to do nothing else than to reduce the expenditure to such a normal figure that it would be impossible for any Government to distribute money among the constituencies to bribe them, with both my hands I would vote for unrestricted reciprocity. The advantages, Mr. Speaker, of a free, untrammelled commercial intercourse between this country and the great country to the south of us cannot be denied. Indeed, they are not denied. No assertion has been made on the other side against the assertion made on this side that great benefits would follow such an interchange. The objections made are not made to the idea itself, but all the objections are based simply on the supposition that this course would be fatal to some interests in our own country. But, Sir, the one great objection which we have heard from all quarters on the other side of the House has been the cry of disloyalty. That cry came as a lugubrious knell in all the speeches we have heard on this question. The objection was taken that to admit all the importations from the United States free of duty, while you tax the importations from Great Britain, it would be disloyal. The objections made on that subject were crystallised in one sentence by the hon. Minister of the Interior, in an interruption of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island :

"What I said was that a differential duty against England was disloyal to the mother country and inconsistent with our position."

Sir, if this objection means anything it simply means that if we find it to be to our advantage to adopt reciprocal free trade with the United States, we should forego that advantage because we are a colony of England. That is the proposition made by gentlemen on the other side. I denounce such a proposition; I repudiate it; I denounce it as unmanly, as anti-Canadian, and even anti-British. To pretend, Sir, that our colonial allegiance demands from us that we should be deterred from the spirit of enterprise, that we should refuse to extend our trade and to increase our prosperity according to the best methods which commend themselves to our judgment, to pretend that this is loyalty, I deny; and if I were to characterise the sentiment in the only language in which it ought to be characterised, I would say this is not loyalty, but this is mere flunkeyism. We are a colony of England, it is true; but we are a colony not by force but by choice; and if we are a colony to-day, it is because we are convinced that at the present day our colonial independence is quite compatible with all kinds of national advancement and material prosperity. If you on the other side pretend that our colonial relation curtails and limits our possibilities, that England would allow us to reach a certain altitude and not go higher, I say you slander England; and if any man were to rise on the other side and tell us that England would be jealous at whatever we could do to improve our condition, I would say that man does not know England; he mistakes the England of to-day for the England of 100 years ago. I commend to the consideration of these fervent loyalists on the other side, whose mouths are ever full of the word loyalty, the following words spoken by Lord Palmerston 20 years ago in reference to the British North American Provinces:

"If these Provinces felt themselves strong enough to stand upon their own ground, and if they desire no longer to maintain their connection with us, we should say, 'God speed you and give you the means to maintain yourselves as a nation!'"

These are the sentiments of British statesmen. They tell us that whenever we want our political liberty, we are free to have it. But what we ask, Sir, is not political independence; we want to keep the flag of England over our heads; but we affirm that we are economically independent as we are legislatively independent. Sir, colonies have interests in common with the mother land, but colonies have interests of their own also; and to-day we levy a heavy toll on all imports from Great Britain. We have done that not only for the sake of collecting revenue, but also for the purpose of protection, to enable us to manufacture ourselves what we had formerly purchased from England, and to that extent to destroy British trade. There was a time when this would not have been tolerated; there was a time when England would have disallowed such a policy; but now we adopt it as a matter of course; now our policy is never questioned—why? Because England has long ago admitted the principle that colonies have interests of their own, and that it is within their right and power to develop and foster and promote those interests, even to the point of clashing with British interests. It was not always so, however. In the last century, England lost her American colonies because that principle was ignored. The American revolution broke out simply for the revindication of the principle that taxation and representation should go together. Principles may lie dormant for generations until called forth for the solution of some great issue. And what was the issue which called for the vindication of those principles by the American colonies? The issue was this. At that time there was a trade in the American colonies, and there was also a British trade; and the British Parliament, from which the colonies were excluded, legislated exclusively for British trade against the interests of American trade. In our own country, in the year 1837, a rebellion broke out in the two largest colonies left to England, and in both the provinces the cause of the rebellion was the same. It was that the British Government persistently ignored the interests of the colonies as represented by their Legislatures. The British Government, at that time, did not hold upon those matters the same opinion that it holds to-day; but when rebellion broke out, not only in Lower Canada, where the population was not of British origin, but even in Upper Canada, the British Government sent a commissioner to investigate the cause of the rebellion. In their selection of Lord Durham they were most lucky, for in him they chose a man of great sagacity of mind, great personal courage, and large and liberal views. If it were my duty to review his report, I would be bound to take exception to the conception which he formed of my own countrymen; but as to the main conception of the report, as to the main idea which governed it, it was one of the greatest conceptions of an age fertile in great conceptions. It was indeed a revolution. Lord Durham found at once that the colonies had interests of their own, and that these interests had to be prosecuted to their logical end; and he came to the conclusion that local parliaments were the only parliaments fitted to deal with them. He suggested therefore to give the colonies responsible governments. That was indeed a revolution. Every country which, up to that time, had colonies, always thought it was necessary to keep its colonies closely in hand; they all believed that to grant the slightest emancipation would generate a desire for complete emancipation. Lord Durham found that the converse proposition was true. He found and maintained that coercion generated the desire for emancipation, but that freedom would be a bond of union. That was a revolution in ideas; it was one of the greatest conceptions of the age, and all the greater because of the circumstances under which it was formed. There was a rebellion at the time in which two Provinces participated. There was a rebellion in the upper Province of Canada, where the population was of British origin; there was a rebellion, a far more dangerous one, in Lower Canada, where the population was of alien origin, and had only recently been made subjects of England. And at that very moment, when the country was in the throes of civil war, when the soil was reeking with bloodshed, when British domination had to be maintained by force of arms, at that moment Lord Durham said: Make them free, and we will make them loyal. And we who live to-day are the happy witnesses of the sagacity of his mind and the realisation of his prophecy. We who live to-day have seen how his policy has planted deep felt loyalty where, fifty years ago, rebellion existed. But, Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what is the extent of the freedom which was then granted to us? I say it extends as far as Canadian interests extend, and to that extent we, on this side, limit it. At that time, it is true, Lord Durham had not one disciple. British statesmen could not conceive that responsible government could exist in a colony as it existed at home, and it was not until another master-mind, Lord Elgin, came to this country, that the policy of Lord Durham received its full measure of adoption. But Lord Elgin went further. He negotiated the treaty of reciprocity, and in that treaty he admitted the principle of discrimination against British trade. Is there an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who will pretend that these great men, Lord Durham and Lord Elgin, did not save the British Crown on this continent? Will anyone pretend that the colonies would have long consented to be governed by the Colonial Office, through the instrumentality of a petty family compact? Who is not aware that the Reciprocity Treaty negotiated by Lord Elgin in 1854, effectually quashed the agitation for annexation which followed 1849. I say to our hon. friends opposite: You want to maintain British connection on this continent, and so say I; but I add this, that if you would maintain British connection on this continent, British connection must walk abreast with all the requirements of this country. In this connection, I cannot do better than quote the minute of council of the Coalition Government of 1865, which is pregnant with meaning, in view of the present circumstances. That minute is as follows:—

"Under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government, which the later policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with the other colonies possessing representative institutions combined with the advantages secured by the Reciprocity Treaty of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbors in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitations for organic changes has ceased—all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the Province has wholly disappeared."

Here is the admission that reciprocity with the United States effectually quashed the agitation for annexation which followed 1849:

"Although the colony would grossly misrepresent their countrymen if they were to affirm that their loyalty to their Sovereign would be diminished in the slightest degree by the withdrawal, through the unfriendly action of a foreign Government, of mere commercial privileges, however valuable these might be deemed, they think they cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen who wield the destinies of the great Empire, of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians that their country forms a part, to the connection which is usually found to exist between the material prosperity of the political contentment of a people, for in doing so they feel that they are appealing to the highest motives that can actuate patriotic statesmen, the desire to perpetuate a dominion founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people."

There is no fear of any desire for organic changes as long as the people are prosperous. But the moment the people will begin to believe that their prosperity would be increased by an organic change, from that moment danger may arise; and as to our moral right to act as we have acted in this matter, I have not the slightest doubt. The objection of hon. gentlemen opposite would have been a much stronger one, at least in my eyes, if it had been made from a different standpoint. If instead of telling us we have not the right to propose to discriminate against England, they had said it would not be generous to England to discriminate against her, the objection, to my mind, would have been far stronger; and if I am not trespassing beyond the limits of good taste, in speaking of my own individual sentiments, I would say that this is a consideration which gives me much concern. We have been told in the course of this debate, in many instances, that sentiment should not be allowed in politics. That view I do not take. My view is that sentiment may, as well in politics as in everything else, shape our actions to the extent of making us generous, if we can be generous without any sacrifice of duty. Sir, I am a subject of French origin, and I have often stated—and you, Mr. Speaker, agree with me—that there is no more loyal race of men under the British Crown on the American continent than Her Majesty's subjects of French origin. Loyalty is natural to you, men of British origin; it flows in your blood, you have inhaled it from the heart of your mothers; but I tell you that gratitude has worked in the hearts of my countrymen the feeling of the same nature which is implanted in your hearts by your origin or your birth. With all my soul I say, let my tongue adhere to the roof of my mouth if it were ever to speak an unkind word of England; let my right hand wither, if it ever participated in anything which would be unfair to England. But this is not a question of sentiment. This is a question of duty, and, if you put it in this light, that I have to choose between the duty I owe to England, and the duty I owe to my native land, I stand by my native land. And there is not an Englishman, with an English heart in his bosom, that will not say the same if he is a true born British man. Sir, England would treat us with contempt if we were to act otherwise than we are acting. England expects from us that we shall do the best we can for ourselves, and she will take care of herself, without any assistance from Canadian Tories. I am quite sure of one thing. It is quite possible that Jumble may grumble, but in his grumbling there will be as much pride as anger, and Jumble will feel flattered if there is an offspring of his so much like the old gentleman that he will not lose any occasion to turn an honest penny. Jumble will feel flattered, if he finds that that scion of his is a true chip of the old block. But there is another kind of loyalty which has not been alluded to on the other side of the House, and which should be taken into consideration in this instance. I have not heard from the other side a word about the loyalty which we owe to Confederation. Twenty years ago, we united the British Provinces on this continent with the view of making them a new nationality and with the hope of making them a nation. It was then a union on paper. It was expected that it would be made a real union. The union has lasted twenty years, and what is the result to-day? What have we achieved during those twenty years? I say that to-day, after twenty years, the union which, in 1867, was a mere union on paper is to-day still a mere union on paper. The hearts of the people by the sea are not in the union.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They are.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was once rebuked for saying that he was a Nova Scotian by birth and a Canadian by Act of Parliament. I say, and I think I speak with knowledge, that the sentiments which were then uttered by my hon. friend are the sentiments entertained by 19-20ths of the people of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. Perhaps it will be said that I have no cause to speak that way, because Nova Scotia has returned a majority to support the Government. Sir, the reason why Nova Scotia has returned a majority to support the Government is that the issue which the Liberal party placed before the people of Nova Scotia was not repealed. I believe in Confederation; we believe in Confederation, and we want the people of the Maritime Provinces to understand that it is the policy of the Liberal party not to induce them to return men to support us, but to win them over to Confederation, and to make them not only loyal British subjects, as they are, but loyal Canadians as well. If you want to do that, if you want to achieve that object, you must reverse your policy altogether; if you want to achieve that object, you must give to the people of Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces their natural market. Let them trade where it is most profitable for them to trade, and their hearts will be won over to the Canadian flag, and not only to the British flag. It was our hope at one time to make this country a nation. It is our hope yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I hail that sentiment with joy, with unbounded joy, all the more that it is altogether unforeseen. I had expected, from the talk we have heard from these gentlemen on the other side of the House, that they expected that this country would forever and forever remain a colony. I see now that they have higher aspirations, and I give them credit for that. Colonies are destined to become nations as it is the destiny of the child to become a man. No one, even on the other side, will assume that this country, which will some day number a larger population than Great Britain, is forever to remain in its present political relation with Great Britain. The time is coming when the present relations of Great Britain and Canada must either become closer or be severed altogether. For my own part, I do not intend at present to carry out this line of thought any further, but I say simply that, if ever and whenever Canada chooses, to use the language of Lord Palmerston, to stand by herself, the separation will take place not only in peace, but in friendship and in love, as the son leaves the house of his father to become himself the father of a family. But this is not the question of to-day. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. To-day we have to face a problem of no small magnitude, which is to provide the best means of developing and broadening the area of our trade to such an extent as to afford to our struggling industries the space they require to thrive and develop. This is the duty of the present hour; this is the task which has to be faced and met. We, on this side of the House, believe that the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) exactly meets the case; we believe that the solution of the problem is complete unrestricted reciprocity with the great nation to the south of us. I fully appreciate the objection of our friends on the other side, who would say that our course is not generous towards England. My answer is simply this, I only wish that we could offer to England the same propositions that we offer to-day to the American people. England has opened to us her doors. Gentlemen on the other side have closed our doors against England. They have done it, I know, not in any spirit of hostility towards England, but because they thought it was in the interest of this country. They have adopted protection as their deliberate policy. England has the policy of free trade. England is 3,000 miles away from us. The policy of the United States is a policy of protection, the same as ours. They are our nearest neighbors. There are our channels of trade. Therefore, the course we take is not a matter of choice, but the dictate of reason. I fully appreciate as well the objection of those who say that this is the first of a series of changes which must end in annexation. Sir, I grant at once that there is force in the objection if you look only at the surface; but it is the greatest possible misconception in politics to believe that the same moulds will produce the same casts of events. It is true that history ever repeats itself, but history never repeats itself in identically the same terms. It is true that the same causes always produce the same effects, but those effects are always modified by a variety of concomitant circumstances. Who, for instance, would have expected, fifty years ago, that the concession of responsible government would have resulted, as it has resulted, in a closer union between England and Canada? All the wiseacres of that day predicted that the concession which was made at that time would result in the absolute severance of Canada from the Empire, but all the prophecies have been falsified. The result has been to draw the two countries closer together than ever. We anticipate on this side of the House that the carrying of my hon. friend's resolution will have the effect of bringing about such prosperity to this country that trade will increase, not only between Canada and the United States, but between Canada and Great Britain herself, and make the bonds of union still stronger than they are. Nor, Sir, would I treat lightly the misgivings of those who, on the threshold of a great event, as this is sure to be, cannot but dread the unknown. I can well conceive that sentiment. Even when the mind is satisfied that a given political situation has become intolerable, that a change has to be made, even then the contemplated reform may, perhaps, be looked upon with misapprehension. For instance, the most radical Reformer amongst us, convinced though he may be that a revision of the Union Act which binds the three Kingdoms together, has become necessary, still he may not look without apprehension to the impending change when the past has been so glorious; when the present condition of things, though it has wrought intolerable evil, has made England so great, even he who is determined to amend the present circumstances and amend them effectually, to remove existing evils—even he, Sir, perhaps, would not touch the existing fabric except with a gentle hand. But at the same time the staunchest Tory must admit that the history of England has been an unceasing transformation. There has not been one century when England did not change, when England has been the same as in the the century before. England moved onward and onward, from progress to progress, until she has reached her present position. Yet every one of those changes would have made England what she is to-day, has been met by Tory, and by Conservative, with the taunts of disloyalty with which we are met to-day. As you go further back from the present century to the period when Catholic Emancipation had become unavoidable, all the Tories of England, from the King downward, wept over the fall of England. When the Reform Bill was carried, all the Tories of England wept over the downfall of their country; when the Corn Laws were abolished, still the Tories of England had more tears to shed. In our own country when responsible government was first agitated, all the Tories of Canada wept over the intended rupture of British connection; and when, a few years afterwards, responsible government was carried into effect, the Tories no longer wept, but they raved, they burst out into a torrent of passion. Their rage was perfectly genuine, but the tears they shed were merely crocodile tears. What the Tories, British or Canadian, wept over upon these occasions, was not the downfall of England, was not the rupture of British connection, but it was for some privilege or some monopoly which upon all these occasions was removed from their grasp. Sir, if the views of the Canadian Tories had prevailed fifty years ago, Canada would still be a medley of scattered Provinces, the Government would still be in the hands of a small family compact. If the Tories of to-day, if those whose lamentations we have heard for the last fifteen days, had lived fifty years ago, they, like their ancestors, would have howled with loyal yells against the reforms which have raised Canada from the position which she then held to the proud position which she occupies to-day; they would have opposed those reforms with the same cries of loyalty with which they meet us to-day; and I venture to say, judging of the future by the past, that the Tories thirty years hence will rejoice at the adoption of the resolution of my hon. friend, as it must be adopted some day, though, if true to their Tory nature, they will shrink from the reforms which will then be necessary. Sir, I am not disposed to treat otherwise than with respect those protests which have been raised against the disturbance of the present state of things. I am reminded, in this connection, of some words written by Armand Carrel, a Frenchman of great power and greater promise, who, unfortunately, fell a premature victim to that curse of French civilisation, duelling. Armand Carrel had been an officer in the French army, and had deserted and joined one of those numerous insurrections which took place in Spain about the year 1820, in favor of constitutional government. He was taken prisoner, court-martialled and sentenced to death; but after a series of dramatic incidents he obtained a new trial, and was finally acquitted. Referring, some years later, to the event which had brought on those insurrections, the French revolution, the Napoleonic wars, and the organic disturbances created by those events, the new aspirations developed, in consequence, in some classes of society, and in other classes of society, the intense attachment to the old regime, and the intense desire for its restoration, he concluded as follows:

"Events in their continual and fatal transformation do not carry all minds with them, nor curb all characters with an equal facility, nor take care of all interests; this must be understood and something must be forgiven to the protestations which rise in favor of the past. When a period is ended, the mind is shattered, and it is enough for Providence that it cannot be reconstituted."

Those words seem to be full of meaning, and they seem forcibly to teach the lesson that it is the duty of Reformers ever to stand up to the duty of the hour, without fear of the consequences, either to themselves or to the country; ever respecting, but still never heeding, those protests which are sure to be raised in favor of the past—in the words of President Lincoln "with malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right." Sir, believing that, I appeal to all Reformers on the present occasion; I appeal not only to those who belong to the Reform organisation, but I appeal to all those who believe that the world cannot remain stationary; I appeal to all those who believe that new exigencies are always arising which require to be dealt with; I appeal to all those who believe that the present economical condition of Canada is false and dangerous; I appeal to the old men who, in former years, have borne the brunt of many battles in favor of reform, and who have lent a helping shoulder to bring up their country to the high level it occupies to-day; I appeal to the young men whose aim it is still to raise their country higher—of all I ask their support in the task we have undertaken at this time. Sir, our opponents on this occasion again drag up their old-time crop of abuse. They tell us that we are disloyal, that we are traitors, that we are annexationists. With such invectives we are not concerned. Those invectives are only an anticipation of those with which we will be assailed by our opponents. Then, again, they will appeal to all the prejudices which can be brought against this policy. They will again torture noble sentiments in order to arouse suspicion against this policy, they will again probe the secret crevices of the heart in order to awaken that may be found there low and vile against this new policy. But with such we are not concerned. Such calumnies have been faced before and we must face them again. They say that without a doubt the people will repel us, that victory will again perch on the banners of the Conservative party. With such considerations we are not concerned. Our considerations are higher, our aims are higher than such low, vulgar, vile, selfish considerations. And, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to all those who believe that politics is neither a trade nor a gain; I appeal to all those who believe that politics is a duty which must be discharged, not with a view to the gain to be attained but discharged simply for duty's sake, and to those, in the language of the poet, I say:

"Onward! throw all terrors off!
Slight the scorns, scorn the scoff.
In the race, and not the prize,
Glory's true distinction lies.
Triumph herds with meanest things,
Common robbers, vilest slings,
'Mid the reckless multitude!
But the generous, but the good
Stand in modesty alone,
Still serenely struggling on,
Planting peacefully the seeds
Of bright hopes and better deeds."

I believed, Mr Speaker, that my hon. friend to my left planted the seeds of brighter hopes and better days for this country when he moved this resolution. We may be defeated; but, as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr Davies), said a few days ago, time is with us. Yes, time is with us, the cause is true and it will prevail. We are to-day in the last month of a long and severe winter. Nature, which is now torpid and inert, will awaken in a few days under the penetrating influences of the warmer sun, and the great river at the foot of the cliff on which we stand, now imprisoned in the close embrace of the frost, will throw off her shackles and roll unfettered and free toward the sea. So sure as this will happen, I say that under the penetrating influence of discussion, of better feelings on both sides of the line, the hostility which now stains our long frontier will disappear, the barriers which now obstruct trade will be burst open and trade will pour in along all the avenues from the north to the south and from the south to the north, free, untrammelled and no longer stained by the hues of hostility.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker, if I were not in the midst of a deliberative assembly, discussing the interests of the people, and having as much as possible to take care that the discussion is restricted to the subject which is before the Chair, I would gladly have joined in the applause with which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House greeted the great and eloquent effort of the leader of the Opposition. For rhetoric, for eloquence, for great forensic power, my hon. friend is known, and no one in this House admires him more than I do; and I would not rise now to answer him, I would not offer the few remarks I have to make in this debate—this debate which has been so protracted, but which I must say has not been too long,—were it not for a few assertions made by, and occurrences connected with, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I do not wish, as I have said, to add much to this debate—I could not. Interesting it will be in the future when this Confederation, in spite of the efforts of its detractors, shall have passed from youth to manhood, for those who will be living then, and for ourselves, old as we may be, to read over the report of this debate, of this battle upon which might depend the destiny of a whole nation. I again say I would not have risen to add anything to this debate were it not for some utterances of the hon. gentleman against which I am bound to enter my strong and solemn protest. It is the habit of the hon. gentleman in every one of his speeches in this House to display not only his great loyalty to the British Crown and the British Empire and his most British feelings in words—it is his fashion to say not only that he is loyal to the British Crown and the Empire, but that no one except himself and his party have any of the elements of true patriotism and loyalty. Against that I must enter my protest. The hon. gentleman says he is loyal; I believe him. He may say as long as he likes that he would take his solemn oath, and that his arm might wither if he was not anxious to maintain the integrity of the British Empire and the glory of the British Crown; but I would have preferred if he had said it in time of danger. Instead of brandishing his sword in defence of the British Crown to-day he should have done so during those days which have passed, and which I hope will be forgotten by every one in this country; but, on the contrary, he then said he would have shouldered a musket, which certainly is not loyal and which certainly was not acting to protect the interests of the integrity of the Empire. This I say only as a contradiction of the action of the hon. gentleman. I do not wish to deny him the right to express his opinions, as he has expressed them and as he has a right to do. I say it is his right to do so, but at the same time a man must not make a parade of a virtue only on parade and not in action. But, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is especially speaking for the Province of Quebec, of which he is one of her bright sons, and I may say the Province is proud of him as such. My hon. friend appears to say, and he wants the people to believe that true patriotism is only to be found in the ranks of the party which he leads now, and that “those Tories” as he calls us possess none of the ingredients which go to form a good patriot. It is true, Mr. Speaker, and it is one of the protests I enter here—that my hon. friend, not more than two years and a half ago, said the same thing of a man whom he could not help but praise and whom he could not praise too loudly. During the lifetime of the lamented Sir George Cartier, the true representative in his time of the French-Canadian element in Confederation, my hon. friend was one of the first to call that distinguished and lamented gentleman a Tory, to call him a slave of England, to call him a man whose sense of honor for his country and for his fellow-countrymen was nothing, but whose subserviency to England was everything, while his love for his country and for his fellow-countrymen was nothing according to the hon. gentleman then. Still in 1885 when this agitation commenced in the Province of Quebec, we saw in the newspaper of my hon. friend, that there was no man who ever existed in this country who was such a great patriot as Sir George Cartier, nor did there ever live a man who had been such a lover of his country, and who had been such a successful builder up of a Canadian nationality. Yet, Sir George Cartier was vilified by those gentlemen during his lifetime. I have hope, one of those days, that although our party is now abused by him, that some of the younger friends of the hon. gentleman will say that in occupying the position which the Government occupies to-day, we acted as the true friends of Canadian nationality and that we acted as the true friends of our Province. They will naturally say in the time to come what the Province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada has already said of the men who at the present moment are at the head of this Dominion of ours. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has stated that the National Policy, inaugurated in 1879, was ruinous to the country and that the country was tired of that policy. When he said this he stated that he was speaking for the Province which he specially represents in this Parliament. To that assertion of my hon. friend I reply that, in speaking as he did, he did not represent the true feelings, the true sentiments, and the real opinions of that Province of Quebec from which he springs. If there is in the Dominion a Province which has adopted sincerely and heartily, and I might add, practically, as well, the National Policy of 1879, it is the Province of Quebec. Perhaps I may be contradicted, but I will state here that in no other Province was the movement for a National Policy commenced earlier than in the Province of Quebec, and to prove it I might perhaps quote an authority which my hon. friend himself will not deny. I may say that as far back as December, 1867, and the first time that I had the honor to speak on the floor of the Legislative Assembly in Quebec, I advocated the National Policy, that is to say, I advocated the encouragement of manufactures and to prevent—what? To prevent exactly the state of things which my hon. friend now says is the great evil and the great disease of the country—emigration to the United States. In my efforts in this direction I was followed and supported by many. Even as far back as 1867 and 1868 the National Policy, as the policy for the Federal Government to adopt, was agitated in the Province of Quebec, even before it was agitated in other Provinces. I have here in my hand a book in which I find an extract of a speech which I myself heard delivered by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition when we were colleagues and happy to be colleagues in the Legislature of Quebec. In the debate upon colonization grants which at the time was the popular debate in the Legislative Assembly at Quebec, my hon. friend was endorsing the policy of his colleagues. On our side of the House we believed that the great curse of the Province of Quebec was that a great many French Canadians were emigrating to the United States. When we were complaining of that emigration from our Province, strange to say it was during the time that the Reciprocity treaty existed between Canada and the United States, and I can assert here that the tide of emigration to the United States, in comparison with the population, has never been greater than it was during the period between 1854 and 1866—during the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty. What did my hon. friend then say? He could not even then help speaking of patriots and patriotism. If in the speech which he has just delivered we did not hear him mention the name of the great Papineau it is certainly only the fault of his memory, because I am sure if he thought of it he would have had the name of Papineau on his lips. My hon. friend, speaking in Quebec in 1871, said:

“It is now many years ago since the great patriot of Canada, that great patriot whom we have just lost, the Hon. L. J. Papineau, seeking to remedy our misfortunes and the evils of the day was resuming his delivery of that speech in that simple language of his, ‘We must not buy anything from England.’”

And the hon. gentleman adding his opinion to that of the great Papineau, said:

“I am of opinion that that policy imposes itself upon us to-day. That with as much and more force than at the time it was formulated. It is for us and especially for us, French-Canadians, a duty to create a national industry and a National Policy."

It was only during this debate I remembered that discussion, and it was only during this debate I was favored by that little extract which was sent to me by the kindness of the Librarian. I think my hon. friend will not deny that he has used this language, and I know that my friend will not deny that he was a patriot and that he was a National Policy man. He cannot deny the history of his party in his Province. Mr. Speaker, I mention the speech delivered in 1871; I can also mention to my hon. friend and to those who are conversant with the political history of the Province of Quebec, that in 1871 and 1872 the great National Policy originated in Montreal under the auspices of my hon. friend and his friends, not ours. Their great National Policy began with Mederic Lanctot, and ended when the chief of the Government took the real National Policy into his hands and wrested it from those children's hands. By whom was that policy originated and instigated? By the friends of my hon. friend; by the partner of my hon. friend at that time, though I may say to his credit that the partnership did not last very long. In 1871 and 1872, especially in 1872, when the movement was set on foot in Montreal to defeat the giant of Canadian politics in the Province at that time, Sir George Cartier, what was the platform invented in the hope of putting up those small men and putting down the great man? It was this absurd old National Policy. I will mention the name of one man who is now out of politics, but who occupies a seat on the bench, to which he does honor—the Hon. Mr. Jetté. When he was a candidate against Sir George Cartier in Montreal, in 1872, what was the policy of the hon. gentleman's friends. I will quote what he said; I have not the newspaper—it was too bulky, though it was a Liberal paper—but I will read what Mr. Jetté said on the 25th of July, 1872—and I beg the indulgence of the House in translating as I read:

"Three elements are the sources of greatness of a country and the development of its resources—agriculture, commerce and industry. Agriculture cannot alone retain the population which is leaving. The Government should have recourse to the establishment of manufactures; but that system having been considered contrary to the interests of the metropolis, the Government has abandoned it. New England, where our fellow-countrymen are emigrating to, is essentially a manufacturing country. Here we have greater advantages for the establishment of manufactures, and the Government should adopt a policy to protect such manufactures. When people are speaking of the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen, the latter have argued that the advantage they found elsewhere, that is, labor, should be given to them here; and that advantage will be given to them only when manufactures will be flourishing in our country. Then, and then only, can we call our fellow-countrymen from the United States. Capital is dormant in the banks of this country. If we had manufactures we might utilise that capital. Our Government has adopted an industrial policy which is only in favor of foreign manufacturers, and not to the profit of Canadian manufacturers."

I quote this extract because it is a type of all the speeches and declarations of those gentlemen at that time. You may also judge of the policy of the party, by the organ of the party. We do the same now. Great papers having changed their appreciation of the policy of the Government, new organs have been created. At that time the old Le Pays, which was the organ of the party, was changed into another organ, which was called, according to this policy, Le National. Oh, this National; that is a great word—a word which has been unfortunately used and abused a great deal in our Province by our hon. friends on the other side of the House during the past two or three years. If my hon. friend says it was only a little local movement in Montreal, I shall quote a resolution proposed in 1872 by a man whose name is venerated by all my hon. friends on the other side, from the Province of Quebec at least—the Hon. Mr. Letellier, who was the incarnation of Liberalism, who, I can say to his credit, was undinehing in his Liberal views and opinions, and who to the last moment declared himself a protectionist." Mr. Letellier, in 1872, in Quebec, seconded a resolution in which it was said that the Government should not mind whether the interests of the manufacturers in England should be injured or not, but that it was a sound and patriotic policy on the part of the Government of this country to protect our manufactures so as to create in this country centres where manufacturing industries could be developed, and where the hands that were idle during the winter months could be utilised, and our people prevented from emigrating to the United States. But if 1872 is too remote a date for the changeable affections of my hon. friends, if it is too much for their dull memory of the political events of the country, I might come to 1873. Who was their standard-bearer in Montreal in that year? Who presented himself as the representative of the Liberal party against my hon. friend from Montreal East? A strong Liberal, whose principles were known to all his friends and who declared himself in favor of the National Policy. Who was the candidate that in 1878 held up his banner of free trade? Was there one from Gaspé to Pontiac? No, Sir, every one of them, in accordance with the dictates of the leader of their party, was for protection. Shall I quote the Hon. Mr. Joly, who was for a long time the dignified Premier of the Province of Quebec, a man whose sentiments were shared in by my hon. friend, and whose opinion cannot be a matter of suspicion? Shall I quote the answer he sent to Dr. Orton who was chairman of the Committee on protection to manufactures? Did not Mr. Joly send his answer in saying that even if he had to separate from his party, even if he were to receive the censure of his party, he would be true to his Province and country in advocating a national policy and protection.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. When the House adjourned I was pointing out that not only in the electoral movements in Montreal of 1871 and 1872, but that during the electoral campaign of 1878, the question of protection to our manufactures had not only not been repudiated by the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, but had been taken up as a part of their programme; and I was about to say that if those reminiscences were not fresh enough for the dull memories of my hon. friends, I might recall to them another fact. It is still fresh in the memory of all of us in the Province of Quebec, that, at a certain moment during the electoral campaign of 1873, a wave came over the electorate which threatened to engulf the people. It was then thought that the then leader of the Liberal party, the Hon. Mr. Blake, was certain to see victory perched on his banner. It was then thought that power would be attained by him and held for at least the next five years, and in some parts of our Province, as in some of the Maritime Provinces, especially in Prince Edward Island, this belief in the certainty of the success of the Liberal leader was a great factor in the elections. In Montreal, what was it that occasioned the doubt which came over us, leading us to think that perhaps the Liberal party would win the day? It was the fact that when the great leader, Mr. Blake, came to Montreal to arouse the energy and the courage, which were rather flagging at the time, of his followers, he addressed the electors of Montreal and made the following declaration, which I take from the report of his speech in the Montreal Herald of the 21st January, 1837:

"Mr. Blake declared that it was even clearer in 1886 than it was in 1882, that a very high scale of duties must be continued on goods such as we can manufacture at home. He added that free trade was not practicable in Canada, and he reaffirmed his statement that there was no possibility in a change of our system of taxation."

The words uttered by the same gentleman, which were quoted the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of Interior, were even stronger than these. In 1872, in 1878, and 1887, the Liberal party, in the Province of Quebec at least, for which Province my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) more specially spoke, was in favor of the National Policy, if not as a political party, at least at heart, desiring to be in harmony with the wishes and aspirations of the whole country. I challenge my hon. friend to cite a single fact which would authorise him to speak in the way he has spoken this evening, as representing the opinions and the wishes of the people of the Province of Quebec. I may go further, and say that the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is an attempt, under false colors, and on false pretences, to win the sympathies of the country. Reciprocity with the United States, as we all know, cordial commercial relations with the United States, is popular in this country. We know that a large measure of reciprocity with the United States meets with the sympathies of the population of this Dominion, and my hon. friend's resolution is a move to take an unfair advantage of that sympathy. I will tell the hon. gentleman, and this is not the first time that hon. gentlemen opposite have heard it from Conservative lips, that what the Government of the day desire, and what the people desire, is to have reciprocity with our neighbors in the natural products of the sea, the farm, the mine and the forest. This is the broad reciprocity which we, on this side, have always advocated. My hon. friend quoted the expressions of sympathy which were interchanged between the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Bayard, and the hon. the Minister of Finance in this country, previous to the conference at Washington. The letters on both sides, which the hon. gentleman read, accurately expressed the views, I am sure, of the Governments of both countries, and these are the only papers that it was in the power of the Government to put before the House, because the Government were bound by the decision of the plenipotentiaries at the conference. My hon. friend, however, has—I do not say, intentionally, but he has—given an interpretation to the propositions made at the conference, and based conclusions on that interpretation, which certainly should not be allowed to go to the country uncontradicted. He asked how is it that Mr. Bayard wanted to have all these questions of commercial intercourse settled and that Sir Charles Tupper answered in the same sense, and yet when the conference met, the proposals of the British plenipotentiaries for reciprocity were not accepted by the plenipotentiaries of the United States? My hon. friend then drew the conclusion that the reason was that the propositions of the British plenipotentiaries for reciprocity were not framed in that broad, liberal spirit, which inspired the letter from the Secretary of State of the United States. This should not go to the country uncontradicted. There is nothing to warrant such an insinuation. The policy of the Government, as it is expressed in the official press, as it is expressed in the Conservative press of this country, the explanations given by the Government go to the country, and my hon. friend should not have gone further than that. A proposition was made that there should be reciprocity between the two countries according to certain terms and conditions, but all propositions tending to reciprocity were declined by the other party, the American plenipotentiaries wishing to restrict this treaty and saying that they were bound, by their instructions I suppose, within the limits of the fisheries question. I do not know more than any other hon. member of this House, but we all know what the American press said, what Mr. Bayard and other American politicians have said, we know that the declarations have gone throughout the breadth and length of the United States that no proposition for reciprocity of trade could be entertained by the United States, because the Senate and Congress would repudiate it, and would repudiate anything in regard to which the Government of the United States went further than the discussion of the fisheries of the Atlantic. On our side, we have not been reticent in saying what we wanted. We have said what the people of this country want, and, when I stated that the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was an attempt to build up a political platform on false pretences and under false colors, I was right. My hon. friends here are desirous to have reciprocity to a certain extent. I do not mean to say that the whole country is in favor of reciprocity, because, with such an immense frontier as we have, covering different conditions of production, there are some parts of the country in which reciprocity, even in raw products, would be considered objectionable. I know there are some parts of Ontario in which reciprocity in those articles referred to in the Order in Council would be objectionable, but we have in this country to give and take. We know that the interests of the Maritime Provinces are not always in accord with the interests of Ontario, but we know that if the different parts of the country have to make sacrifices, and that each portion of the community must give something for the general benefit of the whole community. It was a member from the other side of the House who gave me the idea I am just going to express. What will be the verdict of the people on the motion now before the House, and on the policy which my hon. friends are trying to induce the country to adopt? Reciprocity? Yes. Large reciprocity? Yes. But unrestricted reciprocity? The people will say no; unrestricted reciprocity we cannot have and will not have, and the people of this country would not allow us to adopt it even if we were willing to do so ourselves. In a country like ours, where we have no foreign policy, the programme of the Government is necessarily more limited than it is in independent countries, and it must be the aim of the Government to build up a national spirit in such a way that all the resources of the country should be developed, that all the institutions of the country should be protected, that the laws of the country should be enacted by the free will of the people, and that the general action of the people and that the general policy of the Government should be untrammelled by any foreign influence. Although, in that way, the legitimate struggle for power may not have the same interest that it would have in independent countries, at least the efforts to gain the confidence of the people has a wide scope, a wide horizon, and wide possibilities for the intelligence and the energies of the people, and I say that this struggle becomes a sinister comedy when we find people constituting one party, in their contention against the other, forgetting their national pride, forgetting the main interests of the people they are representing, and inducing the people to look across the frontier for assistance, and to barter the interests and the destinies of the nation against the possibilities and chances of a Ministerial defeat. On this question an appeal has been made, I must say, to the low interests of the people. What is it that we are telling the people of this country? We are a nation and we must remain a nation. It is true that we are only five millions of people in an immense territory, larger than the territory of the United States, but we must try and build up this nationality. Our industries may not be as prosperous as they should be, but, if they are not as large as they are on the other side, we must protect ourselves, as the youth must be protected and as the child must be protected; we must protect our industries instead of saying what our hon. friends opposite say. My hon. friend who spoke before me said that the National Policy was nothing, that it had done nothing except to feed by the spoon some rich capitalists who had made large fortunes and were trying to protect them by combines, that we should not have a National Policy, that, being an agricultural county, we should look only to agricultural pursuits for our prosperity. It is true that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) took a different ground. He said that if we had free reciprocity in manufactured articles, we would have larger and more prosperous manufactures, but he has forgotten what the people in every part of this country know, that if we had complete reciprocity or commercial union or annexation—because that is the last word of the resolution—though we might have larger manufactures, more prosperity if you like, still it would not be our country. The people in this country understand that. They have said yes, and they will say yes, to the building up of our country by protection to our manufacturing interests. My hon. friends may say that they want to educate the public opinion with their theory. They may call it a policy, some of them may call it a theory, but I call it a Utopia. Are they speaking for the people of this country? No, they are not. The country spoke in 1878, the country spoke in 1882, and again in 1887. They do not speak for the country. They may say that they want to educate the country, and I do not blame them; but for whom are they speaking? Are they speaking for the United States? They disclaim it, and even if they answered, yes, as I hear that answer made by some hon. gentlemen around me, I would say, no, they do not even represent the public opinion in the United States; they do not represent the sentiment of a single statesman of standing in the United States, in the proposition which they make to-day. And why, Mr. Speaker? Unrestricted reciprocity, without any power to interfere in the tariff of this country by the United States—is there any business man in the United States who would say that they wanted reciprocity with us if we in this country had a right to fix our own tariff, to say, for instance, that we would have a duty of 40 or 50 per cent., while on the other side of the line they might wish to impose a duty of 10, 17½ or 20 per cent.? No such an idea has taken root in the minds of American statesmen. On this point, I will quote the energetic, if not very parliamentary, expression that was used outside this House, by an hon. member of this House, who said: "Unrestricted reciprocity alone, and not commercial union—the Americans never thought of such arrant nonsense." Yes, Mr. Speaker, this motion is merely an attempt to make the people believe that they would enjoy great material prosperity if they had an immense market for their products. It is true that we would have an immense market for our products, but the manufacturers of the United States would also have our country for their market, and then where would be our products if the American manufacturers were at liberty to compete with ours? I see my hon. friend smiling. I may quote an expression that he used. He said, the greater the market, and the more extensive the plant employed, the cheaper would be the cost of production of any article. But, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what our manufacturers were saying in 1878, when they overthrew the Administration of that time. Then our people were saying, it is true we have the benefit of the American market, but the Americans have the benefit of our market; how can our manufacturers, with their smaller plant, with their smaller capital, compete with the large manufacturers of the United States? It is a law of gravitation that the larger body attracts, and necessarily in the end, absorbs the smaller body. Under unrestricted reciprocity the American manufacturers could do as they have already done, make this country a slaughter market and kill off our nascent manufactures. I need not enlarge upon this point. The fact is known to every one. It is a by-word among all the manufacturers and workingmen of this country. Unrestricted reciprocity is an impossibility. It is a thing that hon. gentlemen opposite are discussing, but which the Americans will not consent to. I understand they would consent to commercial union, and those in the United States who favor that scheme do so under the impression that it would end in annexation. Why have not Mr. Wiman and Mr. Butterworth succeeded in persuading the people of Canada to accept that scheme? They have done everything that men could do to make the movement successful, why have they failed? Because the people of this country understood that under commercial union the fiscal policy of the Dominion of Canada would have to be arranged in conjunction with the tariff of the United States. What is the meaning of that? When, in a company of shareholders, one represents three-fourths of the capital and another represents only one-fourth, we know what course will be taken, we know what the board of directors is, we know what the policy of the company is, and we know the general result of such an association. If a man with a penny and a man with a pound go into partnership, we know very well what the result will be. If the tariffs of the two countries were to be fixed by a joint commission, we know that the policy of the more powerful country would necessarily prevail over the policy of the other. Commercial union has been repudiated by the people. Those who advocated it at first, either in the press or on the hustings, are ashamed of it to-day. But it is said that it might bring about annexation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not indulge in such magnificent periods as my own friend has done, and say that the man who is true to his native land, is the true patriot, and is the true and loyal citizen. That is true, and I tell him that is not because we are subjects of our beloved Queen Victoria that we are giving up the interests of our land, if they come into conflict with the material interests of the mother country. I agree with the hon. gentleman in what he says about annexation. My hon. friends opposite, at least those from the Province of Quebec, must not be scandalised, because some of their best men in the Province of Quebec have been agitating annexation. They have been making speeches to the people on that question. I say annexation is a question that might be discussed, but it would not be approved of by the people of this Dominion. I remember a circumstance that occurred, I am not certain in what year, in an election in Ontario, when a gentleman, a friend of my friend, came before an Ontario audience. It was in the county of Prescott, and not knowing that he was speaking to a population who had not the same ideas as those of his Liberal friends in the Province of Quebec, having been absent a long time from the country, he said in a moment of eloquence, after I had charged some of his friends with having annexation sentiments: "O yes, when the question of annexation comes up you will find more people supporting it than you have any idea of." That was before an Ontario audience, and I give my hon. friends opposite credit when I say that the chairman of that meeting, who was a good Reformer, got up and said: "My friend, if you come here from the Province of Quebec only to say such things, the sooner you leave the better for you." I only mention this, Mr. Speaker, to show that the question of annexation is one which might be discussed, but it would be repudiated by the country. But if you say that Canada would be better under the American flag, say it clearly, say it above board, make a platform of it, and then we will discuss it. We are not afraid of the verdict of the people. If you find dozens and dozens of eloquent men, as my hon. friend is, to stand on platforms in the Province of Quebec and say that we will be patriotic to our native land, and that our native land will be prepared for annexation, I say the good sense and good judgment of the people of my Province and of my fellow-countrymen will be against them ten to one. Yes, Mr. Speaker, on these questions, on a question like this we are now discussing, it is not the men, the politicians, the statesmen, who are proposing such questions on the people. When bread and butter is at the bottom of the question it is the people themselves, the masses themselves, that give the word, and those who in public appear to be teachers are nothing, if they be true, but faithful echoes of the masses, the people themselves. On some abstract questions men can dictate to the people, they can state certain opinions and impose them on the people; but on a question of policy like this it is the voice of the people that decides; and the voice of the people is against you. Your statistics may be good, and you may be able to make them prove anything you want, but the only statistics I want are statistics of the sentiments and feelings of the people; and those are against you. Mr. Speaker, what I say is correct. The people themselves have their say, and in discussing questions of this kind abstract theories of men have no influence over them. Free trade is in the hearts of the people of England; and why? Because in England after long years, I might say after centuries of well digested, of well guided, of well applied protection, the manufacturing genius of the English people has acquired a perfection that cannot be surpassed or equalled. Manufactures in England challenge and defy all competition, and in a country like England where the largest possibilities of production have been attained, cheap living is the desideratum of the working classes. Free trade is in the hearts of the people of England, whatever might be the difficulties which at the present moment it might entail on the financial condition of the country. On the other hand, protection is in the hearts of the people of the United States; and why? Is it because the genius for manufacturing industries has not developed there? It has to an immense extent; it has so much that American manufacturers are the rivals of Great Britain in almost all the markets of the world. Why is protection still in the hearts of the people of the United States? It is, and will be so long as there is a productive south, an extensive west, affording opportunities for the activity and intelligence of the sons of workingmen to progress under the protective policy which has done great benefit in the past. But it is still more in the hearts of the people of the United States, because the structure they have built necessarily requires further time to become consolidated so as to be able to defy the world. Again, why is it in the hearts of the people of the United States? It is because in their view of developing manufacturing industries they look to this northern part of the continent as being very soon or in the future, or in the near future to become one of the accessories of the great republic, not by war, not by coercion but by the good policy they have impressed upon the minds of their people and which our Government are trying to impress on the minds of the people of this country. Should we not pursue the same course, should we not build up our own prosperity, our own national spirit and our own nation? We are doing it. Again I say that the hearts of the people are not with hon. gentlemen opposite on the question covered by this resolution. I was saying a moment ago that my hon. friends opposite had changed their views, at least in the Province of Quebec on the subject. Up to the time the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) came into power those were the sentiments of my hon. friends, and I say—and I speak with authority in what I am going to say—that in 1877, at the time when my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) joined the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie, there was in the Province of Quebec in his own party a strong movement to try and impress upon the leader of the then Government the desirability of taking up a policy of protection for manufactures so as to gain the support of the people of our Province. I am not revealing a secret, I am not unwittingly saying it, but that celebrated manifesto and protest signed by many members of the Liberal party in Quebec, which was presented to the leader of the Government just at the moment when my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) was entering the Administration, that protest, that celebrated memorandum in which the great majority of the Liberal party of the Province stated that the members of the Government from Quebec were not having their views carried into legislation, and in which it was stated that they should have some influence on the fiscal policy of the Government, that document which represented two-thirds of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, and to its refusal by the leader of the Government is attributed the first defeat of my hon. friend in Drummond and Arthabaska, and in 1878 the defeat of his party and of the Government. Mr. Speaker, I have heard before hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House declare that no great question should be placed before Parliament unless the will of the people had been manifested in a certain manner. We had at the beginning the expression of opinion about commercial union; but that has broken down and disappeared. We have had now three weeks' debate, and before the debate took place there was a notice of motion on unrestricted reciprocity. Where are the petitions presented to Parliament asking for unrestricted reciprocity? From what county have we expressions of opinion in favor of the movement? I have heard some hon. members say they were in favor of it. I heard the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), the other day state that we were essentially an agricultural race, that manufactures would spoil our population in Quebec, that manufactures had a deleterious influence over the people, and that the policy of the Government was the reason why such a large number of the population had emigrated from the Province of Quebec to the United States. My hon. friend here and my hon. friend there forgot to say one thing. Why are French Canadians emigrating to the United States; for what reason do they go there? Do they go there as agriculturists? No, they go there to work in the factories; and I believe that if our manufactures were better developed in this country than they have been up to the present time emigration would cease. I have already said that the period of the greatest emigration to the States was during the time of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. But is the emigration now as large as my hon. friends opposite are pleased to say it is? I say, no; and strange to say my authority for this assertion will be an expression of opinion very recently given by one of the papers on which my hon. friends opposite will not cast suspicion. I quote now from the Montreal Witness of the 4th April:

"For some weeks back the incoming trains from the United States have had more passengers belonging to the working classes on them than usual at this season of the year. Heretofore large gangs left for the brickfields and other industries in the State of Massachusetts, but this year that state of affairs has been reversed. Not only the breadwinners are returning but their families and they are bringing with them large quantities of their household effects; so much so that extra help has been put on to handle the baggage and see it delivered safely at its destination. Very few of the passengers come through to Montreal compared with the large number that get off at the different way stations this side of the line between St. Lambert's and St. Armand's. They have been gradually increasing until extra cars have had to be put on to carry the people and their baggage back to their native place in Canada."

Mr. FISHER. Read the entire article.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think there is enough there to prove what I have said but I will finish it. I did not know that my hon. friends on the other side of the House had been so much interested in the article, but it appears now they must have seen the article and that it was touching a little upon their toes. They have seen that it has a certain bearing on the discussion and I am glad to see that they have read it. My friend has asked me to continue the article and I will do so:

"A Witness reporter asked the father of a family of thirteen children—"

That is a good exodus from the United States.

—"the cause of so many of the French Canadians returning to Canada. He said the different factories had been shut down for the most part,"—Is it that my hon. friends would insist on my reading? and that they were coming back to work in the manufactories of Canada.

—"as they considered they had a sufficient stock on hand for present demands."

Do my hon. friends want me to continue with the article? I do not indulge much in reading the Witness, but it is an interesting paper at times, and I will continue:

"Have they any more now than they have had for two or three years back?" asked the newspaper man."

I do not know what member of the other side suggested that question.

"Oh, no," was the reply, "but we have been informed that another presidential election will take place next fall which may bring about a good many changes in the tariff which might prove ruinous to manufacturers if they had a large stock on hand, and this is the reason they give for throwing us out of employment."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read on; is there any more?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is all, I cannot read more because it is the entire article. But I am thankful to the interrupter who has given me a chance of showing one thing more than I intended when I began to read that article, and that is that the Americans are so much afraid that the result of the next presidential campaign might be against protection, that even now they are beginning to emigrate to Canada for protection. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to continue the discussion any further. I do not wish to take the time of the House any longer and I think I will close my remarks. Before concluding I beg to apologise to the House if I have not put my remarks in as good form as my hon. friend who spoke before me has done. At all events I speak as I feel. I may not speak very well, but I speak as strongly as I can, because I feel very strongly on this subject. The whole résumé of the argument of my friends on the other side against the Government is this: They say to us: "We want more manufactures, we want Americans to come here and manufacture for us; we are not satisfied with the strides this country has made during the last twenty years and especially during the last ten years under the policy of the Government. We want to have the same impetus in the way of progress that the American Union has had." Mr. Speaker, I challenge this assertion, and I think I am right in saying that Canada during the last ten years has made greater strides in the road of progress and prosperity than the American Union has done in comparison to its population. And, Mr. Speaker, what authority shall I give you to prove this. I shall give you the authority of the Americans themselves. Not long ago I read in an American paper an article saying that if the Americans allowed this country to go on as we were going, if they allowed the Government of this country to follow the policy we had been following, that we would see greater progress, greater advancement and greater superiority in this country than could be claimed even by the spread-eagles of American papers for the United States. I take the opinions of the Americans to show that we are making greater and vaster progress than they themselves have made. But not only can I give you the opinions of Americans on this subject, but I can give you statistics which prove clearer, better and more conclusive than any other statistics we can have. I do not like, however, reading long arrays of figures to the House. I take it that the arguments of my hon. friends are that the Government has over-estimated the capacity of this country in the liabilities which have been undertaken by the Government during the last twenty years. That same old argument of the gentlemen opposite is used to-day, that the Government has made an extravagant expenditure, and that the Government has over-estimated the capacities of the country to meet its liabilities. I say that this argument is not only a false notion, but that it is also a false teaching to the people. This teaching has been repeated for the last twenty-five years, and the answer to it is found in the lists of the money markets of the world. In 1867, as a young man I used to hear in my county the same arguments and the same speeches as we hear to-day—that the Conservative Government was leading the country to ruin, and that in a few years we would be bankrupt; but we are not bankrupt yet. I find by the Economist, the leading financial paper of England, that in 1866, in the month of August, Canadian 5 per cents were quoted at 76, and 6 per cents at 96-97, and in the month of November the 5 per cents had risen in view of Confederation to 81-82, and the 6 per cents to 96½-97½. That was at the time my hon. friends on the other side were saying that Confederation was going to ruin the country, that the ambition of the Prime Minister to make a grand country on this North American continent was a scheme to ruin the old Provinces of Canada. What was the course of our securities from 1867 to 1878? I see by the same financial paper that in December, 1878, Canadian 6 per cents were quoted at 101.

Mr. JONES. That is because you got the Maritime Provinces in to give you credit.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. So much for the scheme of Confederation which was denounced by the hon. gentleman; and I hope that Nova Scotia, with her good representatives, my hon. friend included, will still contribute to put higher the credit of Canadian securities.

Mr. JONES. You have been telling us that the small country always suffers by connection with the larger.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am very sorry the enthusiasm the interruption has raised has prevented me hearing the hon. gentleman's remark. I was about to say that our 6 per cents in 1878 were quoted at 101-105, and our 4 per cents, maturing in 1904, were quoted at the same time at 89-91. Then, if we come to that worst period of all under the present Administration, we find the same 4 per cents quoted on March 22, 1888, at 115-117. Our 3½ per cents securities one-half per cent. less than the late consols of England, were quoted on the same date at 108-110. We generally say that we are better appreciated by our neighbors than we can be appreciated at home; but there is another saying which is very true, and I apply it to my hon. friend with his poetical quotations, and with all his great prophecies—nobody is a prophet in his own country; and surely, if nobody is a prophet in his own country, the Opposition for the past twenty-five years have been very bad prophets, and it has been for the good of the country that their prophecies have never been fulfilled. My hon. friend quoted the opinion of one of his friends, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier), with regard to the industrial movement in that city, and stated that Mr. Boaz, who I think is at the head of the worsted woollen manufactures there, had sent a telegram to the effect that he would like to see reciprocity with the United States, because with it he would sell his products better than he does now. I would ask my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe, who had some interests in 1878, if the reason he did not withdraw the capital he had then in manufactures was that he could not withdraw it because they were bankrupt at that time. I might quote to him the evidence of one of the most successful manufacturers in this country, Mr. Côté, of St. Hyacinthe, and I would ask him to say whether protection has not done this country not only an immense good, but removed it from the danger of bankruptcy which was threatening it if the Americans had been allowed to continue to make the country a slaughter market. In 1878 the woollen manufacturers of St. Hyacinthe were on the brink of bankruptcy, now they are prosperous; and I give credit to that little town, Liberal as it is, and I do not find fault with it because it is Liberal. But I would add what my hon. friend has forgotten, that that town has prospered not only on account of the National Policy, which the hon. gentleman has denounced, but on top of the protection given by the Government, it has voted liberal bonuses to manufactures, which have startled other towns in the country which were asserting that St. Hyacinthe was going to ruin. That little town has proved that protection was good even when it went one better than the Government. I say, that if the Government were doing what my hon. friends were saying they were doing, overestimating the capacity of the people of this country to meet the liabilities the Government have incurred for the development of the country, I would say that even this I would approve, and the country and the electors would approve. The electors will always be for a policy that is on the side of hope and progress, and that looks to the building up of a nation; and the electorate will always hold that a policy of hope, of progress, of the building up of a nationality, should be the great aim and object of a Government deserving of the trust of the country, which trust we have received and are doing our best to fulfil. Better than that. In carrying out what is said in the motion in amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster); in declaring not that we want unrestricted reciprocity with the Americans, which would mean the destruction of our manufactures, but that we desire, as good Americans also desire, to have the best of feeling and larger trade relations between the two countries, while taking care to give due consideration to the interests of our own manufacturing industries, and to this end we shall continue to work for the good of the people and the glory of the country.

Mr. FLYNN. It is not my intention to occupy the attention of the House at any length, as this great question has been ably and exhaustively discussed by hon. gentlemen who preceded me on this side, but I feel that I would not fairly discharge the duty I owe to those I have the honor to represent, if I gave a silent vote on a question so important as this. I desire also to say that I do not approach the discussion of this question in any party spirit. Had the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) been moved by any member of the Government or by any of their supporters, or had a resolution embodying the same principle been moved by them, it would have equally received my support and approval. I look upon this question as too broad and comprehensive, as affecting too closely the interests of all classes in this Dominion, to be discussed from the narrow standpoint of party. I support the resolution for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, because I believe it would be of great benefit to the Dominion. I know that unrestricted reciprocity would be of great benefit to the Maritime Provinces, and I know that an overwhelming majority of the people of the Lower Provinces would view any measure embodying that policy with a great deal of favor. Much has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite against the resolution, but their arguments may be narrowed down to two: Disloyalty and injury to our manufacturing industries. There was one gentleman from the Province of Nova Scotia who addressed the House on the resolution, with whose manner I was pleased, but I was surprised at some of the statements that he made. I allude to the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). That hon. gentleman declared that, on this side, we said our people were not prosperous, that our people were not contented, and that they were forced to go to the neighboring republic in search of employment. Did that hon. gentleman attempt to deny those statements? What did he say? He denied that our people were leaving the country, and he contended that the National Policy had established factories all over the land which gave employment to our people, and enabled them to live happily at home. Let me take the eastern part of Nova Scotia. In dealing with this question, I will speak of that section of country with which I am most familiar. I will take the four counties of Cape Breton, the two adjoining counties, making six counties, with a population of over 120,000, and I will take the neighboring province of Prince Edward Island with a population of 108,000; and I say that the National Policy has not built one factory in eastern Nova Scotia. Take the county of Halifax, which has a population of 65,000, with the exception of three factories that were brought into existence through its influence, there is none in all eastern Nova Scotia, including the county of Halifax. It is true the National Policy has built up three industries there: two sugar refineries and a cotton factory. But what was the result? All the original stock of the sugar refinery in the city of Halifax was completely lost, and $100,000 was due to the bank of which this hon. gentleman was president. The hon. gentleman knows also that the refinery, which was started into existence at Dartmouth under the auspices of the National Policy, had scarcely begun running when it also collapsed. It is true these refineries are again running, and may perhaps be doing a little business, but the result I have given was the result in the first instance. The cotton factory was started under the auspices of the National Policy, and now I believe the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) would not give fifty cents in the dollar for its stock. So much for the three factories brought into existence in Nova Scotia. We had some factories in the Maritime Provinces before the introduction of the National Policy. We had three very important factories, Logan's factory in Pictou county, Nova Scotia, the Londonderry steel works in the county of Colchester, represented by the Postmaster General, and Parks cotton factory in New Brunswick. These three factories, under the revenue tariff, previous to the introduction of the National Policy, were able to keep afloat, but after the introduction of the National Policy they collapsed and went to ruin under its benign influence. It would have been better had the hon. gentleman, when he made the statement that our people were employed happily at home in our factories, stated to the House what factories the National Policy had brought into existence in Nova Scotia, and what people were employed in them. Hon. gentlemen on this side, when they made statements that numbers of our people were leaving this country, forced to leave it for the want of employment, were decried throughout this country. It is certainly not pleasant to have to say that people are forced to leave Canada, but, as representatives of the people, we have a solemn duty to perform, and whether hon. gentlemen opposite call the performance of that duty decriing the country or not, the statements are true, and we are justified in making them. I speak with more particular information of the section of country which I represent, and I say that our people have been leaving and are still leaving that section in large numbers for the States. No later than the other day, I received a letter from a friend of mine in the county I represent, who said:

"Hundreds are leaving for the States. The agent of Hawkesbury sold, I am informed, seventy-five tickets in one day this week for Boston."

In another letter my informant tells me:

"The steamer Rimouski continues running here. She has taken a great number of our people within the last fortnight, many of them Frenchmen, who are going to the States. I am told there is a large number preparing to leave between this and the first of April."

I know that last year large numbers left not to return, bringing their families with them, and taking up their domiciles in the United States; and the same emigration continues this year, notwithstanding any statements of hon. gentlemen opposite to the contrary. So far from the National Policy being a benefit, I look upon it as the great est evil that could have befallen the lower Provinces. Now, as to the other arguments that have been adduced in opposition to the resolution moved by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that have been given to the House as evidence of the prosperity of the Dominion of Canada. One is the deposits in the savings banks. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), exultantly pointed out the amount of the deposits in the savings banks in Nova Scotia, and in the Dominion, and said it was absurd for anyone to deny that this was a test and a proof of the prosperity of the people. At the outset, I say that it is no test. I say that the deposits in the savings banks are no test of the prosperity or wealth of this country, and that it is absurd to say that the increase of the deposits in the savings banks is any evidence of an increase in our prosperity. Let me call your attention to the condition of affairs in 1873, which was one of the most prosperous years that we have known in this country. The Finance Minister, in this Budget speech of that year, congratulated the House and the country on the prosperity which existed, and he might well do so. In that year, our imports amounted to $157,514,594, and our exports to $89,789,922, the imports exceeding the imports of 1886 by $28,000,000 and the exports exceeding the exports of 1886 by $4,500,000. That was one of the most prosperous years in the history of the Dominion of Canada. That was admitted on all sides, and this is the evidence that it has never been exceeded in the amount of the trade we did in any year before or since. Well, we find that in that year, the deposits in the savings banks amounted to $10,221,393. We are all aware that a wave of depression swept over this country just after that time, which continued from 1874 to 1879, and I believe there was no more depressed period in the commercial history of Canada before or since. If this savings banks doctrine is true, the savings and accumulations of the years of prosperity should have been taken out during the years of depression, but was that the case? Not at all. I find that, during the period of depression, during the period that hon. gentlemen opposite talked about the "flies on the wheel," and said that the country was going to ruin, the deposits in the savings banks were increasing from year to year until, from $10,000,000 in 1873 they reached, in 1879, $15,375,124, or, during that period of depression the deposits in the saving banks increased by more than 50 per cent. If, during the period of depression, there was a continual yearly increase in the deposits in the saving banks, I would ask hon. gentlemen how those deposits can be an evidence of prosperity, I would ask them how they can say that this is the true test of the wealth and prosperity of the people? I think it is so absurd that I shall not further waste the time of the House upon it. But, if it is a true test of the prosperity of the people, and an index of the wealth and progress of the country, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the savings bank deposits in the New England States. I will take the six States in New England and give you the population of each and the deposits in the savings banks.

| | Population. | Deposits. |
|---------------------|-----------------|----------------|
| Maine | 648,930 | $ 35,111,600 |
| New Hampshire..... | 346,991 | 47,213,219 |
| Vermont | 332,286 | 11,723,625 |
| Massachusetts | 1,783,000 | 274,998,413 |
| Rhode Island | 276,500 | 51,816,390 |
| Connecticut | 622,700 | 92,183,425 |
| Totals | 4,010,526 | $ 513,345,572 |

From this we find that these six States in New England, with a population less than the population of Canada, have savings bank deposits amounting to over $500,000,000, or an amount equal to $125 for every man, woman and child; while we in Canada had, in 1886, an amount of $38,173,813, or about $7.50 per head of the population. Those six States had something over $513,000,000, while we had only $38,000,000. The little State of Rhode Island, with a population a little more than one-half the population of Nova Scotia, and possessing none of her natural advantages, without her wealth of soil, her inexhaustible fisheries, and her undeveloped mineral resources, had an amount deposited in the savings banks of over $51,000,000—a great deal more than the amount of the deposits in the whole Dominion of Canada. Still hon. gentlemen opposite will persist in giving us the saving banks deposits as an evidence of the progress and prosperity of the country. I said at the outset that there was nothing in it, and that it was no test whatever of the progress and prosperity of the country. The people of the Maritime Provinces, having realised the benefits flowing from the limited Treaty of 1854, are fully satisfied that unrestricted trade with the United States would be of vast benefit to them. Trade hampered and restricted as ours is with the country nearest to us must injure and has injured the Maritime Provinces very much. There can be no better proof of the value and advantage of unrestricted reciprocity to the people of the Maritime Provinces at all events, and I think to the people of the whole Dominion, than the progress which was made during the existence of the Treaty of 1854. From the first year of that treaty, our trade with the United States steadily increased until its termination. For a period of nine years previous to the treaty of 1854, our trade with the United States had only increased $12,000,000. In 1845 it was $8,000,000 and in 1884 $20,000,000. But what was the result? The very first year of the treaty, it increased from $20,000,000 to $33,000,000, $13,000,000 in one year, $1,000,000 more than the total increase during a period of nine years previous to the treaty. This increase continued year after year until, in 1866, the last year of the treaty, it had reached the enormous sum of $84,000,000. During the existence of the treaty, a period of 12 years, our trade had increased $64,000,000, while, during a period of nine years previous, it had only increased $12,000,000. What do we find the very first year of its abrogation? When the treaty was abrogated in 1866 and the restrictive duties became operative again, there was a falling off in our trade with the United States of $27,000,000. Let me call your attention again to the effect which this had on the Maritime Provinces, for I have been referring to the trade of the whole Dominion. The trade of Nova Scotia with the States amounted, in 1854, to $4,500,000; in 1866 it amounted to $7,300,000. The trade of New Brunswick with the United States amounted, in 1854, to $4,050,000; in 1866, to $5,300,000. The trade of Prince Edward Island with the United States amounted, in 1854, to $20,000; in 1865—the Island fiscal year closing in December—the trade was $1,050,000, while the increase in the other Provinces was very great indeed. The increase in the trade of the Island was marvellous, amounting to over 400 per cent. These figures show what great advantage the Reciprocity Treaty was to these three Provinces during its existence. Now, Sir, I have a statement here, from which it appears that while the treaty was in existence our population kept on steadily increasing, but after its abrogation the population decreased. This appears from the following statement:—

| | 1851. | 1871. | Percentage of increase. |
|---------------------------|---------|---------|-------------------------|
| Nova Scotia..... | 276,851 | 337,800 | 40.0 |
| New Brunswick | 193,800 | 285,594 | 47.4 |
| Prince Edward Island..... | 87,000 | 96,226 | 40.3 |
| Totals | 557,654 | 767,415 | 42.7 |

| | 1871. | 1881. | |
|---------------------------|---------|---------|------|
| Nova Scotia | 387,800 | 440,572 | 14·3 |
| New Brunswick | 285,594 | 321,233 | 12·5 |
| Prince Edward Island..... | 96,226 | 108,891 | 15·8 |
| Totals | 767,451 | 870,696 | 13·5 |

Reducing these percentages to the base of yearly increase we get—

| | Average increase per year. |
|----------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 42·7 per cent. in 20 years | 2·135 |
| 13·5 do 10 do | 1·035 |

Now, if, during those 12 years, we increased so much more rapidly than during the following ten years, it is fair to assume that if the whole term had been under reciprocity, our progress in population would have been twice as rapid as it was in the period without reciprocity. I have given this evidence of the progress of the country during the existence of that treaty as a proof of the great advantage we would derive from a renewal of it. At all events, to the people of the Maritime Provinces it is a question of vital importance, more particularly to the fishermen. I have the honor to represent a constituency largely engaged in the fishing industry, and I know how much that industry has suffered from the duties it has to pay on fish now exported to the United States, and I know how many of our fishermen leave, year after year, to man American fishing vessels, because as was stated the other night, the man who fishes in a Nova Scotia fishing vessel labors under a disadvantage as compared with a Nova Scotian who fishes in an American fishing vessel; he saves so much duty on his codfish, and $2 a barrel on his mackerel. Now, it was stated here the other night by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) that the United States was the only market for our mackerel. That statement is correct; I state also that the only market for the mackerel produced by the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, is the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the testimony of these two hon. gentlemen, let me give the testimony of an hon. gentleman whose opinion will be accepted with the highest respect, at least by hon. gentlemen opposite—I allude to the Premier. In 1871, in discussing the Washington Treaty, in this House, the Premier said:

"They are so anxious to get free admission of their fish into the American market that they would view with great sorrow any action of this House which would exclude them from that market, that they look forward with increasing confidence to a large development of their trade, and of that great industry, and I say that being the case—if it be to the interest of the fishermen and for the advantage of that branch of national industry, setting aside all other considerations, we ought not wilfully to injure that interest. Why, Sir, what is the fact of the case as it stands? The only market for the Canadian No. 1 mackerel in the world is the United States. That is our only market and we are practically excluded from it by the present duty. The consequence of that is that our fishermen are at the mercy of the American fishermen. They are made the hewers of wood and the drawers of waters for the Americans. They are obliged to sell their fish at the Americans own price. The American fishermen purchase their fish at a nominal value and control the American market. The great profits of the trade are handed over to the American fishermen or the American merchants, engaged in the trade and they profit to the loss of our own industry and our own people."

Again, in the same speech on that occasion, in alluding to the period during the existence of the treaty of 1854, he said:

"More goods were imported than ever before, commerce was brisk, stores were open and profits made which never would have been realised but for the existence of the treaty."

Again the Premier said on that occasion:

"That our fisheries are valuable, I am, well aware. Their value, under favorable conditions, could not be overestimated, but that value will be great or small, just in proportion to the markets we possess."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could use no more expressive or powerful language than this, to show the value of the markets of the United States to the fishermen of the Lower Provinces. There was one other point thrown out, with which I will deal briefly, that is the question of direct taxation. It was stated here by some hon. gentlemen that we levied $7,000,000 in customs duties on imports from the United States, and that if the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford was to come into effect, and we were to have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, we would lose this revenue of $7,000,000, and that this loss could only be made up by direct taxation. Mr. Speaker, I deny that, I deny that one dollar of direct taxation would have to be levied on the people of this country as a result of reciprocity. In 1878 the present Finance Minister, then in Opposition, stated, when the expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration amounted to $22,500,000, that it was more than enough to govern this country, and he stated in this House that if he and his friends were again restored to power, they were capable in the future, as they had in the past, of governing this country wisely, economically and well, but within certain bounds and limits. What were those limits? Within the limits of $22,000,000 or $23,000,000. That same statement was made by Sir Leonard Tilley, then Mr. Tilley, the member for St. John. He stated that the Mackenzie Administration was extravagant, and that an expenditure of $23,000,000 was much more than was needed to govern this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the expenditure last year? I think it was $36,000,000—I am speaking from memory. If it was $36,000,000 it would be something like $13,000,000 in excess of what hon. gentlemen made out. If you take $7,000,000 from the $13,000,000 you still have $6,000,000 left, and adding that to the $23,000,000 would give $29,000,000, even without the $7,000,000, which hon. gentlemen opposite say we would lose. We will suppose that if unrestricted reciprocity came into force we lost the $7,000,000. Who pays that amount? Those are duties on goods which are paid by the people of the Dominion. If we had unrestricted reciprocity we would lose those $7,000,000? The people of Canada instead of paying $7,000,000 in duties, would be purchasing goods to that value. But supposing there was a loss to the revenue of the country, is there any way of balancing the account by retrenchment? I say there is. There are many items on which retrenchment can be made. In the first place, if we had unrestricted reciprocity we could save $150,000 annually expended on the protection of our fisheries. No less than $27,000 has been expended of the Railway Commission and $24,000 on the Labor Commission up to date, a total expenditure of over $50,000, and whatever benefit it may be to Ontario or Quebec I unhesitatingly say that will be of no benefit to the people of Nova Scotia. Then there is the Franchise Act, which is not necessary in my opinion, which costs $500,000. That amount could be saved. Then there is the expenditure on immigration, regarding which the policy of the Government has been changed this year. That amount could be saved. Then there is the militia expenditure, a large amount of which is unnecessary, there is a large expenditure also for the Mounted Police, and there are also various items on which saving could be effected if a policy of retrenchment were pursued. But above and beyond all, if we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, I maintain that such would be the prosperity of the country that the volume of dutiable goods from other countries would so greatly increased and the purchasing power of the people would be much enlarged as to make up any deficiency for the loss sustained. Give us reciprocity, and there is nobody in Nova Scotia who will fear to face the $7,000,000 deficiency. Two of the main arguments used by hon. gentlemen who opposed the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) are the disloyalty argument and the loss to our manufacturers. I fail to see how the exchange of a few barrels of fish or a few bushels of potatoes with our neighbors across the border could affect our loyalty. Of course, since the Finance Minister spoke yesterday afternoon, the opposition to the resolution has taken quite a different turn. The resolution was opposed outright by the amendment of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but yesterday during discussion the Finance Minister said it was the policy of the Government now, as it had been their policy before, to obtain reciprocity in natural products. Therefore, he has relieved us from the crime of wanting in allegiance, or disloyalty so far as natural products are concerned. It was asserted before that, that would be an act of disloyalty, but anything in regard to manufactured goods would be an overt act of treason compassing the death of Her Majesty, according to the views of some hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me go back as far as the year 1847. Such a depression of trade prevailed at that time in Upper and Lower Canada that a petition was sent to Her Majesty asking the Imperial Government to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Nothing came of it, but it resulted in the annexation movement of 1849. We had a treaty in 1854 in natural products and also a treaty in 1871, and if that treaty was not a more extended treaty it was because the British commissioners could not get a more extended treaty. There was no disloyalty then in regard to those who framed the treaty for an interchange of commodities with the United States; and if we ask more extended terms for an interchange of manufactures as well as natural products, are we open to the charge of disloyalty? Not at all. If it was not disloyal at that time, it cannot be disloyal now. I quote now from the Minute of Council of 1865, which has already been quoted, but it is one of those documents which it is necessary to bring forward because of the contentions put forward by hon. members, and in fact the Secretary of State himself used the word "annexation" 50 or 60 times during his speech and the whole tendency of his utterances was not to meet by argument the resolution of unrestricted reciprocity and to show that it would be an injury to Canada, but he sought to lead the people off the track by inducing them to believe it would bring on annexation. That is the reason I quote this statement from the Minute of Council in 1865, in which it is stated:

"Under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government which the later policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada in common with the other colonies possessing representative institutions combined with the advantages secured by the Reciprocity Treaty of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbors in the natural productions of the two countries all agitation for organic changes has ceased, all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the Provinces has wholly disappeared."

In the same document in urging upon the British Government the necessity for renewing the treaty they say:

"They cannot err in directing the attention of the English Government to the connection which is usually found to exist between the material prosperity and the political contentment of a people, for in doing so they feel that they are appealing to the highest motives that can actuate patriotic statesmen—the desire to perpetuate a Dominion, founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people."

Here we have it laid down as a doctrine that political contentment exists with material prosperity. Thus if we had material prosperity under the tariff of 1854 we had the assurance that we would have that prosperity increased under the treaty for unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States, and having that prosperity we would have contentment. If there is an annexation feeling existing to-day, and I know it does exist, so long as we are shut out of the neighboring republic it will exist, so long as trade is depressed, so long as we have high tariffs on both sides it will exist. Let us have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States to-morrow and a free interchange of natural and manufactured products and that feeling will disappear at once, because I believe no matter whether the Government is one by a Czar or republic, there will be contentment if there is prosperity. It was said in 1878, when the present Premier, then in Opposition, moved his resolution, that it was not for a protective policy but that its main object was to secure a reciprocity of tariff. That was in 1878—I recollect it well—and on every hustings in Nova Scotia where we fought the battle we had two things to meet. They knew the Maritime Provinces would oppose a protective policy, that it would be injurious to their best interests, and it was then said we asked for a protective policy in order to obtain reciprocity. It was a readjustment of the tariff or a reciprocity of tariff leading up to a reciprocity of trade. Here was the statement:

"Will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade."

It has not developed that interprovincial trade. The interprovincial trade has been one-sided, because, as has been repeatedly said, you cannot legislate against geography. The people of Ontario do sell us a lot of goods, but we sell them nothing in return. They take none of our farm produce, because it is too far and too costly to send to them; they take none of our coal, because that is bulky and costly and they cannot take it, but they buy American coal notwithstanding the duty upon it. It is true that the Province of Quebec may have taken some coal from the Province of Nova Scotia, but how has this happened? As was stated here to-night, it was done at the expense of the people of the Dominion of Canada. You send it from Pictou to Quebec a distance of 637 miles at 80 cents a ton, 20 cents less than we have to pay from Pictou to the place where I live. That is the way you force that interprovincial trade. I shall say nothing in reference to the standing offer as enough has been said on that question within the last few days. The cry of loyalty is one used as a bugbear to frighten weakminded people, but I do not think it will have much effect. The people of Canada have always had a strong attachment to the mother country. It is the land of our fathers, and everyone of us feels strongly attached to the old country. But we have another land. There is this Canada. It is our home and we in Parliament who are entrusted with the legislation of the country should have as our aim and our object, to legislate in that direction in which we may advance and promote the best interests of Canada. That is the true way, and it should be the true object of every Canadian legislator. Now, Sir, in addition to the benefit from a commercial point of view, there is another good result that would follow from unrestricted reciprocity. If we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States it would settle the fishery question, that question which has time and again given rise to serious complications between England and the United States, and one that may at any time, by an act of imprudence on the part of an officer in charge of one of our police vessels, involve both countries in serious difficulties. I say that in addition to the commercial advantages that would follow from unrestricted reciprocity the settlement of this question would be one very desirable result which would be sure to follow. We must protect our fisheries. They are ours by solemn compact. We have certain rights that foreign fishermen are excluded from. We have always been willing, and are willing still, in consideration of a fair equivalent, to give within our territorial waters the same rights as we possess ourselves, but until we get that fair equivalent those fisheries must be protected, and during their protection serious difficulties may arise which it would be well if we could avoid, and I believe that only by unrestricted reciprocity can we avoid them. I believe, Sir, too, that the overwhelming majority of the people of this Dominion favor the resolution submitted by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—all but the manufacturing class. But, Sir, all those engaged in the manufacturing industry are not opposed to unrestricted reciprocity. I saw the other day in one of the leading journals of Toronto forty or fifty names of leading manufacturers who were in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, and I have heard gentlemen on this side of the House name others who are not afraid of that policy. I cannot see what our manufacturer has to fear. With all the modern appliances, cheap machinery, cheap raw material, with as cheap labor as they can procure in the United States, with proper care, and proper supervision over their industries, what have Canadian manufacturers to fear? Nothing whatever, Mr. Speaker. Under unrestricted reciprocity in place of five millions as consumers they would have sixty-five millions, and therefore they have nothing to fear. But suppose some of those industries would suffer; is the limited few engaged directly and indirectly in the manufacturing industries of this country to stand in the way of the prosperity of the great majority? Let us compare the few engaged in the manufacturing industries or those who give employment with the lumbermen, with the fishermen, the farmers, the mechanics, the laborers and all the other classes who are not benefited in the slightest, but who are oppressed by this system of taxation which protects the manufacturing industries. Our total exports in 1886 were $80,000,000. Our export of manufactured goods was $3,000,000 and the exports of the forest, mines, fisheries and the soil were $77,000,000. Here we have an export of $80,000,000 and only $3,000,000 of which was exported by manufacturers, and yet we are asked to stay our hand and not to accept reciprocity with the United States because we will injure the manufactures in this Dominion by so doing. We have engaged in agricultural pursuits 657,281 people; laborers 165,000; fishermen and other occupations over 250,000, making a total of 1,580,000. I take those statistics from a book issued by the Agricultural Department, the Statistical Record of 1886. Of those engaged in manufactures we have 2,390, of operatives 5,846 or 8,236 as compared with over 1,000,000 engaged in other pursuits, and yet we are asked to stay our hand in order to protect the few, when we could benefit the majority. Now, Sir, unrestricted reciprocity would not only give us a market for our natural products, but would give a great stimulus to the development of our mineral resources. We have in this Dominion a great many valuable mineral deposits, particularly in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, and they only await capital for their development. If we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States the necessary capital would flow in and employment would be given to the people and our mines would be developed. Now, Sir, the amendment moved by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), refers to reciprocity in our coasting trade. It is not necessary for me to say much on this, because we all know that it would be of immense advantage to us if we could have the coasting trade of the States given for reciprocal privileges on our side, and it would be a great boon to the people of the Maritime Provinces if we could have the reciprocal right of registering our vessels in the United States. Much has been said about it being beneath the dignity of Canada to approach the United States, and we were pointed out the standing or statutory offer as regards reciprocal arrangement. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see nothing dignified in the part of Canada approaching the United States, but we need not approach them, as they have approached us by Mr. Bayard. In order to have this fishery question settled, he has invited Sir Charles Tupper in these words:

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States, has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to.

Your own able, earnest and patriotic services in the Government and Parliament of the Dominion are well known, and afford ample proof of your comprehension of the resources, rapidly increasing interests and needs of British North America. On the other hand, I believe I am animated by an equal desire to serve my own country. I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

In reply to that, Sir Charles Tupper said:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Now, Sir, here is a proposition by Mr. Bayard, the United States Secretary of State, in which Sir Charles Tupper concurred, and I concur in it also. I believe, Sir, that it is the only way to settle the fishery question—that the only true solution of that difficulty must be founded on a basis of unrestricted commerce between the two countries. Now, it is said that the United States abrogated both the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871. That is true, but what were the reasons? Under the treaty of 1854, by which we had an interchange of natural products only, I believe Canada had the best of the bargain; but we all know the unfortunate attitude assumed by England towards the United States in regard to the war that raged in the Union. Not only England, but Canada largely sympathised with the South, and such was the feeling in the United States against England on that account that the American Government took the earliest opportunity to give notice of the abrogation of that treaty. Under the treaty of 1871 $5,000,000 was awarded to Canada for the use of our fisheries, but that was only for ten years. The Americans believed, whether rightly or wrongly that they were giving too much, and the only way to avoid paying any more was to give notice of the abrogation of the treaty. But to-day we find a better feeling in the United States; we find that this question of freer commercial relations has been discussed by the leading men there and has been brought before Congress; and if there ever was an opportune moment to approach the United States on this great and important question, it is the present. If there is one reason more than another that would induce me to look with favor on the treaty recently negotiated at Washington, it is the hope that its adoption would lead to kinder and more friendly feelings between the two countries, and tend to bring about unrestricted reciprocity. I believe unrestricted reciprocity would give a great impetus to the trade of Canada, especially to the lumbering, the farming and the fishing industries. It would open up our vast mineral resources to capital. It would, I believe, remove the discontent now existing in the Maritime Provinces, and would give them prosperity. It would produce on a more extended scale the great benefits that resulted from the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. It would give our young men employment and keep them at home, and inspire them with hope in the future of their country. It would, by permanently settling the fishery question, remove all cause of ill-feeling between England and the United States, and lead to amity and friendship between the two foremost nations in commerce and civilisation, in the world, in whose friendship no part of the Empire has greater interest than the Dominion of Canada. For these reasons I intend to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I would not at this late hour of the debate have dreamed of adding one link to the long chain of argument which we have had, if the position taken by the hon. member for South Oxford in opening this discussion had been adhered to by hon. gentlemen opposite. But in consequence of the amendment to the amendment of the hon. Minister of Marine, which was moved by the hon. member for Halifax, looking to a request for a reciprocal coasting trade and a reciprocity in the registration of ships, and in consequence of the strong terms and glowing language with which the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) in anticipating that amendment, have spoken of the value of reciprocity in the registration of ships, I thought it my duty, not having heard this point dwelt upon by any hon. member on either side of the House, to address a few remarks to the House with reference to it. These hon. gentlemen spoke—I say it not disrespectfully—as if they had found a mare's nest and hit upon a new wrinkle in this country. But I would remind the House and the country that this is not the first time, nor the second, nor the third, nor even the tenth time in the history of Canada that efforts have been made by the Canadian people to secure reciprocity in the coasting trade. I quite agree with all that was said as to the value of that trade, and with the cheerful and hopeful spirit with which the hon. member for Halifax spoke of our shipowners, those who man and build our schooners, brigantines and brigs in the Maritime Provinces, and of their ability to fit up those ships and sell them in the American market, and to do a very large portion of the coasting trade. With all those remarks in appreciation of our own people I agree. If we could secure a part of the coasting trade, the people along the coasts of the Maritime Provinces would find their interests advanced. There is no doubt about the excellency of the hon. gentleman's proposition, but there are grave doubts about its practicability. The serious question is, whether the amendment of the hon. gentleman is likely in any way to advance the proposition. He has tacked it on to a resolution which is clearly not in accord with the temper of this House, and it is not, therefore, likely to advance that action which we all agree would be salutary to Canadian shipping. Of all strong and powerful commercial nations, the United States of America have shown themselves the most jealous with regard to their own coasting trade; they have most jealously guarded it, and most jealously excluded from all share in it the vessels of foreign nations. That could be proved if the time of the House would allow me to do so, but I will not trespass on the time of the House to prove it. I will only ask hon. gentlemen to read the section of the American Shipping Act and contrast that with the section of our own Act, and still more with the Canadian Order in Council of 1886, and they will find our coasting laws are very much more liberal than theirs. In all attempts to negotiate treaties with the United States, we have failed to secure reciprocal coasting trade. To go back thirty years, I will refer to the fact that in the negotiations which lead to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, there was not one advance made by the Americans, there was not one response made by the American negotiators to our request that our vessels should be allowed to participate in their coasting trade; and I desire to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in all the provisions of the treaty of 1854, there is not one that looks in the direction of reciprocal coasting trade. Within the last hundred years there never has been in our history any period in which there was such a feeling of amity and good will between Great Britain and the United States as in 1853 and 1854. All the bitterness of the old wars had faded almost from memory. The generation which then ruled had forgotten the quarrels of 1776 and 1812, and that period antedated by six or seven years the bitter feeling that was to arise out of the American civil war. But even in those years of amity and good will Americans were unwilling to grant us anything like reciprocal coasting trade. In 1871 once more Her British Majesty's plenipotentiaries are found in Washington, undertaking to negotiate another treaty, the Alabama treaty. A Canadian statesman was one of the five British Commissioners, and if the House will permit me I will read the record, to show by the protocols of the treaty of that year, that once more an advance was made by the British Commissioners in the direction of obtaining reciprocal coasting trade between the United States and Canada, but once more the reply was discouraging. The plain cold words of the reply as shown in the protocol to that treaty are as discouraging as words can be. The protocol reads as follows:—

"The British Commissioners then suggested: That, if any considerable modification were made in the tariff arrangements of that treaty, the coasting trade of the United States and of Her British Majesty's possessions in North America should be reciprocally thrown open, and that the navigation of the River St. Lawrence and of the Canadian canals should be also thrown open to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with British subjects."

And the answer given was:

"The American Commissioners declined this proposal."

In 1874 once more we find the representatives of Great Britain and the representatives of this Dominion in Washington, undertaking to negotiate a trade treaty with the Americans and once more the record shows that our Canadian representatives asked that a scheme of reciprocal coasting trade should be considered and favorably entertained by the American commissioners. In the draft of the treaty of that year, you will find the record is as discouraging as it was in 1871. Read the protocol of that treaty which the Hon. George Brown, on behalf of Canada, undertook to carry through:

"We propose that during the continuance of the treaty the coasting trade of Canada and the United States shall be thrown open to the vessels of both countries on the footing of complete reciprocal equality."

Here is the second proposal:

"We propose that during the continuance of the treaty vessels of all kinds built in the United States and Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other, and be entitled to registry in either country."

There is the precise proposal. To this proposal the United States gave as before an unfavorable reply. Therefore in 1854, 1871 and 1874, the Canadian people have been knocking at the door of the United States asking for this boon in vain. It is not dignified, it is unworthy of us, it is idle, it is, if I may use the expression, puerile, to be clamouring for all the good things of life when we cannot get them, and to be like children reaching out their hands for the moon; clamouring for something which our past experience shows us we are not at all likely to obtain. I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and in so doing I do not apprehend that I am in the least degree voting adversely to our interests as regards reciprocal coasting trade. When that is voted down, the position will be this, that we are a people who have had for eighteen years on our Statute-book a clear law, offering to go half way, not with the United States alone, but with any people who will go half way with us in the direction of reciprocal coasting trade. In the Act of 1880, chapter 14, section 2, are these words:

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, declare that the foregoing provisions of this Act, shall not, while such Order in Council is in force, apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country in which British ships are admitted to the coasting trade of such country, and to carry goods and passengers from one port or place in such country to another, and may, from time to time, revoke or alter such Order in Council."

In other words, as soon as any foreign state will admit Canadian vessels to the enjoyment of their coasting trade, we will admit them. We will not ask them to wait for several months, until Parliament meets, but we will at a day's notice, as soon as a meeting of the Council can be held, empower them to come and share our coasting trade. This Act was put on the Statute-book when the right hon. the First Minister held the same position which he holds to-day. It was put on the Statute-book by the party which we are supporting. We have shown our good faith in this matter, and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot tell us, in regard to this, as they do with reference to the Tariff Act of 1879, that it is a delusion, a sham and a blind, that it is insincerely put there, because almost continuously since 1870, with scarcely the intermission of a year, the Canadian Government has been making representations, through the British Minister at Washington, calling the attention of the American Government to the existence of this statute, and asking that they should go half way to meet us. Furthermore, we have evidence that eight or nine of these States, which have the largest commercial marine in the world, have accepted our offer. The great Mediterranean state, Italy, the great Northern state, Germany, Austro-Hungary, the Netherlands, Belgium, the Scandinavian powers, Sweden and Norway and Denmark, have accepted it; and the young republic to the far south of us, the Argentine republic, with which we in New Brunswick are in hopes of cultivating a large and successful trade,—this young sister of our own, starting on the career of life with about our population and with the same hopes, has opened her coasting trade to us as we have opened ours to her. The very fact then that these eight or nine nations, many of them powerful nations and the foremost carriers of the world, if you except France and the United States, have admitted our coasting vessels to enjoy their trade, shows that the Act of 1870 is not a delusion or a blind. In 1879, our Government made an energetic representation to the American Government, asking them to meet us half way, and during this year of grace 1888, not six weeks ago, representations have been made to the Americans, once more calling attention to the existence of this law on our Statute-book of 1870, and which appears on the statutes to-day. Therefore the Government have shown the most perfect good faith and the most unrelenting anxiety to secure this trade, and the hope that hon. gentlemen opposite have of obtaining some little sham credit by introducing their amendment to the amendment is a vain and delusive hope. In the nursery tales, children are told that where the rainbow arc rests on the hill, at the foot will be found a pot of gold. Children running for that insubstantial treasure are not running on a more fruitless and frivolous errand than hon. gentlemen opposite would have us run when they ask us to vote for this amendment. I would sit down and would not say one other word, having spoken on this particular matter, were it not for the remarks uttered by the hon. the leader of the Opposition this afternoon, remarks which I was deeply pained to hear and which I deeply regretted that he should make. We must all admire the duel which took place between the two brilliant French Canadian statesmen, the Liberal leader and the Conservative Minister, in a language which is not their mother tongue. But, while we were delighted to listen to that, as one who comes from the Lower Provinces I was deeply pained to hear the unnecessary remark which was made by the Leader of the Opposition, that our Lower Provinces were on the verge of revolt. If it be parliamentary to say so, I state that that is unmitigated rubbish. I declare that there is not any man in the Lower Provinces out of politics who believes it, and that there is no one out of politics in those Provinces who will venture to make the statement; and, further, I say that there is not a county in New Brunswick to which any man can go with any chance for election on the ground of repeal. I see before me the hon. member for the City of St. John, and I am sure that he will not contradict me in regard to that, and, if my hon. friend from the City and County of St. John were here, I am sure that he would state that I am not mistaken.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in regard to Nova Scotia.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I will speak of Nova Scotia presently.

28—1888—4

Mr. JONES (Digby). He is not entirely mistaken in regard to Nova Scotia.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I think my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Gillmor) will say as I do, that no one who attempted to stump the county of Carleton in favor of a repeal of the Union could hope to carry that county. I speak with moderation, and I speak in all sincerity, when I say I do not believe there is a single county in New Brunswick where a man would have a ghost of a chance of election who ran on the ground of repeal. Now, with reference to Nova Scotia, although I have lived there for five years, I have no possible right to speak for that Province; but, as a bystander, I know something of the feeling, I know something of the wave which struck that Province in the summer of 1886; I know that the Province of Nova Scotia at that time put on record its constitutional decree in favor of a repeal of the Union; but I tell the hon. the leader of the Opposition that, when he was advised that nineteen-twentieths of the people of Nova Scotia were in favor of the repeal of the Union, somebody was stuffing him. I hope he was not misled in the same way as his friends were misled when they thought that the local election which took place at that time was an indication of the feeling of the Province. We were told that 19 out of the 21 members from Nova Scotia would support Mr. Blake, and we know the result. I will put against the information which the hon. gentleman has received, the facts as they are recorded in the leading Liberal paper of the Maritime Provinces, the Halifax Chronicle, and I desire to read an extract from a speech made by Mr. Fielding, who was the head and front of that movement, and who carried his party into power on the wave which that agitation raised. He has abandoned that movement and has said that, while he thought the people of Nova Scotia gave a mandate in favor of repeal in the summer of 1886, he finds that in February, 1887, they have withdrawn that mandate. I quote from a speech delivered by Mr. Fielding on the 24th February last, and printed in the Chronicle on the 25th February, 1888. This is what is reported of the utterances of Mr. Fielding, the Premier of Nova Scotia, in the paper which for many years he edited himself:

"The people of Nova Scotia in 1886 did seem to return a majority to this House favorable to the policy of repeal. Previous to that election the Government were met with a taunt that they would not dare to submit such an issue to the people, but when they proved that they did dare to do it our opponents said it was done in haste and that no importance was to be attached to the result. The next election, the Dominion election, seemed to tell a different story, and the same constitutional state of affairs which made it appear previously that the people desired repeal, made it necessary after the elections of 1887 to recognise the fact that the people had not declared in favor of repeal, but against it."

When the leader of the repeal movement in Nova Scotia has abandoned the matter, as he has; when he is afraid of it and is anxious to get rid of it, it is little short of a calamity that we should have hon. gentlemen opposite stating that nineteen-twentieths of the people of that Province are in favor of it. I credit those hon. gentlemen with sincerity. They bear the taxes and the burdens of the people as well as ourselves, and I have no doubt that the overwhelming majority of hon. gentlemen opposite have the same love for the country as we have ourselves. What good end is gained by scattering abroad these unfounded stories? We know that the Island of Prince Edward, from which my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) comes, was approached in the summer of 1886 by Mr. Fielding, and that, in that year, which seemed to be favorable to that purpose, the overtures of Mr. Fielding and Mr. Longley were not received very well by their political friends in that island. We know that Mr. Blair, that very able and astute political leader in New Brunswick, had not very favorable words for Mr. Fielding when he approached him on the same subject. I say that this Canadian Confederation, young as it is, although its life was threatened by those political incendiaries in Nova Scotia in 1886, who I believe were not sincere in their attack when they laid their knife to the throat of our Canadian Confederation, will continue to live; and I assert that the overwhelming opinion, not only in New Brunswick, but in the whole of the three Provinces by the sea, is in favor of standing by the Canadian Confederation.

Mr. SEMPLE. I do not desire to say very much at this late hour and at this period of a protracted debate. However, I cannot let the opportunity pass, as I live in one of the most fruitful agricultural constituencies in the Dominion. We have heard a great deal on the other side from the standpoint of the manufacturers, and I think there should be a little heard also in regard to the farmers. I have never yet met a person who did not agree that the reciprocity with the United States which we had from 1854 to 1866 was a great benefit to this country. It was something that the people saw they had an advantage in, and, no matter what their politics may be, they have all said that they would like to see a return of the same good times. When that is the case, I think we should endeavor to obtain a return of those good times. For my part, I would be well satisfied to have the same reciprocity as we had before, but it appears that we cannot get it, and that we must go a step further and have reciprocity not only in natural products but in manufactured articles as well. We are led to believe from those manufacturers who are established on a sound basis and are self-reliant that they have no fear for the future and are willing to meet competition. It is only the portion of the manufacturers who are spoon-fed, who have been getting from the Government an Act of Parliament to suit them and to give them special privileges, and in that way to take it out of the consumers, who object to this. The insinuation has been thrown out that hon. members on this side of the House decry the country. It is no such a thing. We can speak well of the country, but not as well as we possibly might, and we think it would be well to have something done to help the country. Now, the county from which I come, and those adjoining it, are doing very well, to all appearances, but when you speak with the people they will tell you that the country was never in a worse position than it has been these last six years. The whole county of Wellington has decreased in population, in six years, 237. The property valuation has gone down, although that is something hard to estimate, because they generally make the same valuation from year to year, as it seems to make no difference to the people in a township or the county whether the valuation be high or low, so that a change is not made. But when we come to examine the prices at which farms are disposed of, we realise the depreciation in the value of property. I will give you one or two instances. I know a farm of 170 acres that was bought five years ago for $10,000, and it has recently been offered at $8,500. I know a house that cost $4,000, the building was put in the market and the best offer that could be obtained was $1,700. There is any amount of property for sale, but there is no one to buy. When I passed through the city of Toronto, I noticed in a hotel a bill of a Mr. Daly, real estate agent, who stated that he had 500 farms to sell. Now, 500 farms by one agent is certainly a large number. Nothing can give a better indication of the state of a country than the decline in the number of inhabitants and the depreciation in the value of farm properties, and in both these particulars the facts show that the country is not in a prosperous condition. Now, Sir, I went over the census returns for a number of counties, and I find that in 26 counties there has been a gain of 21,413, while in 10 counties there has been a decrease of 8,830. The whole value of farm lands in the Province of Ontario is $989,497,911, and in those 26 counties it is $696,101,331; so you see that where land is the best, where property is of the greatest value, there has been a falling off, because there is not nearly the natural increase in the population that we should expect. Now, I will read an extract on this subject from the Bureau of Industries:

"Out of the 45 counties and districts into which the Province is divided, not less than 17 show a slight falling off in the rural population of 1886 as compared with that of 1877. The decreases occur mainly in the older counties along the shores of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and in the figures of rural populations chiefly. Whenever towns or villages come within the bounds of counties with a decreasing rural population, the increase in these generally suffices to offset the falling away in the county; but in the counties of Norfolk, Haldimand, Huron, Perth, Durham, Northumberland and Prince Edward, the total population was less in 1886 than in 1877. In this table the cities are included in the respective counties within which they are situated, and a comparison of the totals at the foot of the table will show how much more rapidly the population has grown in the cities, towns and villages than in the townships. During the ten years the township population increased from 1,103,671 to 1,144,520, being for the ten years a fraction over 3 per cent. In the same period the city, town and village population grew from 511,672 to 674,506, an increase of nearly 32 per cent."

Thus you see that the towns, cities and villages are gaining very rapidly, and the rural sections are falling behind. That is one of the effects of the National Policy; it is making the people who raise the supplies poorer, and is increasing the population of the towns and cities. Now, there is another question that came up concerning which we have had extracts read from Professor Brown. I have heard his statements spoken of as extravagant. I suppose he was something like a tailor I heard of. Thirty years ago some of the tailors were itinerant, and went round from house to house to make clothes for the people. On one occasion this tailor had made a coat. It was tried on, but it did not fit the person for whom it was made. "Well," said the tailor, "I think I have taken the wrong figures." And so with Professor Brown, I suppose he has taken the wrong figures in his dividend. Now, I will read you the report of a greater man than Professor Brown, I will read you the report of Professor Mills of the Experimental Farm at Guelph, who in his younger days, was a practical farmer and understands the situation very well. His report contrasts with that of Professor Brown. Here is what he says:

"In this country the price of produce is exceptionally low, and we have coupled with it the comparatively high price of manufactured articles. Generally speaking, we may say that what the farmer has to sell is cheap, and what he has to buy is dear. Therefore the agricultural atmosphere is disturbed. A feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction is abroad. The farmer finds it increasingly difficult to make a comfortable living, and something must be done to remove the difficulty or the whole community will suffer. Farmers often get credit for grumbling without any well-defined reason. But in this case the trouble is really serious—so much so that no one can question its existence, and wise men will not minify its gravity. * * * The farmer requires a small amount of the produce of his farm for his own use. But all that he has, over and above this amount, is no benefit to him unless there is demand for it. Even a very limited demand for his surplus produce makes it of some use to him. But there must be a sufficient demand at a price which will cover the cost of production and pay a fair rate of interest on the capital invested, or continuance in the business will soon lead to bankruptcy. Hence Canadian farmers have imposed upon themselves taxes for the building of railways in order to reach or create markets for their produce. But, after all, a demand for farm produce in the Dominion is limited, and the prices are exceptionally low."

"Now, in view of these facts, nothing can be clearer than that the farmers have reason on their side when they demand that no restriction on trade, which this Dominion has power to remove, shall be allowed to interfere with the price of grain, fruits, live stock, or dairy products of this country."

"Not having studied the pros and cons of commercial union, we have nothing to say on that question, but simply lay it down as fundamental, that we should seek the best trade relations which we can possibly get, whether it be by negotiation with England, or the United States, or any other country."

"Ontario farmers, at least, seem to understand the situation, and are waking up to the necessity of united action in a matter of so much importance. Let them get a clear understanding of what their interests under this head really are, then unitedly indicate their wish, and it must be granted. If, however, they allow interested men of any class to divide their ranks, and play them off one against another, they will undoubtedly fail, and bring upon themselves the well deserved contempt of every other class."

That is a very fair description of the situation. Another reason why I think something should be done to help the country is the enormous taxation, which has been rapidly increasing. If we have heavy burdens imposed on us we should be afforded some chance to improve our position if possible. During the time Mr. Mackenzie's Administration was in power it was charged with being corrupt and spending money lavishly; but what are the facts? After the Government had been in power four years, the amount to be raised was $23,500,000, an increase of $200,000, or an average of $50,000 a year. What has been the position of affairs since the present occupants of the Treasury benches assumed power? The increase in ten years has been $12,500,000 or an increase of $1,250,000 a year. It is thus evident that the expenditure can be kept down, and I have no doubt it can be done again. In regard to the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of which I very highly approve, there is nothing cringing about it, as has been alleged, but it is a resolution simply stating that it would be for the advantage of the country if the Government would endeavor to bring about freer trade relations with the United States. When Mr. Greenway came here to make an arrangement respecting Manitoba it was said that he would only be humbugged and be compelled to return without getting anything, but he appears to have been successful; and we do not know but that if a proper offer was made to the United States in the direction indicated in the resolution it would not be successful. When the Reciprocity Treaty was repealed some years ago there were several reasons why it was done. The United States was passing through a civil war, involving a great loss of life and destruction of property. They needed all the taxation that could be raised, and I believe Hon. George Brown was not successful at Washington in 1874 because the Americans wished to impose duties on all goods entering the United States. We know very well that the Reform party in Canada have always desired reciprocity, it has always been a plank in their platform, and they have always been ready to have it carried out. It has been stated by some hon. members that this question was never talked of at the elections. I have stated to my constituents repeatedly that as a representative of the people there was nothing I could do better than to further in any possible way the obtaining of freer trade relations with the United States and the keeping down taxation, and I say so still. The proposition covered by the resolution is worthy of a fair trial. At the conclusion of the civil war the Americans had not very kindly feelings towards Canada, for Canadian and British sympathy was in favor of the South. Every thing was taxed by the Americans at that time; if a man had a watch, a carriage or a box of matches each article was taxed. That prevailed during the Republican administration. It was a good thing that the Republican administration did not always last, and the Democrats came into power, for it is well known that they have always had a better feeling towards this country. The President in his Message spoke of having freer trade with the country to the north. In this connection I will read the words of Secretary Bayard, a statement that cannot be too often quoted. He is a statesman who understands the situation very well, and he says:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country."

The United States, no doubt, are satisfied with the size of their country. There is Cuba, a very rich and fertile island, in which rebellions have very frequently occurred, and which could have been acquired by the Americans, but it was not done; and I have not read that any man in the United States wished Canada to be annexed. The feeling in the United States is growing that their taxation should be reduced. The Secretary of State spoke of one manufacturer who proposed to return to Canada. All this indicates that the public feeling is that manufacturers in the United States have bled the country sufficiently, and that it is time for the people to obtain relief. There is also a Bill before Congress providing for the reduction of taxation by $55,000,000. I observe by to-day's paper that a Senator of Minnesota has submitted to Congress a Bill to place a number of articles on the free list. I see also an article copied from the New York Post, which states that on an average the duty is 42 per cent. and that before 1890 it will average not more than 25 per cent. If there is this reduction in the tariff in two years, commercial union will not be such a bugbear. It is, however, only necessary at this time to discuss the general principles of freer trade relations, and the details can afterwards be settled by the representatives of the two countries. The Farmers' Institute of Ontario passed a resolution, by 61 to 13 votes, in the following terms:

"At the meeting of the Central Farmers' Institute, Toronto, 46 institutes were represented and by a vote of 61 to 13, the following resolution was carried:

"That this meeting desires to place on record its high appreciation of the value to this country of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and we fully endorse the actions of the institutes which have discussed the subject and passed resolutions favorable thereto, and it is of opinion that so soon as it is introduced into the Dominion Parliament and becomes a party question its further discussion in the institutes should be discontinued."

At two meetings which I happened to attend last summer the farmers were nearly unanimous on that question. Wiman spoke at the meeting and I can assure you that the construction put upon the remarks of that gentleman by members of this House was not at all the proper one. The question of "broilers" seemed to cause a great deal of merriment and I heard him speak on that question. He mentioned it incidentally, saying that in the United States when the people wanted anything they generally paid a high price for it at a particular season of the year. One of those articles in demand was broilers. He did not state that if the people got closer relations with the States he would invite them to raise those broilers for sale. We ought to be proud of such a man as Mr. Wiman, who, leaving Canada, has obtained such an important position in the United States. I heard Mr. Butterworth make mention of the fact that Mr. Wiman was very generous in New York and that if any Canadian, or any man was in difficulties he would help him if he could do so. Mr. Wiman is always willing and able to help a Canadian, and it is well known that he has a warm interest in this country. When he used to live in Toronto any citizen who was in straightened circumstances always found Mr. Wiman willing to lend him a helping hand, and he made to the people of the city a present of the Wiman Baths. Taking Mr. Wiman's position and influence into consideration, I think the sneering remarks made in reference to that distinguished Canadian who has worked his way up so well in the United States against so many competitors, should not have been introduced into the discussion. Now, Sir, I look at the Trade and Navigation Returns and I find that in 1887 the produce of the mines amounted to $3,805,959; fisheries, $6,875,810; forests, $20,484,746; animals and their products, $24,246,937; agricultural products, $8,826,325, and manufactured goods, $3,079,972. So you see that the manufactured goods were only a very small proportion of all the other articles. I would also mention that in 1876, when they had no protection, the export of manufactured goods was $5,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than at the present time. It is wonderful that when the manufactures have been hampered so and have got so much assistance that such would be the case. We should have thought they would have exported a much larger amount, but they evidently do not wish to do that. Their only wish is that the tariff should raise their prices, that they may make more money for themselves, that they may make the country pay more. That is what those gentlemen do, they are good calculators, they make a mathematical calculation and understand their business very well. It has been told us that we are very foolish to seek a market in the United States, when our market is in Great Britain, and as the only result would be to come into competition with the United States, there would be no use to seek a market there. The statistics give us some information where the produce of the field and the stock raised on the farm is exported to. There are six articles which we raise and which go to Great Britain at the present time, and there are eight articles which go to the United States. The export of wheat to Great Britain last year was 5,048,084 bushels, value $4,278,417; to the United States we sent 341,075 bushels, value $265,940. But then we imported of wheat 3,550,844 bushels, value $3,152,478; that is if we take the wheat we sold from the wheat we bought, our net cash is $1,391,879. Now the oats is the second article. We sent oats to Great Britain 1,627,629 bushels, value $509,875; to the United States 40,342 bushels, value $12,210, making in all $521,085; so that those two articles which cost the farmer so much labor and so much trouble amount to $1,912,964, just exactly $87,405 more than we get from our export of eggs. We sent to Great Britain 3,348,180 bushels of peas, value $4,026,670; to the United States we sent 405,358 bushels, value $331,349. Then there is cheese, which brought us $7,065,983, and butter, of which we exported 4,076,365 lbs., valued at $757,261. We exported to Great Britain 63,622 head of cattle, valued at $5,344,375. Those are all the articles that go to Great Britain, and let us take the articles which go to the United States. Barley, 9,437,717 bushels, value $5,345,968; hay, 69,450 tons, value $670,749; potatoes, 1,276,809 bushels, value $328,602; horses, 18,225, value $2,214,338; sheep, 363,046; value, $974,482. Then there are lean cattle, for which there is no market in Great Britain, but which are sold in the back districts and shipped to Buffalo, which is the market for that stock. In regard to oats, sometimes the United States is the principal market. A large dealer informed me just before I left home for Ottawa that when oats were bringing only 39 cents a bushel in Toronto, he had shipped them to Buffalo and got 68 cents a bushel and paid the duty. He shipped three car loads of peas to the United States, and received 90 cents a bushel for them, and after paying the duty and the freight he realised more than he could get in this country. Mr. Cluxton, of Peterboro', formerly a Conservative member of this House, in addressing the Farmers' Institute in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, mentioned that he had sold 180,000 bushels of oats in the United States, and after paying the duty he had a good profit. So that I believe that if the duty were taken off, the United States would be a market in every season for peas, and in most seasons for oats. Now, the question as to who pays the duty has been touched upon, and that is a very important question. I thought the proposition advanced on the other side of the House the other evening that our barley was just the same as the United States barley, and that the people of the United States paid 10 cents a bushel more for it than for their own barley, was a rather strange proposition. I would rather agree with the hon. gentleman who spoke the other night, and who said the Yankees generally wanted a dollar and a-half in return for a dollar. But we should look at that matter as the hon. Minister of the Interior said we should consider the price of grain—on one occasion when he was canvassing Welland for a railway bonus? He said grain was worth the price paid in Liverpool less the cost of transportation. Goods of all kinds that are sent from here to the United States are worth the price they are in the United States less the cost of transportation and other charges, and the charge on barley entering the United States is 10 cents a bushel. Every individual who makes a trial trip to the United States knows very well who pays the duty. We have been told of a man in the Province of Quebec who had repeatedly sold his hay in the United States, and when it was worth $10 a ton there he took it across the line and paid $2 duty. He knew who paid the duty, for he knew that he got $2 less for his hay than he would have got if he had lived across the line. The same thing is true of lean cattle for which there is no market in England. They are brought from the counties of Wellington and Grey and shipped to Buffalo, and are charged with a duty of 20 per cent. The same duty is charged on lambs, and even on turnips there is a duty of 30 per cent, of which a large quantity is shipped to the United States, and on which the farmers make about 3 cents a bushel. In all these cases our farmers would receive the enhanced price but for the duty. Then, dealers in cattle are subjected to difficulties and great loss on account of the duty; they are sometimes charged with undervaluation. So that with unrestricted reciprocity our farmers would not only gain the amount of the duty, but they would also be saved from many annoyances that the shipper has continually to meet. Now, I will make what I consider a reasonable estimate of what would be the advantage to a farmer on an average farm of 100 acres. I shall take six articles. I take first barley; we will say he has 400 bushels, the produce of ten acres; the duty on that would be $40. Then he has one horse, worth $100, on which the duty is $20; cattle of the value of $100, and the duty $20; 100 lbs. of wool, at 10 cents per lb., the duty $10; 18 sheep and lambs, of the value of $60, the duty $12; five tons of hay, the duty $10; $112 in all. With regard to hay, there is an extensive buyer at Fergus who tells me that he is buying hay, and he cannot place it at present, but that if the duty was removed he could place it. What seems to terrify some hon. gentlemen against unrestricted reciprocity is the fear of direct taxation. I have always been afraid of debt; but when once debt is incurred I do not suppose it is of great consequence in what way it is raised. Now, this year there has been imported of dutiable goods $105,000,000, which yielded a duty of $22,438,308. In 1883, when the country was more prosperous, we imported $123,000,000 worth, which proportionately would produce within $3,000,000 of the amount of taxation we would require to raise, supposing we received no duties from the United States at all. So that with a little more prosperity and a little more economy, we could make both ends meet, and there is no ground for my hon. friend holding up that as a bugbear to the people. If the farmer could make $100 more per hundred acres, it would be of very little consequence if he had a little more direct taxation to pay. As he would be getting in more, he could afford to pay out a little more. I notice from the Abstract and Record that the goods manufactured in Great Britain and exported to different countries amount to $266,533,819. Of that Canada takes $35,766,173, or in every $1,000 worth $15.75. It would not take a very large amount of manufactures in Great Britain to make up that quantity which goes to Canada, and if we could show Great Britain that it is to our best interest not to take quite as much from her as formerly, she would be glad to consent to the change. It is just like the case where a young man has started out in life for himself, and after some years have elapsed tells his father that owing to the distance between them, they cannot trade very well together, and it would be better for him to trade elsewhere, the father would say to his son: Do the best you can, I only rejoice in your prosperity, and hope the step you take will give you satisfaction. That would be a common sense view to be taken by Great Britain, even if her manufacturers lost by this arrangement, and I do not think they will. Look for instance to the United States, which has a higher tariff than ours. Last year Great Britain sent to the United States $49,000,000 worth of iron and steel and other manufactured articles, being an increase of $12,000,000 over the previous year, so that if we become more prosperous, we in Canada will be able also to buy more English goods. Should our farmers make $50 a year each extra through this policy, they will not roll it up in a napkin and put it aside, but will spend it in various ways throughout the country and a certain amount will be expended in the purchase of manufactured imports. Make the whole country more prosperous, and our trade with the mother country is bound to increase. I can remember very well the time when the treaty of 1854 was in force. It was about the time that I began to sell grain, and I can endorse the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Victoria as to the great prosperity that then existed. That hon. gentleman has given an account of what happened in Victoria, and I could tell the same story with regard to the county of Simcoe, where land, which was worth $2,000 per 100 acres, in a short time was worth $6,000, property having increased in value threefold. People were anxious to buy farms; laboring men were getting higher wages; there was a demand for everything; and I remember when our farmers had to team their grain forty to sixty miles to Toronto to meet the American schooners which wanted to get the white wheat that we raised of the best quality, and were prepared to give the highest prices. Any one who has seen the good times that then existed would like to see them recur again; and we believe that by judicious management, and by freer trade with the United States, a vast gain will be secured to the country. It was said in 1878 that one of the evils of this country was that the balance of trade was against us. Since Confederation I see, by the Abstract and Record, that the balance of trade has been $28,000,000 against us per year, but the idea was propounded in 1878 that a new era would dawn, when we would manufacture all the goods we required and take nothing from Great Britain in return. Well, that has not been accomplished, and only last session the hon. the Minister of Finance had to take a new departure. He told us how much iron and steel was used in the country, and he propounded a scheme of putting on taxes on these articles, by which means he said 100,000 people would be employed in these works in a short time, and we would not have to go to Great Britain for our iron and steel. That project has not so far been carried out to any great extent, and the only effect I see of his scheme is an increased burden on the farmers, who have to pay 50 cents extra a hundredweight on the nails they use in making improvements on their farms; and other manufacturing articles have been increased in price, into the construction of which iron and steel enter. That has been the result of the tinkering in the tariff on iron and steel last session. It has been repeatedly stated that the National Policy would give to the farmers a great market for their produce, but so far we have had nothing to substantiate that statement. I find from the census of the assessors, that in 1886, the number on the roll in the Province of Ontario was $1,819,046, and in 1878, it was $1,646,035, or an increase of $172,979 in the manufactures of this country. The employment of the small number required to make this amount of manufactured goods would surely not affect the markets for our staple farm products. I do not doubt that in large manufacturing places, at certain seasons of the year, when butter and eggs are scarce, they will increase in price to a certain extent, but as regards the staples of wheat, oats and potatoes, they will not be affected at all. I think also that the prices we have had for the last five years do not show that they have increased the value of the market very much. I find that the average price of wheat for the five years from 1882 to 1886, was 88.5 cents. In 1882, it was $1.01; in 1883, $1.05; in 1884, 80 cents; in 1885, 81 cents; and in 1886, 73 cents. The average price of oats for the five years is 35 cents. In 1882, it was 43 cents; in 1883, 38 cents; in 1884, 33 cents; in 1885, 31 cents; and in 1886, 32 cents. Two years ago, potatoes sold for 15 cents a bushel, so it is clear that they had not been very hard on the potato crop. It has been held out as another bugbear that, if we had free trade with the United States, we would be disowned by Great Britain, and they would not take any of our produce. They have an established rule there, and whoever sends in grain or whatever they have to sell have a chance of disposing of their produce, and that will continue to be so. They shut out nobody, and they would not shut out Canada. This is only thrown out in order to frighten people, but I do not think that many will be scared by it. It has also been said that the geographical position of this country in regard to the United States is of no consequence, because we have railways. I think it makes all the difference imaginable if a person is 50 miles from a market or 500 miles. I am credibly informed that in Prince Edward Island potatoes are only worth 20 cents a bushel, while in Toronto they are worth from 60 to 65 cents a bushel. Oats are only worth 25 cents a bushel in Prince Edward Island, while in Toronto they are worth 45 cents. Thus it is the geographical position that makes the difference, and it is on account of the geographical position of this country in relation to the United States that it would be better for us to have our trade relations extended. If we were as close to the mother country as we are to the United States we would be one. But we are not. We would desire nothing better. But we are 3,000 miles away, and when our best customers live so near us, that is a very important consideration. A dealer stated that he could ship grain from Drayton to Buffalo as cheaply as he could to Toronto. The farmers do not dread competition. The county I represent raises some of the best cattle that are raised in the Dominion of Canada, and the farmers of that country would hail with delight the news that they would be able to compete in the markets of New York, Detroit and Albany. When our fairs are held, there are buyers from Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, and all over the Dominion, and, with extended trade regulations, we would have them from different points in the United States. As to the price of oats, it has been said that oats coming from the United States lower the price in this country. That has never been the case. I remember that, at the time when oats were shut out, we were selling them for 25 cents a bushel; and that when they were coming in from the United States we were selling for 55 cents a bushel, and these were manufactured into oatmeal and sent to Detroit and our farmers never made such profits as they did when they had a chance to send to the market in the United States. I say that, with the large and well equipped mills which we have in Canada grinding oatmeal, many of which are now idle for the want of markets, if we had free trade with the United States, those mills could take and hold the trade in the large cities of the United States. When this Confederation was formed, it was supposed that it was to confer a great benefit on the people, a great and lasting benefit, and no doubt it will if it is properly carried out; but, if on the other hand things are carried on as they are now and there is a combination of members affected to make Provinces that have built their own railways grant subsidies and build railways in every part of the Dominion, it will soon make the Province of Ontario say that it was a mistake to enter into Confederation. In 1886, the amount of subsidies granted for railways was $2,396,065, of which Ontario got $390,000. In 1887, the amount of subsidies was $2,075,600, and Ontario got only $570,000. The Province that pays half of the taxation and has built her own railways is now called upon to pay subsidies to railways in all the other Provinces. If this is to be continued, and if our debt is to be increased, I think the people of Ontario, as well as those of the other Provinces will show their dissatisfaction. It is well known to people who understand the Province of Ontario that we have a network of railways over that Province, that townships and villages and cities have bonused railways to a very large extent in order to get better communication. The Ontario Government has also bonused railways. The county I represent gave a bonus to the Credit Valley Railway of $135,000, which was paid by two townships, and the village of Fergus and the village of Elora issued $10,000 in debentures and took bonds from the Credit Valley Railway for the same amount. They sold their bonds for fifty cents on the dollar, and lost $5,000 on the transaction. Then there is the town of Orangeville, that granted a large bonus to a narrow gauge railway, and afterwards was one of a group that granted $135,000. Then it granted $15,000 the same as Fergus, and they lost $7,500 in the transaction. They wanted to have competition, but today, instead of having two railways in competition, there is only one; competition is swept away and they cannot get their grain moved. The conditions under which they granted this bonus have been swept away, on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway absorbing these two lines. Now, Sir, considering these things, there is good reason why a stop should be put to subsidies to railways. I think it was the member for Queen's himself who said he wanted subsidies to railways to be continued. Well, if he gets subsidies and does not have to pay for them, and other people do, I suppose he would like to get them, but I think places that have built their own roads, do not want to build roads in every other part of the Dominion. This question seems to have had an important bearing on the elections in some of the Provinces. Last session the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) made use of the following words:

"I am prepared to take issue with the hon. gentleman on that question. I will just point out to my hon. friend the result of the last election. My hon. friend well knows that the question of the railway route in the Island of Cape Breton, was the question upon which, to a very large extent, the elections were fought in that Island, particularly in my own county. As regards the general fiscal policy, it was a one-sided question with the people of the Island, which party should hold the reins of power in this Dominion. The elections of previous years showed that fact from year to year, so that the question of a railway route, I might say, was the sole and absolute question which was before the people on the occasion of the last election."

So you see the subsidies had a very important bearing on the election. I will read another short extract bearing on the same subject, from the remarks of the Minister of Finance made last session in answer to a question of Mr. Eisenhauer:

"I am much inclined to think that the hon. gentleman's object is to get this grant struck out of the resolution. I believe that is the object which the hon. gentleman has in view. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Kaulbach, the late representative of the county of Lunenburg, pressed the construction of this road upon the Minister of Railways in the most urgent and earnest manner. He went to every member of the Government, and year after year he urged upon them the great importance of the construction of this road. It was rather a large undertaking; it involved a considerable expenditure of public money, but he represented that his constituents in the county of Lunenburg were extremely anxious that the road should be constructed. Finally the urgent entreaties and strong representations made in this House and out of it as to the importance of having this road constructed, induced my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and the leader of the Government to express the intention of asking this Parliament for the means of constructing it. The Government supposed that the people of Lunenburg attached great importance to that road; but they found that when Mr. Kaulbach went back to the county, the gentleman who had succeeded in obtaining this promise of support from the Government for the construction of the road, was defeated, and that the county of Lunenburg had sent a gentleman here to oppose the Government that had expressed its desire to construct the road. The Government would therefore be perfectly justified in accepting the action of the people of Lunenburg as a reason for not proceeding with this work, and in holding to the conviction that they did not wish it done. As the Government are prepared to give a certain amount of aid, I think, looking to the future construction of the road, that ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. But I believe, from the tone of the speech made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that he is very anxious that the Government should strike out this grant, as I think the Government would be justified in doing after the manner in which it has been received. As to the hon. gentleman's references to the future of Nova Scotia, which I think it was somewhat indelicate for him to make, if he is as well prepared to meet his constituents in the county of Halifax, which he will probably be called upon shortly to do, as I or anyone standing in my place would be to meet the people of Cumberland, he would be a very fortunate man."

So you see that was a very important question. These words were uttered by the Minister of Finance, stating that the grant was given in the expectation that the county of Lunenburg would return a supporter of the Government. But they did not, they rejected the bribe which was held out to them, for the purpose of stifling their consciences and destroying their convictions. These railway subsidies have a tendency to corrupt the people, and when the Minister of Finance uttered these words in the most guarded manner before so many members of Parliament, we can well suspect what he would do in a constituency where no one was taking note of his remarks. But, Sir, the people, in the case of Yarmouth, did their duty. They seemed to think that the time might come when the designs of Providence would be fulfilled, and that better things were in store for them. It is a fact that the present Ministry has been long in power. But if we take a review of English history, we shall find that the most corrupt Ministry that England ever had, the Walpole Administration, was the longest lived, but even that Administration came to an end; and we believe that by the discussion of the question, the same result will follow in this country. Now, another matter that has just come to my mind is the question of the sugar duties. A great deal has been said in relation to that matter. I examined the Trade and Navigation Returns and found that the duty on sugar was 68 per cent. Now, it has been stated that a poor man may live in this country and not pay a dollar of duty. He would be a very poor man indeed, and would be fit to go to the House of Industry. Certainly he would not be a working poor man, because a working poor man, in six months, buys a dollar's worth of sugar, and he would have to pay 68 cents duty, or $1.34 duty a year on his imported sugar. If he got it from the Drummond refinery he might get it for $1.25 in duty. They make a little difference just to sell, and to keep up the price as high as possible. I am further informed on good authority that in Buffalo four pounds more of the same quality of sugar can be got than can be got in this country. We must do away with that extravagant profit and seek to cut down the duty, for the less duty there is the better chance there will be to bring American sugar into this country.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made such a remarkable speech that I will not attempt to follow him in all his wanderings. I have made a few memoranda for my own use in order that I may reply to some of the points that I think are worthy of attention, and I will take up the question where he left it—his last reference was to the excessive price of sugar in Canada owing to the excessive rate of duty. He told us that the rate of duty on sugar imposed by the policy of this Government was 68 per cent. I am not disposed to quarrel with the hon. gentleman's figures, but I wish to point out to the House that in 1878 the Administration which the hon. gentleman would support if the same party were in power to-day that was in power then, imposed a duty $2.39 per hundredweight on sugar, and to-day this Government impose only $1.58 per hundredweight. I give that to the hon. gentleman as one portion of my reply on the question of sugar. Let me give him a further and a better one. The tendency of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and of the remarks of all hon. gentlemen opposite throughout the whole of the debate, has been to show that if we would only accept commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity everything would be bright and happy for Canada. Let me deal with this question of sugar in the United States, and while I will not touch the cost of production I will touch on the duty on the product. I have taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States this information for the hon. gentleman, and probably he will make a note of it for use in future so that in taking up this question of sugar duties, he will not impose on an intelligent community who can read and think for themselves, or on an unsuspecting farmer who he may meet in the town hall in his county or in some village, and make them believe that we in Canada impose a higher rate of duty on sugar than is imposed by the United States. Here are the records, and sugar is the very first item at the head of the list. Sugar, molasses and confections, $74,242,000 worth was imported into the United States, on which a duty was collected of $58,000,000, or at a rate of 78·15. The hon. gentleman complains that we charge 68 per cent., but he is ready to fall into the arms of a people charging 78 per cent. duty on sugar. That shows the anxiety of the hon. gentleman to obtain commercial relations with a people who know how to protect all the interests of their own country, and in protecting them they have at times imposed unreasonable rates of duty as they would appear to us; still the hon. gentleman would have it appear that sugar was charged less duty in the United States than in Canada. Let us have a little more of competition and a little less of combination and we will have the same result here as in the United States. I showed the House, however, one clear indisputable fact that the United States charge 78 per cent. as against Canada 68 per cent. Let me take up another item that the hon. gentleman thought worthy of bringing to the notice of the House, and I think his observations on that point are worthy of some little reply. He dealt with the question of oats. He said they are cheaper in Canada than they would have been if we had not had the National Policy. He says oatmeal mills are silent, and he named a number of them, and this, he says, is in consequence of the National Policy. I challenge hon. gentlemen to deny what I am going to state, that there has been a combination among millers to buy up the smaller mills and close them up, the combination paying them a percentage on the silent machinery,—and they have done that to control the price of oatmeal in Canada. I tell the hon. gentleman that in my own county, the county of Perth, there is in the town of Mitchell the president of the Oatmeal Millers' Association; that when the National Policy was brought into force that gentleman said it was impossible to live in Canada, and accordingly he sold out and went to the United States and remained for some years, entering the same business. What was the result? He came back to Canada and to-day is president of the Millers' Association which controls the mills of the country, and he is doing it and making money out of it too. The hon. gentlemen opposite are very ready to take advantage of all those circumstances and trade combinations and then blame the National Policy with having closed up a number of mills. I challenge the hon. gentleman or any hon. gentlemen opposite to take up the New York Herald, Boston Herald, Buffalo Courier and any United States newspaper, east, west, north or south, and show me that the markets of the United States furnish as good a price for oats as the markets of the Dominion. I have the tables here, and if necessary I can give the quotations. I have the New York Herald, the Boston Herald, Buffalo Courier, Toronto Globe, and Montreal Herald, and I do not think one of those papers can be charged with favoring the Government, I do not presume any hon. gentlemen would say that the market prices were prepared in the interests of this Government or National Policy, but we assume they are correct.

According to the New York Herald the prices of oats, on 3rd April, were as follows:—

|---------------|-----------------------------|
| New York..... | 37 cts to 40 cts per bushel |
| Montreal..... | 42 cts to 43 cts " |
| Buffalo..... | 35 cts to 39½ cts " |
| Toronto..... | 48 cts to 49 cts " |

An hon. friend beside me says that they are to-day 50½ cents in Toronto.

Mr. WELSH. They were 44 cents in Toronto on 4th April.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman has attempted to show, and he would make the farmers of Canada believe that farmers in the United States obtain a better price for oats than our farmers do here. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to produce quotations in this country and in the United States and lay them side by side, and I venture to say that the prices for all products of the farm are as high in our markets as those of the United States. I will show the House why I make this statement. The Americans have immense quantities of natural products to export from their own country. Is it reasonable to presume or to suppose that we in Canada can find a better market in a country that produces an enormous surplus for which they have to find a foreign market, than we can have in a country to which the American people themselves export their surplus. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite can expect the people of Canada to believe that statement. Let me take the article of wheat. According to the New York Herald the highest price for the best quality in New York was 85½ cents. Sales were made at 89, and sellers were asking 83½. Now, Sir, the price in Montreal was 89 and 90 cents that same day, according to the Montreal Herald, and if the hon. the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) were here, I presume he would think that a pretty good authority. That very same day, in Toronto, the quotation was 91 cents for Manitoba wheat, and in Buffalo, which is a corresponding market to Toronto, it was quoted in the Buffalo Courier at 84½ to 87½. What will hon. gentlemen think of this? In Toronto the same day it was 85 to 89 cents, or wheat was sold one and three-eighths cents higher in Toronto than in the city of Buffalo. How can hon. gentlemen say in the face of this that New York or Buffalo are the best markets for our wheat? I have given you exactly the figures for those places and the names of the papers and you can see them yourselves. In Chicago we find that 72½ to 72½ was the highest price for wheat, while in Toronto, on the very same day, it was 85 to 89. In Detroit the price was 83½ cents, 85 cents being the highest, as against 89 cents in the city of Toronto. In St. Louis wheat was from 80 cents to 81 cents, while it was 89 cents in Toronto. In Milwaukee the price was 74½ to 75½. I have been very exact with those figures, and I have quoted them very carefully, because I knew I would be watched, and it would not be fair to myself or to the country to make any incorrect statement. In the face of those facts what is the use of saying that the American market is the best market for our produce. We cannot hope to find a good price in their markets when they themselves are seeking a foreign market for their surplus products. They produce the same things as we do, and yet they are looking around for the best market in which they are likely to get high prices to export their surplus to. They find themselves compelled to go to Great Britain and to find a market there, as we find a market there to-day. From the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States I find that the Americans had to find a market to export $523,000,000 worth of the products of the farm. Let hon. gentlemen remember that. It is a matter of very vital importance to people of this country to comprehend the whole case and to see whether or not the American market is our best market, and whether it would be desirable that we should take any hasty step in this matter which we might afterwards have to repent when we had abandoned the trade with that great country which gave many of us birth, and to which we look for protection, and sympathy, and help when the time comes that we need it. I tell you it would be a most unwise thing to throw away our connection with that great and grand old land to run after some possible chance of getting a better market for perhaps our barley or possibly a small quantity of peas. I may point out what hon. gentleman perhaps may forget that last year the United States had to export, of wheat $90,000,000 worth; flour, $52,000,000 worth; corn, $19,000,000 worth; oats, $15,000,000 and pork, $62,000,000 worth. All those articles are produced by our farmers and all those American products have had to find a market abroad. Will hon. gentlemen contend that we should be simply producers of those in the raw state and hand them over to the American middleman to make the profits on shipping them abroad, or that we should take that traffic from our own steamship lines and our own grand lines of railway, which have been built up at such great expense to this country with the hope of making it one solid confederation and a grand nation in the future. Are we to hand over the carrying trade of our country to the United States and enable them to be the parties who handle this product and make profits out of it? I say no. I say it is our duty to seek the best market, and that a market in a country that does not produce the article and must purchase the article is at least the best market for us, so long as we have a surplus to export. That leads me to the thought that what we hope for from the National Policy and what we said it would accomplish it has accomplished to the extent of building up within our country a better home market, which we have always maintained is the best market. The effect of the National Policy has been to enable us to consume a large proportion of the products of the country at home, which would have to be exported abroad were it not for the National Policy. The Americans consume about 90 per cent. of the products of their own farms. I presume that the business men, the farmers, the mechanics and the workmen of Canada consume as much and live as well as the people do in the United States. I may assume that we consume at least 90 per cent. of our products. Well, Sir, if we have a home market to the extent of 90 per cent. of the products of the farm this has been caused by the effect of the National Policy on the industries of the country. I say, Sir, we have accomplished all that was professed to be accomplished by the National Policy in giving employment to the people of our own country. We have afforded better markets to the producers of those products which otherwise would have to be exported at least in many cases to the United States or to greater distances abroad. I shall follow the hon. gentleman a little further in some remarks he has made. He mentioned the name of the father of the new platform of hon. gentlemen opposite, although it is pretty hard to say who the father is just now. It was Mr. Wiman a short time ago; to-day I believe the hon. member for South Oxford. But the reference of the hon. member for Centre Wellington to Mr. Wiman and his address before the Farmers' Union of Ontario brought to my mind this fact, that that gentleman had a different story for the people of Canada when he was discussing this matter before them from what he had for his own people—because, although he says he is a Canadian, I have a very serious suspicion that he has changed his views in reference to which country, after all, he has the greatest interest in. I cannot conceive that the gentleman, with all his wealth, would consent to live in the United States for the benefit of Canada. If he is really a sincere Canadian, let him reside in Canada; he has wealth enough to choose his home, and if he really takes an interest in this country, he should live in it, and not on an island of New Jersey. In his address before the Commercial Club of Cincinnati, on the 26th of March, on the question of commercial union, he said:—

"I came to undo the mistake made 100 years ago when the Declaration of Independence should have covered the whole North American continent. The Boston Tea Party had a good effect upon England."

Later on, speaking of the French Canadians, he said:

"The Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons is the twenty-fourth child. Show me the twenty-fourth child of an American?"

What his object was in referring to that I do not know. Again:

"I bring you the trade of half a continent."

What does he mean by this? Is it that the Americans will take possession of the trade of this country? Is that his purpose? If it is, I say it is about time we should reflect whether we have any interest in that trade ourselves,—whether if the United States cannot exhibit a better market for us than they are able to exhibit to-day, we can afford to trade with them in those articles of which we have a surplus to export. Later on he says:

"Just so sure as the Americans invite the Canadians to a free interchange under Commercial Union, just so sure will Canada accept. If England refuses to allow the measure, then we will say to the British Crown: We have no further use for you in North America."

That is a very loyal sentiment. He knows, and the people of the United States know pretty well, what that means. I will give the hon. gentleman one more quotation; I will read what the Boston Advertiser says. It quotes the resolution submitted to the House by the hon. member for South Oxford, and says:

"As Sir Richard Cartwright pointed out, the right to enter our markets free is the only commercial privilege which can make Canada prosperous, and without it she can never be so."

"Senator Frye, who has given this subject more careful study than any other member of our Congress, has expressed it as his opinion that it is simply a question of time when at least the Maritime Provinces of Canada will be forced to ally themselves to the United States on whatever basis they can obtain, with this provision of a free market thrown in. He believes Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, at least, will be forced by the necessities of the case to demand of Great Britain a peaceful separation from Canada on condition that they may be annexed to this country."

Is it at all unreasonable for this paper to take that view, or for gentlemen on this side of the House to have very serious misgivings as to the ultimate object of their resolution? It goes on to state further:

"It may be that this result may not happen directly, but the whole tendency of public discussion in those Provinces looks in that direction, and while it would be a severe blow at English Imperial pride to give up these Provinces to this country, and to sacrifice the splendid harbor of Halifax, which for more than a century has been the headquarters of the British naval force in this hemisphere, yet we believe that the necessities of the case are so great that a large party in Canada prefers free trade with us to any consideration of national pride."

What party does this paper refer to? Does it refer to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite or to the party on this side of the House? I hope hon. gentlemen will just take that into their consideration, and remember that it is very serious language so far as our good faith towards the mother land is concerned. I am proud and pleased to say, with all sincerity, that I believe there are many men on the other side as loyal as gentlemen on this side; but there are a large number, I am sorry to say, who hold other views, and who are not slow to state them in either public or private. I am afraid it is to that party that this paper refers when it says that they would not hesitate to give up their connection with the mother land for the sake of some paltry advantage. We have some further information on this subject. We have Mr. Wiman stating in St. Paul:

"Canada is the natural market for the manufacturers of the United States"

Is it? Is that the object of hon. gentlemen opposite—that the United States should manufacture for us? I say no, we can manufacture for ourselves.

"Commercial Union means to create a market for the excess of United States production which protection has stimulated."

"The extent and character of the tariff would necessarily have to be left to the Congress of the United States, they being the larger representative body, while the total amount realised from its enforcement and also from the enforcement of similar internal revenue taxes should be put into one pool and the sum realised divided by per capita proportion according to population."

"Commercial Union means that which would have been accomplished, so far as trade and commerce is concerned, by the extension of the Declaration of Independence over the whole continent instead of over less than one-half of it."

"Canada under Commercial Union could no longer resist the attractive forces which would prevail towards a political absorption."

"If England should not consent to it, it would be the most momentous pause in the history of Canada, and then, as I said to Chamberlain, 'look out for another Boston tea-party.'"

"I come to you to offer you half a continent. The largest part of the British Empire shall be given to the United States without tax, if you so desire it."

"If England refuses to allow the measure, then we will say to the British Crown we have no further use for you in North America."

Now, after reading quotations like this, I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to say whether or not we have good reason to doubt their sincerity, when they make a pretence of wishing to retain our connection with the old land. From all the evidence which we can gather from the gentlemen who are promoting this scheme on the American side, backed, I am sorry to say, by some prominent gentlemen on this side, their sole intent and purpose is to sever our connection with Great Britain. I, for one, shall protest as long as I live against such a movement. We have been too well treated by the mother land, which has helped in many trying circumstances and invariably treated us with kindness, to go back on her in this way. For my part I shall never be a consenting party to anything that will grant to the United States greater privileges in our markets than we grant to the mother land. I shall never be a party to opening a trade with the United States for the exchange of all sorts of products on terms more favorable than those we grant to Great Britain. To do so would be most disloyal, and I must say that the men who propose such a course deserve indeed to be charged with disloyalty to the British connection. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), dilated at length on the taxation imposed on the people by the National Policy, and he wants us to escape that taxation by adopting the United States tariff. Under our National Policy, the taxation is something like an average of 23 or 24 per cent. on our imports, but I hold in my hand a statement taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States, of the total imports into that country, and the total revenue collected therefrom, which shows that the total imports were $450,000,000, on which the duty collected was $212,000,000, or a taxation of 47·10 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to rush into the arms of a people who are taxing their imports to the extent of 47 per cent., and yet they complain of the small taxation which we imposed upon our imports. They say that the poor man here is heavily taxed, but let them look in the returns of the United States and see what relief the poor man has there. On woollen goods, which are imported to the extent of $60,000,000, the taxation imposed is $35,000,000, or 58·81 per cent. Are hon. gentlemen opposite prepared to accept a tariff, in the framing of which we cannot have the slightest influence, and which imposes on the woollens of the poor man a taxation of 53 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite complain of our duty on iron and steel, but the Americans imposed a duty on these articles of 40·92 per cent. On cotton they imposed 40 per cent., on silks 49 per cent., and on jewellery and precious stones—I wish hon. gentleman opposite to make a note of that, because it is a matter of considerable interest to the poor man—10·58 per cent.

That is the relief the poor man has in the United States. He only pays 10 per cent. on his jewellery and precious stones, if he has to pay 58 per cent. on his woollens. On glassware they impose 59 per cent., and on earthenware 56 per cent., but what does the poor man care about that when he can get his jewellery and precious stones at 10 per cent. Another duty, which I am sure will gladden the heart of the poor man and make his wife and children smile with contentment, is the duty on rice of 64 per cent. Compare that with Canada. I do not understand that we collect anything here on rice. But then in the States the poor man can get in his jewellery and precious stones at 10 per cent. The hon. member for Centre Wellington was kind enough to say that our towns and villages were growing, but he said they were growing at the expense of the farmers. The hon. gentleman must have his wail one way or the other. I may say that the farmers are glad that the towns are growing, for they are always pleased to have a home market, which is their best market, at their own door. That hon. gentleman lives in one of the gardens of Ontario. Wellington, Perth, Bruce, Huron, and the Waterloos, and the Middlesexes, and the Brants, are amongst the best in all Ontario, and yet the wail has come from that riding, and from Huron and from Waterloo, and I am going to talk to the member for North Waterloo later on. The wail has come from the gardens of Ontario, but they are doing it for a purpose. They are doing it to make a point against the Government; they are doing it with the object of blinding the eyes of the farmers, but I shall take good care that they do not succeed in doing it. I ask that hon. gentleman where are the vacant farms in Wellington? There are not any in South Wellington, or in North Wellington, or in Centre Wellington. In many cases—and no doubt that has caused a great deal of the exodus from the country—farmers have found that growing grain is not as profitable as it was in other days. They find that they have more competition, and they would have been driven out of the country altogether if it had not been that the Government have given them better communication with the mother country, and better markets by giving them greater railway and steamship facilities, and so greater access to the European countries. We have had a better price on the Liverpool market than we ever had before, but, notwithstanding that, the price of grain is just as low in the great American nation, because of the great surplus which exists. That is not only the case on this continent, but if you go to India, or to Russia, or to China, you will find that the market has been flooded. Year after year it is going on in the same way. The opening up of the Western States, the opening up of our own great North-West, where there are twelve million bushels of grain waiting for a market, have contributed to this. Are they going to sell that grain from the North-West in Chicago or in Milwaukee or in Minneapolis, when the Americans are exporting much larger amounts out of their country. The farmers of Canada are realising that they cannot grow grain and make money by exporting it, and consequently they have been increasing the size of their farms, have been raising stock, and going into dairying, and possibly in that way they have found a better market. Our farmers are doing very well, and I do not hear any murmuring among them. It is only when I come here that I hear of their bad times, and that is alleged in order to make a point against the Government and against the National Policy, which is the object of their everlasting hatred, a hatred that will keep them on that side of the House as long as they entertain it. I again challenge the hon. gentleman to produce a statement of the vacant farms. There are many farmers who have 50 acres and have taken 100, and many who had 100 who have increased them to 200, and many of their sons have gone to the North-West or to the American side in consequence, and that also is part of the exodus. While dealing with that question, I may just as well reach my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan). In his speech the other night he threw out this challenge. I quote from Hansard. Referring to the statements made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior in reply to the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) says:

"The hon. gentleman has taken his report from the Bureau of Industries, and I challenge him to go over whole report, and show that my statement is not correct. I have no fear that any hon. gentleman will be able to show anything of the kind."

Well, I am just going to see if I can show that. I have here the very book from which the hon. gentleman quoted. I will give you exactly what he said in reference to it. He said:

"There has been a good deal said with respect to the decreased value of land in the Province of Ontario. I will say, as a farmer, that this is, perhaps, a subject with which I am better acquainted than many others, as I have had an opportunity of testing the value of lands in the County of Huron and in the County of Perth which very few farmers have had. I had the honor to be appointed twelve months ago to value the whole County of Perth for equalisation purposes. I went over it along with another gentleman and put a value on every lot of land there, and I can assure you, Sir, that the reduction in the value of land in that country amounts to 10 and 15, and in some cases more, per cent. I am certain that the same reduction has taken place in the County of Huron, to which I have the honor to belong."

Now, we will see what Mr. Blue says about that, and we will also see what the hon. gentleman said about it on another occasion, when he was under oath, when he was making the statement not for political purposes, when he was selected for the purpose he refers to there, to value every farm in the county of Perth, and he dares to come and use language like that against one of the finest counties—I have no hesitation in saying—in the Dominion of Canada. I accept this challenge, and I produce the proof. I have the evidence of his own report, and I will quote Mr. Blue's report as to the value of lands in that county. In 1882, which is the date he used further on in his speech, and I will take his own sworn statement, sworn to last May, for I took the trouble to send to the county clerk for it, he and his colleague, one Wm. Long, made their sworn statement. In the year 1882, land in the county of Perth under the equalised report made by the county council itself in its June session, was put down at $19,408,293 for real property, or an average value of $35.67 per acre. Now, I have Mr. Blue's report, which bears that out within a fraction. The council passed that equalised assessment, and every township came into it. I will give you what the hon. gentleman says in reference to the value in 1886, the year for which he makes the report, and he leaves out all the buildings and all that sort of thing, I believe. The equalised report of the hon. gentleman is as follows: $21,930,996. I told you that it was $19,408,000 in 1882. The assessed value for 1882, as made by the corporation, was $18,445,000, or $15.67 per acre. The gentleman who made the statement that land had declined in value from 10 to 15 per cent. in the county of Perth, and he includes Huron, swears that when he made this report the value was $21,930,996, or $42.40 per acre, an increase of $6.73 per acre over the assessed value. Now, let me give the hon. gentleman further information. Lest he might doubt my words, I will send him the report and he can see for himself. The council met in June, 1877. The hon. gentleman's report was before them, they were dealing with it. The council in equalising the various municipalities—I omit the towns and cities, because they have nothing to do with the farms—put the value of real property under the very same heading that my hon. friend does; and where he gives $21,930,000, they put it $22,968,000, or in other words they go about a million and a-half better. Probably the hon. gentleman knows more about it than all the wardens and reeves of the county of Perth; probably he knows more about it than he did when he made that sworn statement; he knows more than Mr. Blue did in 1882. I shall make the hon. gentleman a present of the figures, and I ask him to apologise to the House and to my county for having made such a statement. Now, Mr. Speaker, you would scarcely believe after the pious way in which the hon. gentleman made his statement, that he would attempt to do anything that would cast a slur upon a neighboring county, that I think has done him no harm, and who elected him for his good judgment—I have no doubt he has good judgment—it is difficult to believe that for mere party purposes he would not only damage my county but damage his own. But he can do what he likes with his own, although as a neighbor I protest against it. I think I may go further and say that the value of real estate has increased in the county of Perth from 1882 to 1886, as I have stated, but when you come to take the total valuation of farms including personal estate, such as cattle, and implements, and including the houses on the farms, which is a fair test, when Mr. Blue in 1882 gave the value of $34,296,739, in 1886, he gives the value as $35,059,249, or an increase of $762,510. So we find that even by the worst report we could get of the county, because Mr. Blue, whose report the hon. gentleman uses, was certainly no friend of the Conservative party, we ask no favors from him, but take his own report, still the county of Perth stands $762,000 better than in the report of the hon. gentleman. Now, then, I will deal with the hon. gentleman's own county briefly. In 1882, according to Mr. Blue's report, the value of farm property was $47,289,529. In 1886, notwithstanding all the cry of wail and despair, that the hon. gentleman has made, the alleged depopulation of the country, the farms getting poorer, and the mortgages increasing, and the mortgages have increased for the reason that the farmers have increased their holdings, where they owned 50 acres they have bought 100, and where they owned 100, they have bought another 100; in that way they make liabilities for themselves, no doubt, but in 1886 the value had increased to $49,110,033, or an increase of $1,820,504, according to Mr. Blue. If the hon. gentleman wants later information, he can get it in the report for 1887. Then the hon. gentleman directed his attack against the whole Province of Ontario. We find that in 1882, the farm lands, buildings, implements, and live stock were valued at $948,000,000, and in 1886 at $989,497,000. Here is what Mr. Blue says in his report of November, 1886, on page 5:

"These values are made up from the June schedule of farmers. They show an increase on the figures of last year, $21,587,804 in farm lands; $6,518,849 in live stock; $1,961,211 in implements, and a little over $1,000,000 in building, or about an excess over the values of 1885 of $31,338,171, and of $41,195,106 over the values of the four years."

He goes further than that, he says:

"Compared with 1882, in 1886 the increase was $41,195,106 over the Province of Ontario."

Now, what are people going to think of a gentleman who, for mere party purposes, tried to make them believe that the country was going to ruin, and all for the paltry purpose of gaining some political advantage? Now, the hon. gentleman did not stop at that. The reason I direct so much attention to the member of South Huron is that I have got a pretty high respect for him, seeing that my county engaged him to do a certain work, and no doubt they had a good opinion of his judgment as a valuator. The hon. gentleman went further. Dealing with the stock and the cattle he says—I quote from Hansard:

"Now, Sir, in 1887, there were 70,000 head less cattle in Ontario than there were two years previously. The farmers are in a very bad condition indeed. I think the farmers are in the worst condition of any class of population in the Province of Ontario."

Again, he says:

"In the report I received last August we have 70,683 fewer horses and cattle than we had in 1882."

We will see what Mr. Blue says about it. I find in Mr. Blue's report that in 1882 we had 508,998 horses; in 1886, 569,649, or an increase of 60,651 horses. That gentleman also deals with the number of cattle, but I must take horses and cattle together. The number in Ontario in 1882 was 1,680,056; in November, 1887—and I sent especially for the latest returns—the number was 1,948,264, or an increase of 340,280; yet the hon. gentleman said the number was less than formerly, and he passes in the country as a fair and honorable gentleman in dealing with public questions, while at the same time he is damaging, not only his own county and my county, but the whole Province of Ontario. If we take the two together, horses and cattle, we find that instead of there being 70,000 less, as stated by the hon. member there was an excess in 1886 over 1882 of 406,571. The hon. gentleman got the sheep mixed with the question and tried to pull the wool over our eyes. It is very true that we have less sheep now than formerly, but he did not mention them when he said there were 70,000 head short. The truth is he got sheep, cattle and horses mixed, and, as I said, he tried to pull the wool over our eyes, but he did not succeed. We will again see what Mr. Blue says on the subject. On page 62 of his report he says that the value of animals in 1882 was $98,325,797; in 1886—and the hon. gentleman said that our farmers had been exporting all their cattle, because they were too poor to feed them, and they had sent their store cattle to Buffalo—the value was $107,000,000 odd, or an increase of $8,883,843. That covers sheep I suppose.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. HESSON. I do not think hon. members are ready for a division yet, but when the time comes they will swallow this resolution as they have others, and they will vote against the National Policy as they have done in the past. I have a dose yet for the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). That hon. gentleman could not leave my county alone. He made the same mistake, whether willfully or not I do not know, or he may have taken his figures from some other gentleman, at all events he raised the same wail of despair that has been raised by every hon. gentleman on that side of the House. He said the farms in Wellington had been mortgaged to a very great extent. The hon. gentleman knows more about mortgages than I do, because it is in his line of business. The hon. gentleman knows something about some of the unfortunate farmers there, and I rather think they know something about him too. I want to give the hon. gentleman a better idea of his own county than he possesses himself, and I am very sorry that a gentleman representing such a noble county as Wellington should fall into the same mistake as has been made by the hon. member for South Huron. The hon. gentleman said there had been a great decline in the value of farm lands, and in support of that statement he quoted statistics regarding his own county. According to Mr. Blue's report the value of farm lands in Wellington in 1882 was $34,354,286, in 1886 $35,416,621, or an increase of $1,060,000 odd. I feel an interest in my neighbors, and as hon. gentlemen who have spoken for counties surrounding my county have spoken of the want of prosperity in those counties, I desire to examine as to what the cause is, and to what extent the statement is true. Last evening the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Bowman), one of the garden counties of Ontario, made the very same departure. He did not open it with a wail but he closed it with a wail. He said that the value of lands had depreciated there and I presume that if he is in the loaning business he will know all about it. He is a very nice gentleman and represents his county faithfully and well, but I do not think his constituents will be thankful to him for representing that noble county as on its last legs. If there is one county more than another which is holding its own and holding more than its own it is that grand county of Waterloo, and if there is one man who ought to be proud of that, it is the gentleman who represents the Germans of that county, the most industrious, hard working, and honest citizens in Canada to-day. To see their beautiful homes, their magnificent farms and the growth of their glorious towns is a sight to be admired. Let the hon. gentleman go to the town he resides in Waterloo, and let him look around him there and how can he come here and wail against the National Policy. He cannot help admitting that the National Policy has built up the town he resides in. Look at Berlin, one and a half mile distant, it is a perfect marvel of progress. I may say it is a Manchester in a small way. What was it before the National Policy was introduced? I am not afraid to say that with the exception of one firm in that town, Messrs. Erb, Brown & Co., who are extraordinarily bitter Grits, not a man in that magnificent little town could be found to say that the National Policy had not been the making of their business. I am surprised that my friend from Waterloo had the courage to say that he represented the opinions of the manufacturers of that town. The town has doubled its wealth and population since the National Policy came into force, and I challenge that hon. gentleman to stand up and say that he can express the opinions of the manufacturers of that town, for the manufacturers voted solid for the National Policy. In 1874, when the hon. gentleman represented that county before, he was elected by acclamation. No man dared to enter in the field against him. It was a county known for years as one in which no Conservative had a right to show his face, and it was only when the National Policy had so benefited the people of that county and that town that my hon. friend was defeated by the gentleman who represented the county in 1878, and until the House was dissolved in 1882. The gentleman I refer to was Mr. Kranz. Although the hon. gentleman who now represents the county was previously elected by acclamation the town of Berlin gave 250 of a solid majority against him. While he may have a right to represent the farmers on this question I challenge the right of the hon. gentleman to profess to represent the people who are engaged in the manufacturing industries in that town and to say they are not in favor of the National Policy. Let him go to his native town where he has lived for a long time, and where he is respected highly, and I do not think there is any other gentleman in that riding more respected than he is for he has friends and relatives everywhere and he has represented North Waterloo in an able and distinguished way. Indeed that gentleman in his own town could not get a majority while in the rural places he was able to throw the veil over the eyes of the farmers. Right in his town there was no less than a majority of 58 against him. I think I have devoted enough attention to those hon. gentlemen and perhaps more than the subject is worthy of. I for one enter my protest here against any attempt to put into the hands of the United States Government the power to levy the rates of duty that people will have to pay in this country on their imports into this country. I protest against our looking to them for what they may choose to dole out to us for the purpose of the public expenditures of this country. I protest against Canada ever having to submit or to surrender her right to legislate for herself in those matters, and to decide under her own good will what is best for her people. You may call me ultra-loyal if you will, but I protest, and so long as life continues I shall protest, against anything that would lead to a severance from the old land that we all love so well. I believe, that if there is one thing that we could desire better than another, it would be that the grand old country should make with us and her colonies which, look to her for encouragement and aid in time of distress, one grand Zollverein against all foreign nations, giving the right of her markets, under conditions that would be denied to other countries. I believe that we should look to this instead of turning our backs upon the British Empire and upon our glorious Queen. I say it is our bounden duty, as British subjects, whilst at the same time considering our own interest, to look towards the mother land. I believe our interest points in that direction, and even if you put it on the very lowest grounds, I believe it is to our advantage in every possible way to keep up that connection and to strengthen it more. Above all things, never allow the Americans to legislate for us in matters that we understand ourselves best. I believe that the course I have referred to will make our people contented and prosperous, as I believe they are now, outside a few politicians in this country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Adjourn.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Mr. Speaker, as it does not appear to be the wish of gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that we should be permitted to adjourn at this late hour of the evening I certainly will have to bow to their desires and wishes. They being in the majority, of course we on the side of the minority must submit as we have always submitted with the best grace possible. But, Sir, a question of this kind, a question involving itself results which may be of serious consideration to the country, a question in which we are all deeply interested, should have a proper time for consideration and discussion. This late hour is hardly a proper time for a person to express his ideas and his reasons for the vote that he may be called upon to give. I must say that I was more or less amused by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). I do not really know whether he was serious in the statements he has made or whether he desired the House to understand or consider that he was discussing the question of unrestricted reciprocity, or whether he was offering a few remarks so that he might congratulate some hon. members on this side of the House on the manner in which they had addressed the House. I must say I am surprised that any hon. member of this House should so far forget what is proper and right as to deliberately accuse any hon. member of this House of attempting to draw the wool over the eyes of any of the people of the Dominion of Canada. I very much regret that he should deliberately and positively affirm, from his place in this House, that my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Bowman) should have succeeded in drawing the wool over the eyes of the farmers in that locality. Does he pretend to say that the farmers are so ignorant that they do not know when or how to record their votes? He may imagine that he is addressing himself through this House to an ignorant class; but I will give him to understand distinctly that I have had an opportunity of meeting farmers in various sections of this country, and no class in this Dominion are more intelligent, or more thoroughly understand what is best for their own interests. I might also say, with reference to his remarks about my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), that the statements made by that hon. gentleman were correct in every particular; and I think any dispassionate individual within the hearing of my voice, will agree with me that, taking into consideration the opening up of new territories in the North-West, and the departure of many people from this country to the United States, farm lands are not at present in Canada as valuable as they were a few years ago. But it matters very little whether the lands be assessed high or low. There is a certain amount of taxes to be raised, and if the land is assessed low the rate of taxation will be high, while if the land is assessed high, the rate of taxation will be low. Therefore the assessed value of the land is no certain indication of its real value. The hon. gentleman stated another thing which I take exception to. It has been the rule among hon. members opposite, when they rise to address the House, to hurl across the floor the charge, not only that we are on this side are disloyal, but that we are continually decrying the country. Now, Sir, I challenge any hon. member opposite to point to a single statement made by any member on this side in any way disparaging to this country. I say they are the individuals who are decrying the country. Not one single breath of detraction has been uttered by any member on this side of the House. We have simply stated what we conceive to be true, and I have yet to learn that any of us feel that we are doing wrong when we are stating the truth. It may be very congenial for hon. gentlemen opposite to withhold the truth or to be not free to express candidly what they feel to be the facts. I am not going, Sir, to decry my country. I believe we have as fine a country as lies under the sun. I believe we have a class of inhabitants that perhaps cannot be surpassed in any country in the world. Our situation and surroundings conduce to render the human product of Canada one of the most superior products in the world. If we take into consideration the climatic conditions of Canada, our people in longevity surpass probably any others; and for physical endurance, for strength and bravery, we know that no other country has been able to show the equal of our people. Knowing these facts, would it be reasonable for us for one moment to decry a country that produced such fine physical specimens of men as Hanlan or McKinnon? If that is not sufficient, let me call your attention to something with which you are more familiar, perhaps, than the exploits of those individuals. Let me call your attention to the circumstances that unfortunately took place in 1885 at the time the rebellion sprang up in the North-West. What did we find on that occasion? We found young men from the counting house, from the college, from the farm and from various avocations and callings, responding gloriously to their country's call; and their physical power of endurance during the time they went to subdue that rebellion would command the admiration of any veterans. You know full well, Mr. Speaker, what they were called on to endure. You know that they were called on to go to the North-West without the necessary comforts that ought to have been supplied to them—that after they started on their journey they were obliged to ride on the cars day after day and night after night without the rest and refreshment which are necessary to the sustenance of the human system. Not only that, but they were compelled to make forced marches through snow in a temperature which was almost enough to freeze them to death. They endured all that, and when they reached their destination, they subdued one of the most grievous rebellions that was perhaps ever recorded in the annals of any race. Within ninety days after they had reached their point of destination, they put down the Indian rebellion. With these facts before us, will any one attempt to decry for a moment the human product of this Dominion. Take the people of Canada as a whole, and there is not a finer race under the sun. This being the case with the people, let us consider what sort of a country we have. Have you found, Sir, any individual who attempted to speak upon this question say that our soil, our climate, our situation in every respect, is not only equal but in many respects superior to that of the United States. We have as good soil as they, we have as good a climate as they, we have as good water communication as they, and having a race equal to theirs, we ought to march onward in civilisation, in the advancement of manufacturing industries and of farming industries, with a pace equal to that of the people of the United States. But have we so advanced? Have we made progress equal to that made by our neighbors? If we have not, there must be some reason for it, and we ought to consider wherein lies the fault. If a fault exists it is our bounden duty to remedy it. I might, perhaps, follow the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) through some of the remarks he made, but I really think, as I have said, that he was hardly sincere in his remarks, and was merely endeavoring to take up as much of the time of the House as he could without touching at all on the question of unrestricted reciprocity. True, he read a number of letters from Mr. Wiman, and I should judge from his speech that he had taken extensive notes, before coming to Parliament, on the question of commercial union, and, having neglected to separate unrestricted reciprocity from that question, fired off the unprepared, half digested, very crude speech, he had intended for some other purpose. Therefore, it is hardly worth my while to take up the various points, if points I could call them, and answer them in the manner in which the hon. gentleman presented them to the House. I have said to you that our territory is as great as and equal in every respect to any portion of the United States, and I may say to many portions of the old world. Take, for instance, the Province from which I come, not that I consider it is any better than any other Province of the Dominion, for I believe every Province is equally adapted for the maintenance and support of the human race, but let me take the Province of Ontario and compare its extent with that of other countries. From Point Pelee on Lake Erie to Fort Albany on James Bay, it is more than 700 miles wide. It is larger than the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois or Michigan by 10,000 square miles; yet the population of each of these States far exceeds the population of Ontario, and you will also find that the manufacturing industries of these States far exceeds those of the Province of Ontario. What is the cause of this? Why have we not made as great a progress as those States across the border? The Province of Ontario is also larger than the six New England States, and is larger than New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland by some 25,000 square miles. It is larger than Great Britain and Ireland by 75,000 square miles, and is only 4,000 square miles less than the French Republic and 8,000 less than the German Empire. Let us take the Dominion of Canada and what do we find? We find, if we compare it with the United States, that the territory of the Dominion with its 5,000,000 of population is greater than the whole territory of the United States. We have in the Dominion of Canada some 3,500,000 square miles of territory, whereas in the United States they have only 3,036,000 square miles, but we have less than five millions population, while the population of the United States is nearly 65,000,000. Why is it that the United States have increased so rapidly while we have to remain comparatively stationary? It is not on account of lack of energy on the part of our people or lack of ability to perform the duties which are essential to the prosperity of the country. There must be some cause why we have not made the same progress as the people across the border. We have ample territory for the founding of a great kingdom, or a great nation, and I can well understand the aspirations of the people of Canada that the time may come when we may be one of those glorious empires of kingdoms compared with other nations of the earth; but I am afraid that, at our present rate of progress, if we do not make more rapid strides than we have made, it is long in the future before we can expect to emulate other nations. Besides this broad expanse, we have a fertile soil, an invigorating climate, vast forests, great mineral wealth and water power of limitless capacity. Let us consider for a moment the advantages which we would have if we were a manufacturing country as our friends on that side of the House say they are endeavoring to make us. What might we not accomplish in consequence of the water privileges we possess? But have we not since 1879 attempted to build up factories in this country at the expense of the consumers? Have we not raised our duties and protected articles that could be manufactured in Canada in order to prevent their importation from foreign countries, and have we succeeded to the extent to which we ought to have succeeded? Have we accomplished what it was expected the new fiscal policy would accomplish? I think that every ardent lover and well wisher of the fiscal policy which was inaugurated in 1879 will admit that as much as he desired has not been accomplished, and, if it has been in the past so fruitless of results, can we expect in the future to receive any greater advantages in that direction than we have in the past?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). No doubt some of my hon. friends will cry "hear, hear" to anything which conveys the impression that the National Policy is performing some wonderful duty. I might perhaps give you the opinion of some in reference to what they consider the condition of Canada. I would read to you what is stated by Mr. J. R. Larned, of the United States Treasury Department in 1871:

"Ontario possesses a fertility in which no part of New England can at all compare, and that particular section of it around which the circle of the great lakes is swept forces itself upon the notice of any student of the American map as one of the most favored spots of the whole continent, where the population ought to breed with almost Belgian fecundity."

Here we see that the American people do not hesitate to tell the truth in reference to the condition of Canada, but, if we unfortunately on this side of the House should happen to make a favorable remark in reference to the territory across the line, we are held up as being inclined to annexation or as having a desire sooner or later to throw ourselves into the arms of the United States. Here is an American opinion in regard to the condition of Canada. Is it right that we on this side of the House, knowing these facts and feeling an inherent desire for the welfare of Canada, should be branded by every member who happens to get upon his feet on that side and should be charged with degrading or belittling our country? Have our people, as a people, proved themselves worthy of the Dominion of Canada? Have they done their share individually to increase the prosperity of the country? Are they individually to blame for the condition in which Canada is to-day? I think they are not. If we look at the various Provinces of the Dominion, what do we find? In Ontario we find that every care is taken to better the condition of the people, and the same remark may be made of every one of the other Provinces. We have a good form of government in the Province of Ontario, and we have good forms of government in all the other Provinces, and, thanks to the intelligence of the people and to their cautiousness, we have to-day a reform government, a progressive government, in almost every Province of the Dominion of Canada. That being the case, we would naturally expect that they would have the interests of the people at heart; and if we examine into what they have done in the various Provinces, we find that it is not owing to any lack of duty on the part of the Local Governments that the Dominion has not improved as rapidly as it ought to have improved. Take, for instance, the encouragement to agriculture. They have adopted every means to render assistance to the people to foster and encourage the industry of agriculture. They have established an agricultural college in the Province of Ontario, where young men have an opportunity of receiving instructions which will render them more competent to perform the duties of successful farmers. Our educational system will command the admiration of any country under the sun. We have expended enormous sums of money for the purpose of constructing railways. The Local Government of Ontario has granted large subsidies to railways; and not only that, but the municipalities have granted bonuses to various roads with a view of enabling every farmer to have an opportunity to dispose of everything he has to dispose of to the best possible advantage, and at as little expense as possible. Not only that, but we have constructed various roads so as to render the country more accessible to the markets. Good markets are built up in almost every town and city in all parts of the Province. But we find that the people are prepared, and have been prepared, to submit to what is so obnoxious in the ears of many, direct taxation, whereby the municipalities may have a certain amount to expend for educational and other purposes. We find that every Province is well managed by its Local Government, and why is it that the Dominion, as a whole, has not been as successful as it ought to have been? It must be either on account of the fiscal policy of the Government or the bad management of the Government. Sir, if that be found to be the case, if it is on account of their fiscal policy being inimical to the best interests of the country, the sooner the Government come down and submit some means whereby the evil may be remedied, the better it will be for the country. Sir, it is no great sin if they find they have been going wrong, candidly to confess it and try to repair the wrong. It is not cowardly to confess they have been wrong. I do not suppose there are many hon. members in this House who would regard them as perfect. We had an illustration a few days ago of a case wherein they had resisted for four or five years the entreaties of the members on this side of the House to grant certain concessions so as to put us in a better position with regard to the people of the United States. They firmly resisted our entreaties. I can remember well when the late Minister of Finance, now the Postmaster General, was entreated by members on this side of this House not to increase the duties upon small fruit trees coming into this country from the United States. It was pointed out to him then that the United States had passed an Act in 1883, removing duties from these very articles upon which the Government had taken authority, by Order in Council, to reciprocate with the United States. They resisted that request. They said it would injure a very large class of the citizens of Canada; they said we have a large number of nurserymen and small market gardeners, and if we allowed these fruits to come into the country, it would destroy these industries, and the market gardeners would not be able to get as good a price for their strawberries, their peaches and other fruit. They said it would be a wrong, it would be, to a certain extent, abandoning the National Policy that they had been fostering for a number of years. A large number of their supporters on that side of the House raised their voices in strong condemnation of any such gross injustice, being inflicted upon the nurserymen, the market gardeners and the small fruit men of Canada. But, Sir, did we not see the spectacle a few days ago of the announcement that a proclamation had been issued, placing upon the free list the very articles that we had contended for a few years ago? Where were the responsive voices that stood up a few years before and condemned us for advocating the very same thing that was done a few days ago? Quiet they say, unresponsive; no voice was raised, still as death. They may have felt grieved, they may have felt annoyed, but their master has said that they were to submit, and they quietly submitted and took the dose without a grimace. Sir, if it was a proper thing to make that concession and give away a portion of their National Policy, I would entreat them to come forward now and be still more generous and still more just. If they say the country has not made that improvement which it ought to have made during the last few years, they should come forward now and say: Here, we have virtually conceded that the National Policy has not been a success; we have had to do away with a portion of it, and we will concede the balance; we will allow the United States to send in not only the cereals and natural products of the soil, the mine and the forest, but we will allow them to send their manufactured articles, and we will do the same to the people of the United States; why should we not do this? Let us make a comparison. Take for instance the State of New York, and put up a high tariff wall around it, what would be the effect? Do you suppose the State of New York would go on and prosper as it has been doing? I think we would find that in a very short time its population would decrease, its manufacturing industries would decrease, and that, instead of being the banner state of the Union, in a short time it would fall to the third or fourth place. Now, Sir, we find that if we take the natural fertility of the Province of Ontario or any other portion of the Dominion, and compare it with that of some of the other States of the Union, our country will compare most favorably; in fact we in Canada will be able to raise a larger percentage of grain than they can in the United States. Let me compare fall wheat in Ontario with some of the States of the Union wherein that grain is most favorably grown. If you take the fall wheat from 1882 to 1886, it would average 14.8 bushels per acre in Pennsylvania; Ohio, 13.3; Michigan, 16.4; Indiana, 13; Illinois 12.9; Missouri, 10.9; California, 12; Kansas, 15.2. What was the average in Canada during that period, and, mark you, I take from 1882 to 1886 inclusive, during one of which years there was almost a total failure in the Dominion, much worse than in the United States. The average for Ontario during those five years was 21 bushels per acre, a larger average than they have in the United States. Next take spring wheat. The average during the same period in Wisconsin—and I select the States most favorable to the growth of spring wheat—was 12.7; Minnesota, 13.2; Iowa, 11.4; Nebraska, 12.7; Dakota, 13.1; Ontario, 16.1, thus exceeding Iowa by 4.7 bushels and Dakota by 2 bushels. Next I come to oats. The products in New York State on an average during the same period, and it is a State favorable to the growth of oats, was 29.6; Pennsylvania, 28.8; Illinois, 34.5; Ohio, 32; Michigan, 32.9; Indiana, 28.8; Wisconsin, 34; Minnesota, 34.6; Iowa, 34; Missouri, 26; Kansas, 31.9; Nebraska, 32.2; Ontario, 37.1. We have heard during the discussion something on the question of barley. Perhaps there is no country, neither the United States nor any foreign country, where the same quality and same quantity of barley can be raised as in this Dominion. The production of barley on an average taking the same number of years, was as follows: New York, average per acre 23.1; Wisconsin, 24.2; Minnesota, 23.4; Iowa, 22.5; Nebraska, 22.3; California, 19.3; Ontario, 26.9. These facts show that Ontario exceeded any of the States of the Union in the quantity per acre and the quality is superior to any raised in any State. If we could obtain reciprocal trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States we would there find a market for all the barley we could possibly raise. All the barley we could raise would not in any way overstock the market of the United States, therefore it would not in any way reduce the price. Again, if you take the very small acreage of barley in Canada, it shows that it is on account of the 10 cents a bushel we have to pay to send barley into the United States that causes our farmers to raise less barley than they otherwise would do. The average quantity of land occupied is about 48 acres to the 1000. If we had reciprocity between Canada and the United States we would be able to occupy a much larger acreage per 1000 than at the present time, and, therefore, even that should induce the Government to consider favorably anything that would, to a certain extent, relieve the farmers from the condition in which they are at the present time. You may say that the farmer is prosperous, that he has succeeded in his occupation; but remember what the hon. member for North Perth said, that it was quite out of the question at the present time that a farmer in the Dominion could cultivate as much land as a farmer cultivated on the prairie, and it was unreasonable to expect our farmers to do so. If that be true, as stated by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), is it not the duty of the Government to make an arrangement with the United States if possible? But the House knows well that the Government do not feel anxious to do so; that rumor is that whenever election time comes round that one portion of the community is more liberal towards assisting to secure the present Government in power than the other portion, that the farming community do not respond so readily to calls, they are not willing to supply the sinews of war and furnish assistance to keep the Government in power, and therefore the Government turn their back upon those who do not extend aid. That is the reason why the Government treat with indifference the portion of the community that includes 75 per cent. of the whole population. But the time is not far distant when they will find the farming community rise in their might and say they are no longer going to have a Government legislating in the interests of a certain class against the masses of the people, and the sooner the day comes the better it will be for the future hope and aspiration of those who regard and wish their country well. But this is not all. If we have not succeeded as well as we might expect in establishing our various industries, how has our population increased compared with what it ought to have been? I will not detain the House to show that the population has not increased in the ratio in which it should have increased. The population increased from 1873 to 1879, and mark you that was a period when there was a great depression in the country, and when there was a very small amount of money spent in public and other improvements. The population then increased by 78,961 or 22 per cent. From 1879 to 1885, when very large sums of money had been expended upon railways and other subsidies, yea and for the purpose of influencing the electorate at the polls, we find that the population during that period increased only 44,889, or 10 per cent. That is not all. We know that during the latter period a very large number of supposed immigrants were brought to the country, when several million dollars were expended for that purpose, and, Sir, if we compare the number of immigrants that were reported to have been brought here and the number of the natural increase that ought to have taken place, we find that the population in 1885 was really less than it was in 1879. Why ought this to be the case? You can all understand full well that it must be partially owing to the fiscal policy, or the restrictions that the people of the Dominion of Canada had to sustain on account of the fiscal policy inaugurated by a Government which could not fully comprehend what really was in the interest and for the welfare of the Dominion. Taking the years 1873 to 1879 we find also that the assessed lands of the municipalities increased by 1,001,233 acres or 5 per cent. During the second period when the Government was expending money lavishly on railroads and expending money in our North-West, we find that the assessed acreage increased only by 622,978 acres, or about 3 per cent. During the time that the present Government then in Opposition, charged the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) with neglecting the interests of the country and driving the people out of the country to the United States, while we find that the assessed value of the land increased more rapidly than it did when this "heaven-born" Government assumed power and promised to make everyone prosperous in the country—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Yes, you might well cheer when I ironically said "heaven-born Government." A more unmeaning remark I never made in my life. The Government that appealed to the people under the pretense that they were going to make the country prosperous have been in power since 1879, and during that time, on account of mismanagement and misgovernment, they have driven thousands of people out of the country. During that time they inaugurated a policy that we feel and we know has not conduced to the welfare of the country. Not only that, Sir, but they have run this country hopelessly in debt during that period by a lavish and extravagant expenditure upon it. Yes, Sir, I said a "heaven-born" Government. I retract that, and you can retract your cheers. If we take the urban municipalities we find that the acreage during the first decade was much greater than it was during the second decade. In the first period it was 22 per cent., in the second decade it was only 10½ per cent. Although the times were regarded as hard in the first period I refer to, we find that the rural sections and the urban portions of the country raised a much larger amount of taxes during the first year to improve their farms, improve their conditions, educate their children, and for necessary expenses, than during the second period. The percentage during the first period was 27½, and during the time that our friends opposite have managed the affairs of the Government it has only been 16½. The people were unable since to raise the necessary taxes to educate their children and defray their expenses. Sir, we know full well what all this means; we know what will be the ultimate outcome if we go on in this way. We know full well that we in Canada cannot remain in the condition that we have been in for a number of years past. We know, Sir, that we must have an opportunity to extend our trade greater than what we have had. We are not like the frog, we cannot live in the well, nor are we like the coon that can retire into his seclusion during the winter. We must have an extended trade to other countries and not merely be traders with ourselves. The doctrine advocated by the First Minister that we should keep entirely within ourselves, that we should manufacture everything that we want, and that we should trade amongst ourselves and be excluded from the rest of the world is the most unreasonable doctrine ever preached by a man calling himself a statesman. Suppose the hon. gentleman had carried out that policy that he announced he would carry out at the time he appealed to the country, I ask you what would have been the result? The grievous wail that we hear against the members on this side of the House, that we are doing an injustice and a wrong to the mother land on account of asking reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, would not have been indulged in by gentlemen opposite, for the hon. gentleman then said that he was going to manufacture everything and import nothing from other countries. Sir, if he carried out the doctrine that he then preached, a grievous wrong would have been committed by him. If we seek to become a great nation, if we expect to extend our trade with other nations, we know that we must adopt a different policy to that which we have adopted. We know full well that even now with the restriction placed upon the articles coming from the United States to Canada that a very large amount of those articles do come and that we raise a considerable amount of revenue from their importation. We know that with free trade with the mother country, and with every opportunity of conveying everything that we have to trade to them, we have extended our trade from 1879 up to the present time but by a very small amount.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto said that England gave us market enough for all the surplus cereals we raised in Canada now or will raise for a hundred years. I would ask him, have we not had England for our market for the last ten or twelve years? Shall we have it any the less if we enter into unrestricted trade with the United States? It is perfect nonsense to say that it would injure our trade with the mother country. Everyone knows that the mother country desires the prosperity of Canada, and that anything we may do to promote its prosperity and increase its population would only endear Canada to the mother country; and I say he is not a true patriot who would try to restrict the progress and success of the Dominion of Canada. I am not aware that we should be doing any injustice to the mother country at all; but if unrestricted reciprocity injured anyone in the mother country, it would only injure a few Birmingham and Manchester manufacturers. True, we receive from them about $40,000,000 worth of goods a year. True, there are about 500 people in all who realise a profit. They might be affected; but they are not the mother country; they are only a few of the citizens of the mother country. Are we not citizens of the mother country just as much as they? Are the 5,000,000 people of Canada to suffer what we conceive to be injurious to our country for the sake of pleasing a few manufacturers in Birmingham and Manchester? The whole profits that those manufacturers realise from us might be perhaps $2,000,000 a year. But you must bear this in mind, that the manufactures of Birmingham and Manchester are not the only people in England who have an interest in Canada. There are others in England who have enormous sums invested in Canada; I suppose $500,000,000 of English capital is to-day invested in this country. Are we to do what will mar the success and the enterprise of those investments for the purpose of pleasing a few of the manufacturers of Birmingham and Manchester? We know that a great proportion of the money invested in our railroads comes from England; we know that the greater portion of the money invested in our loan societies and manufacturing industries comes from England; and I ask you, Sir, if we should get unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and by that means increase the wealth and prosperity of the Dominion of Canada, whether in benefiting that large number of capitalists in the mother country who have their money invested in Canada, we should not be benefiting the mother country. Then consider our railroad interest. If we could get unrestricted reciprocity, whereby we could increase the traffic between the United States and Canada, the earnings of the railroads would increase enormously, more than to the extent of $2,000,000 that the manufacturers of Birmingham and Manchester might lose. Therefore it is most unreasonable to say that we should be dealing unfairly with the mother country by adopting unrestricted reciprocity. I say that it would be in the interest of the mother country for us to obtain it, and we should do everything in our power to bring it about. But, Sir, there is another consideration in this matter. If we do not extend our trade, it is just possible that some fine day the bonding system may be done away with, that the United States may say to us that no longer is it in the interest of the United States to continue the bonding system; what would be the effect on the Dominion if such a thing took place? We know that it would be an almost fatal blow to railroading in the Dominion of Canada. There are many here whose interests are considerably identified with railroads, and I appeal to them to consider whether it would not be better for us, when we have an opportunity, when the olive branch is held out to us by the American Government, to embrace their offer at the earliest opportunity. Now, I am well aware that many statements have been made to show that our population has not to any greater extent gone to the United States during the last decade than it did during the Administration of the hon. member for East York. I agree that we must always expect that there will be more or less interchange of population between the two countries which no Government or people can prevent. I think you will find that during the last decade, a larger number have left Canada than during the previous years; and that being the case, it is evident they must have thought Canada was not the best place for them to obtain either work or cheap lands. If then it be found that it is to our interest that we should have unrestricted reciprocity, is it not our bounden duty, as true loyal Canadians, to do that which is in the interest of Canada. You can rest content, Sir, that England will look after herself and that the United States will look after themselves, and that in Canada we must look after the interests of our own people. I feel thankful for having had this brief opportunity of making the remarks I have made. Let me say before sitting down, that I am strongly in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, and I will appeal to my friends from down by the sea, whether they can conscientiously vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax in favor of our coasting trade. We know the great advantage that would accrue to us were we permitted to have the privilege of the coasting trade from one port to the other of the United States. It would also be a great benefit for the people on the great inland waters along the lakes between the United States and Canada. On account of our not having that reciprocal privilege, the shipping along our coast has disappeared almost completely, and unless we can obtain something in that direction, we will not be able to carry on that business which a country such as this Dominion should carry on, and I appeal to them to lay aside party feeling and do that which they ought to do in the interest of the people of the whole Dominion. Entertaining those views, I shall cordially support the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), believing that the policy it embodies will, in the future, if carried out, make Canada one of the first nations under the sun. I also believe that if our trade and our relations with the people of the United States remain restricted our interests will be crippled, our trade will be curtailed and Canada will not be the country we all desire it to be.

Mr. KIRK. As this is one of the most, if not the most important question perhaps that has been before this House since Confederation, hon. gentlemen should approach the discussion of it with at least clear heads and at a time when they are not drowsy for the want of sleep. It is now nearly 2:30 o'clock, and I would rise to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. KIRK. I believe there are several other gentlemen who wish to address the House on this question, and it is unfair to try and shut them off or force them to speak at this early hour in the morning. However, we are able to stand this thing as well as hon. gentlemen opposite. And as they evidently intend to continue the sitting for some time longer, I shall ask the indulgence of the House whilst I give some of my opinions with regard to this question from a Nova Scotia standpoint. Before entering on my subject I wish to say a word with regard to a remark made by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). This hon. gentleman said that the leader of the Opposition had declared that the Maritime Provinces were in a state of revolt. Well, the leader of the Opposition is in his seat. He may have said that, but I did not hear him say so, and I do not think he did. I believe he said something quite different. At any rate that led the hon. gentleman to talk of repeal, and he said that no constituency in the Maritime Provinces would return a member to this House on a question of repeal. I said he was mistaken with regard to Nova Scotia, and I believe the hon. member for Digby said he was not mistaken. Let us see which is right. I happen to have the honor of being elected to this House as a repealer, by a constituency in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct the statement he imputed to me. What I said was that in the Province of New Brunswick, and I was speaking for that Province alone, no member could secure his election as a repealer.

Mr. KIRK. That makes it all right so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned. I understood him to say no constituency in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for Digby, in reply to the statement that the hon. member for Albert was mistaken with regard to Nova Scotia, said he was not mistaken. I issued an address to the electors of my county when the House was dissolved, and announced myself as a candidate. In that address I laid down my platform. I pointed out among other things that I was in favor of repeal, and this is what I said:

"I am fully convinced that the only effectual remedy for this unbearable state of affairs is the entire and complete separation of the Maritime from the upper and Western Provinces, and in a union of the Maritime Provinces; and should New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island fail to co-operate, then the separation of Nova Scotia from the other Provinces of the Dominion and a return to a state of an independent Province of Great Britain, with sole control—subject to the Imperial Government—over all its internal affairs, including tariff and taxation.

"Should you do me the honor of renewing your confidence in me by re-electing me as your representative to the Canadian Parliament, I shall deem it to be my duty to cordially co-operate with the Local Government and Legislature in effecting a repeal of the British North America Act so far as it affects Nova Scotia."

I think that declaration of my position in regard to repeal and of what I myself would do proves at any rate that the Province of Nova Scotia had one constituency that returned a repealer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. One.

Mr. KIRK. Do the hon. gentlemen mean to say that I was the only candidate who was returned in favor of repeal?

Some hon. MEMBERS. What did you do?

Mr. KIRK. Never mind what we did. That proves that the people of Nova Scotia are dissatisfied with the condition of things, and they are dissatisfied because the pledges of those who brought us into Confederation have not been carried out. We were dragged into Confederation without our consent and against our will, and every prediction which was made by the leaders of the Anti-Confederate party has been more than fulfilled, for we have been taxed more than any one of those leaders ever anticipated, and, until the present time, we believed there was no party in the Dominion, there was no party in Ontario which was willing to adopt the policy which has been taken up in this Parliament and to advocate full and free reciprocity with the United States. The United States of America are our nearest and our best market. There is not a man in the Province of Nova Scotia who is old enough to remember the condition of affairs when we had reciprocity with the United States, but remembers well that all things prospered, and the people were contented and happy. But things have changed, and are the people contented and happy?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. KIRK. Not a bit of it. They would not have voted as they did in 1886 if they were contented and happy. We know that in 1886 the Local Legislature went to the people at the polls with a square issue of repeal. We know that both parties, those opposed to repeal and those in favor of repeal, had the same chance of success at the polls. What was the result? Out of 38 members, only 7 were beaten—31 were returned pledged to vote for repeal. That was the condition of affairs in Nova Scotia in 1886. It may be true that in 1887, one year afterwards, there was seemingly a reverse vote, but it was not a reverse vote. We find that to-day only those on the Liberal side are elected from Nova Scotia who pledged themselves for repeal. Those who went to the polls not pledged for repeal were defeated, every one of them. Had they taken up the repeal cry, as they should have done, we would have had more members on this side of the House than we have. And why is it so? We know that in 1878, when the policy of protection was propounded, or rather when the change of policy was propounded, because it was in 1873 only a readjustment of the tariff that was announced which was not to increase the taxes of the people, the leader of the Opposition at that time, who is now the leader of the Government, stated that he did not intend to increase the taxes, he stated that tariffs did not increase taxes, but it was only debt that increased taxes, and they would not increase the debt and therefore they would not increase the taxes. It was to be only a readjustment, which would make everything boom, and would bring prosperity to the agricultural, the mining, and every other industry; but we find that, instead of a readjustment of the taxation so as not to take money out of the pockets of the people and not to increase the taxes, which the people have to pay, the tariff has been, not quite doubled perhaps, but enormously increased, the taxes have been enormously increased and, because of that, the people have become dissatisfied and have desired to be relieved from the Union.

Mr. MADILL. Why does not your leader take up repeal?

Mr. KIRK. I will promise the hon. gentleman one thing that, if this Government will make it a plank in their platform, if they will say to Nova Scotia, if you vote for repeal you will get repeal, nine-tenths of the people of Nova Scotia will vote in that way, and nine out of ten of the representatives of Nova Scotia will be elected pledged to repeal. Will the right hon. gentleman take up the challenge? Of course he will not, because he knows that what I say is true. What is the condition of affairs? They say that in 1882 they had the majority of the votes of the people of Nova Scotia. They went to the polls a year before Parliament expired by limitation, and why did they dissolve a year before the time? The reason was given that there were foreign capitalists who were ready to expend millions upon millions of dollars in order to develop the mineral resources of the country, most of which, or at any rate a very large proportion of which are in the Province of Nova Scotia. We are a small Province, and it may be a poor one. It is poor in consequence of the fiscal policy of the Government, but I say that in its mineral resources there is no country under the sun wealthier than that little Province. It is true that the Province of Nova Scotia is not as great an agricultural Province as the Province of Ontario, but she is an agricultural Province notwithstanding. We have in that Province as fine agricultural lands as can be found in Ontario, and we have a great deal of ordinary land. We have fine forests, we have mines the like of which are not to be found anywhere else in Canada, we have gold, and silver, and coal, and copper, and iron and many other minerals. These lie undeveloped. I ask, why is it that the Province of Nova Scotia, in common with the rest of the Dominion of Canada, is so far behind the United States in the development of the resources of the country? Why are the iron mines there lying untouched, although the Government promised in 1884 that millions of money would be introduced into the country if the people showed they had confidence in the Government of the day? Why, after six years have elapsed since the people showed that they had faith in the Government, has not one dollar been expended on those iron mines? The people were deceived into voting for the Government at that time. There are but 160 men employed in the Province of Nova Scotia in developing the iron mines of that Province, on which the Government promised that millions of money would be expended. This is why the people of Nova Scotia are dissatisfied with Confederation, and want to get out of it. They remember well the flourishing condition they were in between 1854 and 1865, and they desire to see that prosperity brought back again. I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance the other day declare himself so strongly in favor of reciprocity with the United States, in the natural resources of the country; I was exceedingly pleased to hear it. I know that he and the leader of the Government had always declared that their object in imposing a high protective tariff, was to force the United States to give us reciprocity in the natural resources of the country. Well, we have been nine years under this National Policy and we have not forced the United States yet, but it looks very much as if the United States are going to force us. It seems there are two sets of opinions in the Government ranks. We have the Premier declaring against reciprocity in natural resources, and we have the Finance Minister declaring that he was in favor of it, and whether the Prime Minister liked it or not, he was obliged to support the view of the Finance Minister, notwithstanding that only a week ago he had declared against it. The Government appear to have a Mikado and Tycoon; which is the Mikado and which is Tycoon, I cannot tell. But we do know that almost every hon. gentleman behind the Premier who has spoken, has agreed with him against reciprocity either in manufactured goods or in the natural resources of the country. Scarcely an hon. gentleman opposite has spoken who did not declare that if we had reciprocity with the United States in the natural products of the soil it would ruin the farmers, yet almost every one of them says that he is willing to support a policy for reciprocity in the natural resources, although the whole tenor of their speeches went to show that it would ruin the farmers. They are willing to ruin the farmers by reciprocity in natural resources, but, oh, do not touch the poor manufacturers! The Secretary of State declared that he was in favor of reciprocity in the natural resources, but he said he was in favor of protection to the manufacturers. Now, I find it is admitted on all hands that both in the United States and here there is no hope of a reciprocity treaty in the natural resources of the country. That has been stated over and over again by leading business men in the United States and Canada, and even by the Premier himself. I will read what the First Minister said on that point in 1884, when he spoke to the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies):

"I believe that you will never get a treaty between the United States and Canada for reciprocal trade in the natural productions of the two countries. The Americans said—whether truly or not, I do not know—that it was a nominal reciprocity, but all the advantages were on the side of Canada. We had no market of sufficient importance to offer to them for their productions of grains, and cereals and fisheries, we, on the other hand, had to gain everything by their market being opened for the articles specified in the Treaty. That feeling, I believe, still exists, and unless the United States will come, at sometime or other, to a conclusion that they will be willing to enter upon a Reciprocity Treaty, not only for our natural productions, but for our manufactures as well as our natural productions, we will never have a treaty."

Here is the hon. Premier himself saying that he is willing to have a treaty with the United States in the natural products of the country, and we have this follower behind him saying that they are willing to have a treaty with the United States in the natural products, but they are not willing to have an unrestricted reciprocity in manufactures as well as in natural products; whilst the Prime Minister said only three or four years ago that it was impossible to get a reciprocity treaty of any kind unless it included both classes of articles. Now, why will hon. gentlemen stand up here to-day and tell the people, deceive the people by telling them, that we are in favor of a reciprocity treaty in the natural products, and lead the people to believe that we could get it, while they know as well as they are sitting in their seats, that we cannot get it unless we go the whole figure? Hon. gentlemen say that it is useless to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States in articles which they export as well as we, and in articles which they grow as well as we. They say, if you have reciprocity with the United States in cereals, horses and sheep, the United States export these as well as we, therefore it will be an injury to us if we open our markets to them and they open their markets to us. They say that we must protect ourselves against the Americans. In order to be able to compete with them in the markets of the world. Why, Sir, we compete with them successfully now in all the markets of the world. All we want is that the barriers be broken down between the United States and Canada, so that we may have the privilege of trading with them on equal terms in their market. We then will have an additional market of 60,000,000, whilst they will only have an additional market of 5,000,000. It appears to me that the advantages are very much on our side, and if we can but get it, it would be a blessing for us. Well, Sir, Nova Scotia, previous to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, exported to the United States $1,529,721 worth of goods, and we imported in 1865, the last whole year of the treaty, $3,691,797 worth of goods, or more than 200 per cent. of an increase. Now, in 1887, twenty-two years afterwards, we exported to the United States only $1,733,990 a decrease of $857,798. We exported to the United States last year $857,798 worth less of goods than we did twenty-two years ago. Why was this? Was it because we had not the goods to export? That could not be the reason. The reason was we had to find other markets. Last year Nova Scotia exported to the United States $304,096 more goods than to Great Britain's free market, notwithstanding the fact that we had to pay an enormously high tariff in the United States. The total exports of the Dominion to the United States was of the value of $77,964,020, of which $22,275,033 went to the United States, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say the United States is no market for the Dominion. If the barriers were thrown down between the United States and Canada, I venture to say that the exports of this country would double in a very short time. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the United States is not our best market for fish. I find that we exported of fish last year to the United States $2,717,519 worth. Every one who knows anything about the fisheries is aware that the United States is our only market for fat mackerel. When we send mackerel there they meet a duty of $2 per barrel; when we send herring there, and it is our best market for fat herrings, they meet a duty of $1 per barrel, and codfish meets a duty of 50 cents per 100 pounds. It has been said that the people of this country are leaving for the United States. The fishermen can scarcely do anything else. They leave for the United States because they can get better pay on United States' vessels than they can on Nova Scotian vessels, because the custom is that the captain and crew of fishing vessels work on shares and seldom on wages. They receive a certain portion, I believe one half of the whole catch, the owner of the vessel receiving the other half. The fishermen have an advantage in hiring with American outfitters, taking shares on American vessels, because they get clear of the duty levied on the fish, $2 a barrel on mackerel, $1 a barrel on herring, 50 cents per 100 pounds on codfish. They have that advantage over men who hire with outfitters of Nova Scotian or Canadian vessels. Take two vessels fishing together, one American and the other Nova Scotian, New Brunswick or Canadian. Each vessel catches 1,000 barrels of mackerel, which is taken to the United States, the only market. The crew of the American vessel receives one-half of the catch, 500 barrels. These are sold in the market at $10 each. They have to pay no duty, and $5,000 falls to the share of the captain and the crew. The Nova Scotian crew have the same number of barrels, which are sold also for $10 per barrel; but they have to pay to the United States $2 per barrel duty, and they thus lose $1,000 on the transaction, they receiving $4,000 for their fish instead of $5,000 obtained by the crew of the American vessel. Will anyone tell me that the Nova Scotian fishermen are not placed at a disadvantage under that state of affairs? It is very obvious that the men will seek employment on American vessels, and that the Nova Scotian vessels will have great difficulty in obtaining crews. Next take the case of codfish. The duty on dried and green codfish is the same, 50 cents per 100 pounds. That practically shuts green codfish out of the American market, it is actually a prohibitive duty, and therefore the Nova Scotian fishermen must send all their green codfish to other markets. The effect of that is to overstock the other markets and reduce the price of their fish. For these reasons our fishermen are exceedingly anxious that the duty should be removed from fish. I heard the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) state that the Americans paid the duty on fish and not our fishermen. I maintain that such is not the case. I find in discussing the question as to who pays the duty, the Premier in 1878 placed himself on record with respect to this matter. Here is what he stated in regard to who pays the duty on barley, and I say that if the principle is true that the Canadian barley raiser pays the duty, I hold that the Canadian fisherman also pays the duty, in fact the fishermen know they do pay the duty. Here is what the First Minister said in regard to the duty on barley:

"I find that the farmers of Western Canada could not understand there was anything in their barley, for instance being obliged to pay a duty of 15 per cent. upon going into the United States. It is said the consumers paid the duty and that the farmer does not suffer anything. That is the statement, but when I put a simple case, which I have done frequently, I can get no answer. I put a case in the Eastern Townships of a man upon the imaginary line which was between this country and the United States. Suppose a man has 100 acres on the Canada side of the line and 100 acres of land on the American side of the line. Suppose he grows 1,000 bushels of barley on each of his farms. He takes his 1,000 American bushels to the American market and gets $1 a bushel for it. He takes his 1,000 bushels of Canadian barley to the American market and gets but 85 cents per bushel, because he has to pay 15 per cent. duty for taking it across that imaginary line. How can it be said in this case that the consumer pays the duty. It comes out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers."

Can the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) contradict those figures?

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if Canadian barley is not quoted 15 cents higher than American barley in the city of New York?

Mr. KIRK. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. I say it is, in any quotation you wish to refer to.

Mr. KIRK. I will leave the hon. gentleman for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to settle that question with his leader. Now, Sir, we are told that the West Indies was our market for fish and that the United States was not our market. The hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman) told us this, and the Government pretend to make us believe that they are doing all they can to open up markets in the West Indies and other places. Notwithstanding the fact that this duty stands against us in the United States the exportation of fish from Nova Scotia to the United States is increasing while the export to the West Indies is decreasing. Notwithstanding the boast of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he is doing such great things by scientific means to open up markets in the West Indies for the products of this country I find that in 1878 the export of fish to the United States was $1,073,449, while last year it was $1,358,024, or an increase in 1887 over 1878 of $284,575 worth. We exported to the British and Foreign West Indies in 1878 $2,411,044, worth, while last year we only exported $1,494,983 worth a decrease of $916,061, or nearly 40 per cent. Then we have a large lumbering interest in Nova Scotia as well as in other parts of the Dominion, and we find that the United States is a good market for our lumber, but it has to meet with the very heavy duty there and consequently it is impossible for Nova Scotia at least, to send much of her lumber to the United States. I find that out of a total export of $20,484,746 worth of lumber we sent $9,353,506 worth, or nearly one-half of the total lumber export to the United States. We are not a very great agricultural Province in Nova Scotia but we have a surplus of agricultural produce to export from the country and do we send it to Ontario or Quebec? Not a bit of it. The hon. gentleman from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) is a farmer and I would like to know if he sends the products of his farm to Ontario or Quebec? I venture to say he never sent $100 worth, unless some hon. gentlemen in Canada bought some of his thoroughbred stock.

Gen. LAURIE. I send it to Newfoundland.

Mr. KIRK. Yes, he sends them to Newfoundland, but the Government here promised to give us an interprovincial trade, they promised that under the National Policy we would be able to send goods to Upper Canada as well as Ontario and Quebec sending goods down to us. We know the trade is all one way. We have heard a good deal about jug-handled free trade, but this is a jug-handled trade within the Dominion. We are obliged to buy goods at a dear rate and pay for them without sending anything to Ontario in return. Ontario imports about $600 worth of fish annually and according to Mr. Fairweather, of St. John, Ontario and Quebec take about $53,000 worth of fish from Nova Scotia.

Mr. HESSON. We take 650,000 tons of coal.

Mr. KIRK. I am talking of fish. I say that although Nova Scotia exports about $4,000,000 worth annually of fish, Ontario and Quebec only take about $53,000 or at most $60,000 worth. Of the $600,000 worth of fish imported to Ontario and Quebec the greater portion of it comes from the United States and not from Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said the other day that he had got an order from some firm in Prince Edward Island for $20,000 worth of buggy tops, and he thought the people were well off down there if they could afford that. He admitted that if there was not a higher tariff the people of Prince Edward Island would have gone to the United States. Why should they go to the United States if you could sell them in Canada as cheaply? They would not come here unless the high tariff forced them to come. The fact of the matter is the people of Nova Scotia are ground down between the upper and the nether millstone. We have a high tariff when we send our goods to the United States, and we meet a high tariff when we bring the goods back. The tariff is so high that we cannot afford to bring the goods back, but we have to bring the cash back in our pockets, and send it to Ontario to pay for those $20,000 worth of buggy tops and other goods which we are forced by this high tariff to take from Ontario.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is about as true as you generally put anything. I did not say I had got an order; I said a firm in Gananoque had got an order, and I said it was for top buggies.

Mr. KIRK. I just transposed the words.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is what you generally do.

Mr. KIRK. Instead of saying top buggies I said buggy tops, and I will say that it was a firm in Gananoque, of which I believe the hon. gentleman is president.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, he is not. He has nothing to do with it.

Mr. KIRK. I have been informed with regard to that that there was no order at all, but was simply a consignment sent down to an agent at Prince Edward Island of that amount of goods to be sold on commission.

Mr. TAYLOR. I can tell the hon. gentleman that that statement is not true.

Mr. KIRK. I did not say it is true. I said I was told that it was. Well that is the thing we complain of that we are forced by this high tariff to come 1,500 miles to get our goods when we ought to get them by stepping across the street and when you take nothing from us in return except our cash. Now, Sir, I find that the United States is a good market for our agricultural products. Canada exported to the United States last year, $2,214,338 worth of horses and to Great Britain only $38,230 worth, notwithstanding the fact that those we sent to the United States had to pay a duty of 20 per cent, while those we sent to England were admitted free. We imported from the United States only $100,115 worth of horses. Of horned cattle we sent to the United States last year 54,765 head, and imported only 1,192 head. Of sheep we exported to the United States 363,046 head, and imported, exclusive of British Columbia, only 9,182 head. Of eggs we exported to the United States last year $1,121,361 worth, and if there had been a duty on eggs, I venture to say we would not have exported that many. Now, the only industry in the Province of Nova Scotia which the National Policy has in the slightest degree benefited is the mining industry. Every other industry in the Province has been injuriously affected by that policy. I will admit at once that the duty on coal has benefited the coal industry there to some extent, but not to the extent claimed by the supporters of that policy. I say that this National Policy is simply making the people of Nova Scotia hewers of wood and drawers of water for the upper Provinces, nothing more and nothing less. When this policy of high protection was being advocated in this House, its advocates declared that its object was to force the United States to take off their duty, and it was declared on the floor of this House that if the United States would reciprocate in coal the eastern cities of the United States would be supplied by the coal mines of Nova Scotia, whilst Toronto and the other cities of Western Canada would be supplied by the United States. We were promised that if 50 cents a ton were placed on coal, we should get the markets of Quebec and Ontario for Nova Scotia coal. Here is what the Finance Minister said with regard to that matter:

"He believed that the effect of his policy would be to give free coal to both the United States and Canada at a very early date. The whole object of the imposition of the duty on the part of the United States would fall to the ground the moment Canada adopted a policy similar to theirs. Then the natural result would follow that the coal mines of Nova Scotia would supply the Atlantic States, and the coal mines of the United States would supply coals to Toronto and the western portions of Canada."

A duty of 50 cents a ton was placed on bituminous and anthracite coal; but hon. gentlemen have found that their policy has failed to accomplish what they pretended it would accomplish so far as coal was concerned—that it has not given the markets of Ontario to the Maritime Provinces; and what did they do? They took the duty off anthracite coal. It is true more coal has been sent from Nova Scotia to Quebec than formerly, but no coal is sent from Nova Scotia to Ontario at all. Ontario gets its coal from the United States, while at the same time we have not secured any of the markets of the United States for our coal. As early as 1865, under the Reciprocity Treaty, we exported to the United States 404,252 tons. Last year we exported only 73,892 tons. I am taking the calendar year in both cases; the last fiscal year gives 81,574 tons. The increased sales of coal in Nova Scotia, and they have largely increased, can be accounted for very largely without reference to the National Policy at all. We know perfectly well that about the time the National Policy was adopted the Intercolonial Railway was completed. It was only opened up in 1876, and at that time the Intercolonial Railway and all the other railroads in the eastern parts of the Dominion burned wood. Now they all burn coal. Then the villages and towns which were opened up by these railroads formerly burned wood, but to-day they burn coal. Many farmers now also burn coal who formerly burned nothing but wood. A large quantity of coal is also sold to steamers as bunker coal. I find that Ontario and Quebec imported last year 2,172,561 tons of coal, of which 1,207,870 were bituminous. In 1878, Ontario and Quebec imported 852,466 tons, and last year they imported 2,172,561. Why has not the National Policy operated as the Government claimed it would? Why has it not displaced this coal? We find that the coal market in Ontario and Quebec has increased in a much larger ratio than the sales of coal have increased in Nova Scotia; and the Government, recognising the fact that the National Policy had failed in its object, took the duty off anthracite coal. I now come to another important industry, the shipbuilding industry. There was a time when the Province of Nova Scotia boasted of having more ships per man than any other country in the world of the same population. It was our boast that the sails of her ships whitened every ocean, and we were told in 1874 by the Finance Minister, who was then leader of the Opposition, that a protective policy would have the effect of destroying the shipbuilding interests of the Maritime Provinces. He declared that a protective policy had swept the American flag from the seas. Well, it has had that effect, the very effect he predicted it would have, since it has been introduced in to this country. Here is what the Finance Minister said with regard to a protective duty and its effects upon the shipbuilding interests of the United States. He said:

"Let the hon. the Minister look at the neighboring republic, and he will find that the policy of that country has swept their flag off the seas, and given to others, the trade of the world. A protective policy would close down the shipyards in the Maritime Provinces."

Well, we had a thousand shipyards in the Maritime Provinces which have been closed up since the introduction of the National Policy. In 1865, Nova Scotia built 31,038 tons of shipping; in 1877, just previous to the adoption of the National Policy, Nova Scotia built 72,101 tons of shipping, and that industry began then to decline.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Iron ships.

Mr. KIRK. I know hon. gentlemen will say that the National Policy had nothing to do with the decline of shipbuilding, but that it is to be attributed altogether to iron ships. I admit the latter have had something to do with it, but not all. Were there no iron ships previous to 1874 and 1877? It is only nine years since the National Policy was introduced, and the effect of the change was to reduce the shipbuilding trade from 72,101 to 14,266 tons last year, or a decrease of 57,755 tons.

An hon. MEMBER. Prove it.

Mr. KIRK. Let the hon. gentleman look at the report. If the National Policy has had nothing to do with it, ask the Finance Minister what is the cause of the decline? I am not called upon to prove that fact. We have heard a great deal about the number of men who have obtained employment in the factories since the introduction of the National Policy, but what does this amount to in comparison with the number of men who have been thrown out of employment by the destruction of the shipbuilding industry in this country. Last year we built 57,735 tons of shipping less than in 1877, and if you take the nominal value of that shipping what will it amount to? Say the value is about $40 per ton, we find more men thrown out of employment in this one industry than are engaged in the manufactures of the whole Dominion altogether. How many men are employed in the manufactures of Canada? I have taken the figures from the statistics prepared by the statistician, and I find he gives the number of operatives at 5,848. Well, I will venture to say it would take more than 10,000 men to build 57,000 tons of shipping. Therefore I maintain that whilst the Government have perhaps increased the member of operatives in the manufactures by some 2,000 or 3,000, they have thrown out of employment by the destruction of this one industry more than three times that number. I have no desire to detain the House any longer at this late hour. Had I the opportunity of speaking earlier I would possibly have touched upon other features of this question, but I shall not do so just now. I have only to say that I heartily coincide in the resolution moved by my hon. friend for South Oxford and that I do not believe in the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. What is the resolution? That amendment reads as follows:

"That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since receive in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people."

It is as clear as anything can be that that resolution means that we are to have no reciprocity at all, not even in the natural resources of the country. Do we not find that gentlemen on the other side of the House declare that this National Policy has fostered not only the manufacturing industries but the agricultural industries of the country? We find hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia declaring that the National Policy has fostered the mining interests of the country; they claim that it has fostered the whole of the interests of the country, and, therefore, this resolution declares that we are to adhere to that policy which fosters all the interests of the country; and I think it may be assumed that it is only when the Government cannot resist the pressure from the United States that we may ever expect to have any reciprocity on any other article that we have not reciprocity on now. For that reason, I am entirely opposed to the amendment of the Minister of Marine, and I shall, with great pleasure, vote, not only for the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but also for the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), because I believe that if anything can be done for the shipbuilding interest, in order to restore it to something like the position it was in before the National Policy was introduced, it will be by a reciprocal coasting trade with the United States and by our having a right to reciprocally register our vessels.

Mr. PLATT—

"The breath of night's destructive to the hue of every flower that blows, Go to the field and ask the humble daisy why it sleeps
Ere the pale moon her oriental veil puts off.
Think why, nor let the forest flower which nature boasts
Be exposed to night's unkindly damp.
Well may it droop and all its freshness lose
Compelled to taste the rank and poisonous air
Of midnight theatre and morning ball."

I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

28-1888-7

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this is the maiden speech of the hon. gentleman since he went to his constituents, I think the courtesy of the House requires that a member addressing it for the first time after his election should have a fair show.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to proceeding with the few remarks which I intend to make. It was out of compassion for the House and for yourself, Mr. Speaker, that I moved the adjournment. I do not think it wise or consistent with the deliberations of this assembly that we should be compelled to sit to this early hour in the morning, when I am certain that this debate would close at as early an hour this afternoon if we were to adjourn as if we went on. I am certain that most of the members assembled here now will agree with me that, at the close of every long continued debate, our proceedings are not conducted with that amount of decorum, with that amount of solemnity, I may say that with that amount of dignity that would befit an assembly of this kind. We understand the reason why this course is adopted, but I ask hon. members to recollect that, behind and beyond us there is an audience that is listening to the debates of this assemblage, an audience that is weighing the remarks which we make here, and which is perhaps more deeply interested in the result of this discussion than we may seem to be ourselves; and I think that, notwithstanding the pressure which is brought to bear upon us to continue this discussion even at this hour of the morning, it should be continued with that degree of decorum and that respect for the people whom we represent and whose interests we are attempting to subserve here on this occasion which—

Mr. LAURIER. If my hon. friend will excuse me, I would suggest to the First Minister that at this hour of the morning we might adjourn, and might possibly come to some understanding to close the debate this afternoon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course it is getting very late, or rather very early, and, if we can come to a positive understanding that the vote will be taken at the next sitting to-day, we might adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. There are a good many members on this side of the House who would be anxious to speak, but we think that this debate has been already sufficiently protracted, and we are ready to come to a vote at the next sitting of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think under that understanding we may adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3.30 a.m. (Friday).

Mackenzie's time at all comparable in importance to those of Garrett's boot manufactory, Silver's boot manufactory, the Wilson and the Gardner sewing machine factories, the Canada Clock factory, the Olmstead foundry and the Burn-Robinson manufactory, all of which have taken place under the much-vaunted National Policy and the beneficent régime of Sir John Macdonald whom you worship? Dare you deny, Mr. Brown, that the mercantile failures, both in the wholesale and retail lines, in your own city, have been more numerous and disastrous under the Tilley tariff than under the Cartwright tariff? Are there not more bankrupt stocks now upon the market than at any time when Mr. Mackenzie was in office? Are not many of your fellow-citizens, Mr. Brown, who were rich and independent in Mackenzie's time, now chronically hard up, owing to unremunerative investments in National Policy factories and North-West land speculations fostered by the policy of your dear John A.?

"Knowing as much as you know, Mr. Brown, about the woes and calamities which the protective tariff and Tory misrule in general have brought upon your constituents, it requires a deal of assurance for you to stand up in Parliament and repeat that old speech."

I fancy that you will agree with me, Sir, that that quotation is perfectly in order, because it substantiates the line of argument which I have been pursuing all through, namely, that the National Policy has not operated to the benefit of the workingmen of this country or of the merchants of this country, or of any class of the community, except a few manufacturers who still believe that they are unable to compete in the foreign markets of the world with those who are opposed to them in the same lines of business. Should the claims of 657,287 farmers for fairplay be ignored for the benefit of 2,390 manufacturers. It is admitted on all hands; it is admitted by the First Minister and Finance Minister, and by the Secretary of State, who declared yesterday that it was almost a sin on the parts of the Liberals to have taken up this policy. The policy, he said, would be popular all over the Dominion. Yes, the policy is one which the people are going to adopt, and the Government know right well that should this policy be taken up by the Reform party, it will carry them to victory at the next elections. It must be evident to every reasonable mind that where the interests of the great mass of the people are concerned, the great mass of the people would be guilty of great folly if they did not adopt a system with regard to their trade relations with the United States which would be of practical benefit to them. I would like to dwell longer on the case of the farmers, because I represent the farmers almost exclusively, but I will just say this, that it is admitted on all hands unrestricted reciprocity would be a great boon. We know that when we had reciprocity from 1854 to 1866, our trade increased from $33,000,000 to $34,000,000 in those years. Take the case of barley alone. Last year we exported 9,447,717 bushels, valued at $5,245,000; and the farmers of Canada, according to the contention of the First Minister, lost no less than $943,000 of hard earned money which was extracted out of their pockets by virtue of the tariff imposed on our barley by the United States. This duty we have reason will be removed if we will approach the United States Government in the spirit which ought to actuate us in dealing with this great question. Then we exported to the States last year 18,225 horses, which were valued at $2,214,338, and the paid duty on those horses amounted to $142,000. I will not quote any further items, but in those two items the farmers of Canada lost $1,385,000 and we have the word of the First Minister of the Crown that this statement is true. With regard to the manufacturers, I will not admit that all the manufacturers are in favor of the continuance of the National Policy. I believe that the National Policy has not been conducive to the best interests of many of the manufacturers of this country, because it must be remembered that the raw material of one manufacturer is not the raw material of another manufacturer, and the manufacturers have been weighted down to an enormous extent by the protective tariff on the raw material. I might give you one instance to substantiate this statement. Last year the Finance Minister brought down his Budget and increased the iron duties to an enormous extent, and we have the evidence which was given before the Combines Committee of this House by Mr. Massey, one of the largest agricultural implement manufacturers in Canada, that the increased iron duties imposed by this Government on his business last year alone amounted to $30,000. That is to say, he had to pay $30,000 more on the iron which entered into the manufacture of his reaping and mowing machines than he had in previous years. Who pays for this? There can be no doubt at all that the consumer, that the farmer pays this addition to the burdens which are borne by Mr. Massey.

Mr. GUILLET. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Massey stated before the Committee that he paid $30,000 more duty?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. So I understand. I was not present at the Committee, but I was informed by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), who is a member of that Committee, that that was the statement made by Mr. Massey before the Committee. I give my authority, and I think it is a good authority. I do not like to trespass on the time of the House, but I desire to make a statement in regard to the assertion which has been made that, in former times, under a revenue tariff, this country was made a slaughter market for the manufactures of the United States. The facts do not bear that statement out. The results which have been developed under the benign influence of this great panacea that was offered to the country in 1878, which was to cure all the ills of Canada and was to make every man rich within its bounds, show that the Americans still continue to slaughter their goods in the Canadian market, and that they have increased the slaughtering process. Canada has not been kept for the Canadians, as was promised by the First Minister and his supporters in 1878. Canada has, to a large extent, been kept for the people of the United States. I have here a statement of the value of the imports and the duty paid upon them, coming from the United States in 1877 and in 1887, and it is as follows:—

I may remark, by-the-by, that, in the city of Hamilton, which is represented by the hon. gentleman to whom I referred before, after the National Policy was started, they got up a joint stock company to build clocks. They thought, by the extraordinary protection afforded them against the United States, they would be able to build up a first-class paying establishment. What was the history of that establishment? From the day it was commenced, although the parties to it put in all the capital which was necessary to carry it to a successful issue, notwithstanding that they had engaged the best skilled artisans that could be obtained on the American continent, that factory went from bad to worse year after year, until about a year ago it became entirely bankrupt, and I believe the men who invested their money in that enterprise lost every cent that went to make up the capital stock. That is an evidence of the way in which the National Policy has fostered our industry. In regard to this last item of oil, I would advise the First Minister to make a bargain with the manufacturers of petroleum to furnish enough lubricating oil to lubricate up his National Policy, and make it more useful to the people of this country than it has been during the last ten years. Now, it is claimed that these infant manufacturers are not able to stand alone, that they ought to be spoon-fed at the expense of the great mass of the people of this country. I do not think that it is a creditable position, as has already been remarked, for any of these manufacturers to take, and I am glad to say that there are scores and hundreds of manufacturers, possessed of sufficient enterprise, and capital, and energy, and perseverance, and ability to compete in the fair markets of the world with their opponents, men of business, who are not afraid to enter into competition with their opponents. The National Policy is not conducive to the carrying on of trade with foreign countries, because we know that the United States, under their protective tariff, have ruined the shipping of that country, and have destroyed their intercourse with other nations. But even against that assumption that high protective duties are not conducive to trade with other countries, we find that there is one Canadian manufacturer who is opening a market for himself in foreign countries. I will read an extract from the Brantford Expositor of 17th March, in regard to a cotton mill that has been established there for some years:

"For over four years the Craven cotton mill, like every other cotton mill in Canada, has not run near its full capacity——"

There is the same old story again;

—"on account of the producing having got so far ahead of the consuming power of the country. This has been a great loss to stockholders and work people. We are glad to say that the future prospects of the cotton industry are much brighter, owing to the opening out of new markets which will take all the surplus production of the mills in Canada. Mr. Slater having sold through a New York house 500 bales of cotton sheetings to be shipped direct from Brantford to Shanghai, China, the Craven Mill will start full blast on Monday next, as they have to commence delivery of these goods in April. The Hochelaga mills, Montreal, and Kingston cotton mills have also taken large orders for the same market."

Now, this shows that the Canadian manufacturer can compete, dares to compete, with his opponents in the markets of the world. This shows that even in New York, the commercial metropolis of the United States, a business man was found who was desirous of purchasing Canadian cottons in preference to Yankee made goods. He gave the preference to Canadian cotton, because, I suppose, it was a better quality of goods, and because it could be manufactured at less cost than he could get it at home; and this is a fair sample of what the manufacturers of this country could do if they would stand up like men, like British men, who are prepared to say that they will face the world in fair competition, and ask no favor in a fair field. Now, Sir, I contend that protection has not even benefited the manufacturers. It has created a desire to become rich, as the leader of the Government said he was going to make the people rich in 1878; he was going to make every man in the country rich. I tell you, Sir, that if there is one man in the Dominion of Canada who is an adept at humbugging the people it is the talented leader of the Government at the present time. He knows how to do it. He has set a good example to the politicians of this country; he has shown them how to manipulate the voters of this country for his own interest. He told them that he was going to make them all rich, and a desire to make themselves rich caused the people of this country to make over-investments in every line of manufactures, and it brought about the natural result of combinations, and we find that almost every manufacturing industry in this country is a party to a combine of one kind or another, to keep up the prices and restrict production; and if they restrict production, then to reduce the value of the labor, of the employes in their manufactories, to make the workman poor at the expense of the rich. I contend, Sir, that I have proven beyond a doubt that the National Policy has not been a benefit to the people of this country. Then, as to the general principle of the protection. There was an admirable exposition given of the principles of protection by Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, at Fremont Temple, Boston, the other day. I shall trespass on the good nature of the House so far as to read a short extract from it, as in it is embodied the true character of protection, and shows to the people the absurdity of any action attempting to build up the prosperity of a nation by means of a protective tariff. Mr. Wheeler said:

"The monstrous absurdity of the protective system is simply this: That it really asserts that scarcity is better than abundance; that it is an injury to you to trade with other countries; that the benefits which flow from the free exchange of merchandise with Pennsylvania and Illinois would not flow from the exchange of commodities with England and with France. Who can tell me why it is not as good for a man who earns his living in Massachusetts to be able to buy English goods or French goods, if he likes, and to be able in return to sell American goods to the people of France or England if he likes? If we trade with them it is because they have goods that we want and we have goods that they want, and thus the trade is a benefit to us both. The protectionists themselves admit that trade with foreign countries is a benefit to America. For they deplore the decay of American shipping, and are proposing to give a bounty to American ships for carrying the products of other countries to this country, and for taking ours back in return. What monstrous inconsistency! They enact a high tariff, far in excess of the needs of revenue, not for the purpose of taxation, but for the purpose of excluding the goods of other countries; and then, having crippled commerce with one hand, they propose to nurse it with the other."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a good exemplification of the result of the operation of protection. I might just say here, in passing, that if it is not good for us to trade with the Americans and to deal with our neighbors, what sense is there in the Government appointing a Commissioner, with a view to establishing trade with the West Indies and the Argentine Republic? I think it may not be out of place to say that the gentleman entrusted with this mission is a hanger-on of the Government; he wanted something, and he has got it. I understand he has gone down to the Argentine Republic on a pleasure trip. I fancy his labors there will be just as productive to the people of this country as the results of similar missions in former times. And the loyalty cry comes in here. I am afraid to touch it, for I generally get out of order when I speak of loyalty. They say it is not loyal to trade with the United States and have a tariff against Great Britain. Yet these same men have had a higher tariff against Great Britain, at least they have levied a larger amount of duties on the goods coming in from Great Britain than on the goods coming in from the United States under the present tariff. Here are the figures:

|--|--------------|
| Total imports from Great Britain in 1887... | $44,962,233 |
| Duty collected on same..... | 9,318,920 |
| Average rate of duty | 20·7 |
| Total imports from the United States in 1887 | $45,107,036 |
| Duty collected on same..... | 7,299,591 |
| Average rate of duty..... | 16·3 |

They do not wish to discriminate against their manufactures—it would be disloyal for the people of this country to favor our neighbors across the line; and yet, while they have the hardihood to make such a statement, they have been discriminating against Great Britain all the time by this tariff which injures the commercial and the well-being of this country. It is claimed that a high protective tariff is in favor of the workingman, and that he does not pay the taxes. I desire to show by an extract from the blue books that the large proportion of taxes levied in this country is paid by the workingman. I find that on baking powder imported last year there was a duty paid of $20,628. A poor man has to use baking powder, he cannot have salt-raised bread all the time, and he must have something to puff up his pastry just as much as the bloated bondholder to whom the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson) referred, or even a manufacturer. On blacking and shoemakers' ink, $13,822. A workingman must have his shoes blacked as well as the aristocrat. Then there are Bibles and prayer books, $132,403. Hon. gentlemen opposite have even to tax Bibles and prayer books, which are intended to make the people of this country religious. Then there is laundry blue, $8,683. A poor man cannot even have a starched shirt without paying an amount into the treasury. Boot and stay laces, &c., $40,524. Why, the ladies cannot even have their stays laced without paying duty. Breadstuffs, $4,450. Carpets, $322,681. I suppose a workingman is allowed to have a carpet in his best room, but he has to contribute to the revenue for that article. Clocks and springs, $46,814. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that workingmen have more need of clocks than rich people. A workingman has to rise at a certain hour in the morning, and where I live when the hands go down to the cotton factory—when it is at work and when it is running full time—they go down early in the morning and they are obliged to have alarm clocks. Cottons, $1,389,369. Coal and coke, $1,178,964. Collars, cuffs and shirt fronts, $37,574. I suppose the shirt fronts are used by workingmen—gentlemen have full shirts. Coffee, $13,163. Drugs, dyes and medicines, $330,365. Why, a workingman cannot even get sick without having to pay duty. Earthenware and china, $226,685. Fish, $86,098. Fruit and nuts, $156,079. Gloves and mits of all kinds, $124,326. Hat boxes and bonnets, $322,908. Leather and manufactures of, exclusive of gloves and mits, $345,849. Coal oil and kerosene products, $343,944. Paper and manufactures, $315,019. Plants and trees, $18,882. By the way the Government have taken the duties off trees, under pressure. Butter, cheese, lard and meats, $267,852. I thought they were going to keep our markets for Canadian produce. Salt, $12,655. Seeds and roots, $60,052. That is taken off too. Soap, $36,414. Why, a workingman cannot even wash his face and keep himself clean without paying an enormous duty to keep up the extravagance of the Government. Spices, $37,000. Sugar, $3,167,528. That is to keep up these bloated monopolists—I make this as a quotation, and I do not think I am out of order—who in a few years can make sufficient fortune to go to the old country and buy a castle and palatial residence and immense grounds, and live there at the expense of the people of this country, live there out of the riches they have heaped up for themselves here and which they have dragged out of the pockets of the hard-working tax-payers of Canada. Molasses, $92,516. Workingmen cannot even have molasses without paying an enormous duty. I find also that workingmen cannot smoke the pipe of peace with those manufacturers for whom he slaves day in and day out, in order to enrich them, without paying an enormous duty. No less than $305,515 duty was paid on tobacco. And then we have vegetables, $46,178. We thought vegetables were to be grown in the country. We have wood and its manufactures, $314,098; watches, $99,439, and woollen manufactures, $2,373,240. That shows who pays the taxes. It is all nonsense for hon. gentlemen on the other side to get up and tell the workmen, the farmers, the mechanics and the operatives of this country that they do not pay the taxes. They do pay the taxes, and they are bled every day of their lives, in order to uphold this Government and in order to uphold the manufacturers in this country. Now, I do not wish to talk on the loyalty question, as I said before. You know that Artemus Ward once said "that a man must be a mighty limited cuss if he couldn't build himself up without pulling his neighbor down." Now I do not apply that to the gentlemen on the other side, but I say there are gentlemen on that side who are mighty limited, and I think that is enough for me to say. I would just conclude by saying, Sir, that I have great pleasure in voting for this resolution, and it affords me great pleasure to say that I am in favor of the adoption by this House and by the people of the country of the resolution which has been introduced by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am also in favor of the amendment which is proposed to be added thereto in favor of the encouragement of the coasting trade of the Canadian people. I think, Sir, it would be a grand thing for this Canada of ours, a country which every Canadian has a right to be proud of, a country which we cannot boast too much of with regard to its extent, its resources, its capacity and its wealth. I say, Sir, as Canadians we have a right to be proud of our country. I am proud of our country, but I am not proud of the gentlemen who govern the country, and I hope to live to see the day when we shall have, directing the affairs of this country, men who will conserve the interest of the people more closely than the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have conserved their interests since they introduced the National Policy. I have great pleasure in saying that I vote for this resolution, because I think that it is in the interests of the great mass of the people of this country. I wish to oppose every legislation that is in favor of a special class. Class legislation ought to be a thing of the past, and it ought to be the duty of this Government as well as of the Government of every free and enlightened country on the face of the globe, to legislate in the interests of the great mass of the people and not to legislate for 2,390 manufacturers at the expense of the millions of people in this country who are taxed for their benefit. I therefore say, Sir, that I have great pleasure in voting for the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Mr. Speaker, I am sure, Sir, you will be glad to know, and the House will be pleased to learn, that I do not intend to occupy your time at any considerable length. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down must, I think, have imagined that he was addressing a meeting in his own constituency from some public platform where he desired to make an impression against the Government of the day, and in support of the party with which he is connected. That hon. gentleman, upon the present occasion, has endeavored to show, as hon. gentlemen upon that side of the House have during the nine years since the present Administration came into power, have endeavored to show the reasons for the support given by the people of this country to the hon. gentleman who leads the Government on this side of the House. He has endeavored, as they have endeavored, both in this House and out of it, to try and account for the support given to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and against those on the other side of the House. They have tried to explain this by every reason except the true one. They endeavored to account for it as this hon. gentleman did to-night, upon the ground that the leader of the Government had corrupted the people, upon the ground that the Government of the country was corrupt, and upon every possible ground except the true one, which is that the people of this country are in favor of the Conservative party and against the Liberal party in Canada. Why, Sir, are they in favor of the Conservative party and opposed to the Liberal party in Canada? Is it because that the Liberal party during the time they were in office from 1874 to 1878 governed the country in the interests of the people of Canada? Is it not rather to be conceived that it is because the people of Canada have judged the two parties by their records? Judging the party upon the opposite side of the House by their record during the time they were in office, from 1874 to 1878, and judging the Conservative party by their record during the long series of years which they have governed this country, the people have come to the conclusion that, in the interests of the people of Canada, the Conservative party should be retained in power and that those hon. gentlemen should be kept in the place they at present occupy. The gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, since the present Administration returned to office in 1879, have been endeavoring to discover some policy that would make them acceptable to the people of Canada. They have devoted themselves during those years to a very great extent to decrying their opponents, and finding that after the two elections, in 1884 and 1887, that the mere detraction of their opponents did not succeed in bringing them the support of the people of Canada, they are endeavoring now to bring forward some policy that from their point of view will be instrumental in relegating them to the Treasury benches on this side of the House. Sir, I did not think that I would have addressed the House upon this occasion even the few words I propose to offer for your consideration but for the fact that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who introduced this resolution based it upon the ground that certain classes of the people in this country were suffering under the present and existing state of things. He laid great stress upon the fact that the farmers of this country and the lumbermen, and the miners, and the artisans were suffering, and that it was necessary to provide some remedy for the great evil under which the country was groaning at the present time. I, Sir, represent a constituency in which we are interested in the successful prosecution of two of those industries, at least the successful prosecution of farming and lumbering, and I think I shall give good reasons why I shall vote against the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I do not propose to offer for the consideration of this House any long array of figures. We have had since the commencement of this discussion long arrays of figures presented to this House and we have had those figures brought up in battalions, and in squadrons, and in companies. They have been hurled from one side of the House to the other against an innocent and unoffending House of Commons. I shall therefore to-night not use any more figures than I consider necessary (and that will be very few indeed) for the purpose of illustrating the few arguments which I propose to present for your consideration. Let me say also, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion—and I have always found from observation that my opinion is correct—that there is not the greatest possible reliance to be placed upon the statistics that are quoted in Parliament and out of it. Especially let me say that from my observation I am convinced that the statistics which are furnished by Mr. Blue, the statistician of the Province of Ontario, are not wholly and entirely reliable. I say that, Sir, because I believe that the conditions which prevail in my own constituency must prevail to a very great extent throughout at least the whole Province of Ontario; and when I find it stated, it has been stated during the progress of this discussion, that the value of farm lands in the Province of Ontario, according to Mr. Blue, rose from $10.02 an acre in 1873 to $18.14 in 1878, an advance of $8.12 during those five years, and that the same farm lands only increased from $18.14 in 1878 to $19.71 in 1885, I am convinced from facts which have come under my own observation that those statements cannot be based on fact. I know as a matter of fact that farm lands in my own county from 1873 to 1871 materially decreased in value, and that it was almost impossible in 1878 to dispose of a farm at all, or if any were sold they could only be sold at a ruinous price, while to-day they are worth three or four times what they could be purchased for in 1878. I know, in addition to that, that large sums of money, amounting to tens, and I might say hundreds of thousands of dollars, which were borrowed on mortgages on the lands in my county, have been paid off since this dreaded and detested National Policy has come into force. I know also, for I have the records in my hand, that the assessed value of property in my country rose from $2,200,000 in 1875 to $4,515,000 in 1887. Having all these facts before me, as well as those that come under my daily observation, I cannot believe it possible that the farmers of this country are in the dire state of distress which hon. gentlemen declare them to be in. It is because I do not believe they are suffering any such distress that I do not consider it necessary to apply what these gentlemen call this heroic remedy at the present time. I believe the farmers of Canada are capable of holding their own in the race for subsistence which is going on throughout the world. Although I am quite free to admit that the lumbermen of Canada would be benefited to some extent by the entire removal of the duties of lumber, yet when I look at the records of the prices obtained for timber lands, especially in the Province of Ontario, I am forced to the conclusion that the lumbermen are not suffering those great injuries which hon. gentlemen opposite say they are suffering at the present time. I presume that the best test of the condition of our lumber trade during the past fifteen years is the increase or decrease in the value of timber lands. Let me tell you that the lumbermen are not fools; they know pretty well what they are doing, and they are not likely to pay an increased price for timber lands unless they expect to secure a return for what they pay. Let me, then, give you the prices of timber lands, as ascertained by the auction sales that have taken place in the Province of Ontario. During the last fourteen years there have been three large sales of timber lands in that Province. The first took place in 1872, when the average price obtained was $200 per square mile. Another sale took place in 1881, shortly after the present Government came into power, when the price obtained was $600 per square mile. In 1886, after this improvident and corrupt Government had been in office for a number of years, the third sale took place, when, notwithstanding the fact that a short time before the stampage dues were increased 33½ per cent., and the ground rents were increased 50 per cent., you would hardly believe it, but the price obtained was $2,957.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very much to Mr. Mowat's credit.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am not aware, Sir, that the fact that lumbermen were able to pay a larger price in 1886 than they were in 1872 is any evidence of great ability on the part of Mr. Mowat. It may be a fact that Mr. Mowat secured those high prices by submitting the lands to public auction; it may be that he is entitled to some credit for that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He got the cash—that is better than the credit.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). He got the cash, that is quite true; but I am sure my hon. friend from South Oxford will agree with me that in the figures I have submitted to the House, and which he will not deny, there is no evidence that the lumbermen are suffering to any great extent. I listened to day to the hon. member for Bothwell making a statement in regard to the importation of raw material and manufactured goods, and I dare say he thought he was making a great impression on the House when he told us that while he thought it was quite proper from our point of view that a horse should be imported free of duty, he thought it would be contrary to the constitution that the harness to be used on that horse should be imported free. I am sure my hon. friend must have forgotten the discussions that have taken place with regard to the National Policy in this House during the last ten years, or he would have known that what we contended on this side of the House was that by the adoption of the National Policy we would keep in Canada the manufacture of those articles that were consumed in Canada, and that the wages that would otherwise go to employees in the United States would be paid in Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that my point was this: Hon gentlemen on that side of the House say that unrestricted reciprocity would lead to the annexation of Canada to the United States, but they say that reciprocity in natural products would not have that effect; and I was pointing out that while the free admission of a horse from the United States would not injure the constitution, the free admission of harness from the United States would overturn the constitution and put an end to our autonomy.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would just say, in regard to that, that I am actuated to some considerable extent, I confess quite freely, in regard to the vote I shall give on the question before the House, by what those gentlemen are pleased to call sentiment. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has said that it would injure the constitution and would make annexation imminent if we were to allow manufactured goods to come to Canada, while the constitution would be in danger if natural products were allowed to come in Canada to free. Let me point out what I conceive to be the distinction between those two things. These hon. gentlemen have told us, time and again, during the course of this discussion, that we have already discriminated against Great Britain in our tariff. I say that proposition cannot be sustained. I say that our tariff is the same against Great Britain as against all the other countries in the world. But what do these hon. gentlemen propose now to do? They propose to admit free into Canada from the United States the same class of articles as those on which we charge a duty coming from the mother country. Do we import any horses from the mother country, or any hides? Do we import any natural products from Great Britain? No, it is the manufactured goods of Great Britain that come into this country subject to a duty, which, under this resolution, would not be imposed upon the same goods coming into Canada from a foreign country. It is that which renders it, to my mind, dangerous that we should adopt any such proposition, and which leads me to the conclusion that any policy which would discriminate against the mother country in favor of a foreign country would inevitably lead us to annexation. It is because I believe the inevitable result of the policy the hon. gentleman proposes would be annexation that I am opposed to the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. Hon. gentlemen opposite have told us, time and again, during this discussion, of their loyalty and attachment to the crown of Great Britain, and yet we have heard them, at the same time, excuse themselves for supporting the resolution now before the House, on the ground that they love Canada more than Great Britain. I have yet to learn that any subject of Great Britain finds it detrimental to him to be connected with that country or to treat with that country. If I were to believe the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to-day, that England was neither able nor willing to help us in any emergency that might arise, I would at once say that it would be our bounden duty either to become independent or to connect ourselves with the United States; and if I believe it was impossible for us to live on this continent without adopting a policy which would place a foreign country in a better position towards Canada in regard to our trade than the mother country occupies, I would at once say: let us not only have commercial intercourse with that foreign country, but let us adopt a policy that will give us some influence in its political affairs, and not become a mere dependency of it, as we would if the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford were adopted. I hope that the time is far distant, I hope that I shall never live to see the time when it will become necessary for us to adopt any such policy. I believe it is possible for us to maintain our autonomy, and that we need not become a dependency of the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed out that from the adoption of the reciprocity treaty in 1854 down to its abrogation in 1866, our trade with the United States increased very materially. Well, taking the articles that were included in that treaty and looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, of which Provinces I am now speaking more particularly, I find that whilst our aggregate trade with the United States increased very materially during these years, there were in different years very great variations in the trade between the two countries. For instance, you will find that exports of the forest and the farm to the United States in the first full year under reciprocity amounted to $20,000,000, and those exports fell three years afterwards to $11,000,000, and so we will find, going through the whole of the list, which I will not trouble the House with reading, that both during the existence of the reciprocity treaty, from 1854 to 1866, and since its abrogation, the export trade from Canada to United States has very greatly varied. One year it would be very considerable and the next year drop $5,000,000, $6,000,000 or $10,000,000. As I have already stated, I believe it is impossible for us to maintain our autonomy; I believe it is possible for us to exist, and that we ought not to adopt a policy which would make us a dependency of a foreign country, and which would give us no influence in the political affairs of that country while losing control over our own; and it is because of that belief that I propose to vote against the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not propose, considering the length to which this debate has been protracted, to prolong it to any considerable extent. At the same time, considering the importance of the question, I am not prepared to give a silent vote. The subject is one which, I believe, demands from the First Minister of the Crown an expression of opinion on the floor of Parliament. Had the circumstances permitted, I think we should have had an expression of opinion from the hon. the Finance Minister, but when he was unable, through circumstances beyond his control, to give the House and the country the benefit of his views upon this question, it was more than ever incumbent on his seniors in the Cabinet to have placed their views upon record. They have not seen fit to do so. But three members of the Cabinet, at different stages of the debate, ventured to commit themselves. The last Minister of the Cabinet who spoke, the Secretary of State, made a most extraordinary statement, one that does not commend itself, at all events, to my mind. He took the position that, no matter what the facts were, no matter what the statistics established, no matter what the arguments proved, no matter what interests were involved, they all counted for nothing if the sentiment of the country was with him. What he had in view was the votes of the people and not the interests of the people, and he delivered what he considered an infallible judgment at once, when he said: the people are not with you on this occasion. Where, he asked, are the petitioners? Where are the expressions of opinion for or against the proposition? He got one of his answers to-day, when Prince Edward county spoke. Could there be a better evidence of the will of the people than the verdict rendered at the polls, and should this debate continue a few days longer, another would be given in the person of the representative of Missisquoi, who was recently elected on this very issue in a constituency that a few months ago gave at the polls a Conservative majority, and which to-day rendered a verdict in favor of this proposition by some hundreds of a majority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the majority?

Mr. MITCHELL. Two hundred and six.

Mr. MULOCK. I saw it stated in the press that the majority was something over 200. I have not seen the official returns. We had another election the other day in L'Assomption, which had been carried by a Liberal, at the general election, by a majority of twenty-one. I am told that this trade question was the leading issue in that contest, and that it turned entirely upon it, and the result was that the people of that county, by 400 or 500 per cent. over the previous majority, returned a member in favor of the proposition which is now before the House. Surely, in face of these facts, the Secretary of State need not assert that there is no evidence before the House of the feeling of the country on this question. We had the benefit of the opinion of the Minister of the Interior, who is always ready to fill a gap; who is always ready to take charge of any question; who has a certain number of good stock speeches on hand that can be brought out on all occasions, whether they fill the bill or not, and I think he drew on some of his old supplies on this occasion. I think I have often read that speech which he delivered, thought he had burnished it up a little, but it was not new to us. I believe he only delivered it forty times in the Province during the last electoral contest, and he delivered it well, seeing how few opportunities he had had to practise it. What argument did he advance against this proposition? He admitted the right of Canada to do what it is proposed to do. He admitted that it might be to the interest of Canada to do what this resolution proposes shall be done, but he took the ground that we should not be mean enough to legislate in a way that might not conserve the interests of England. Then we had the benefit of the opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and what was his argument against this proposition? His argument was that there was no such thing as a natural market, that markets could be made by the expenditure of money and of energy, and that no natural markets were to be found on the earth, that markets were artificial creations, and he pointed to the United States, and said that, even if we did get free trade with the United States, they were producers of the very things that we would produce, and therefore we would find no market there. It is too late for one to indulge in mere opinion, but I will trouble the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with some brief statistics, which I think will convince him, or which ought to convince him, that trade does find a natural level, in spite of many obstructions, artificial and natural. He referred to the trade of Europe, and I have turned up the trade returns of the leading countries in Europe, those on the west and those in the centre. I did not get the trade of Russia simply because there are no trade returns from that country to be found. If you take the trade of Spain for the year 1886, you will find that one-third of the whole volume of the trade of that country was with one of its neighbors, France, although France, as my hon. friend knows, produces many of the very same articles that Spain exported to France. If you turn to Germany, you find that last year Germany did 48 per cent. of the whole volume of her trade with her actual neighbors, with those countries which are in actual contiguity with her, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Austria and Denmark. If you turn to Norway, the same story is told. Norway did 48 per cent. of her whole trade with her three neighbors, Sweden, Denmark and Great Britain. I claim that Great Britain may be treated as a neighbor of Norway, although there is a narrow strip of water between the countries. Italy transacted 56 per cent. of her whole trade with France, Algeria, Austria and Switzerland. France transacted 56 per cent. of her trade with England, Belgium, Switzerland and Italy. Portugal transacted 58 per cent. of her trade last year with three countries, Spain, France and Great Britain. Belgium had 66 per cent. of her trade with France, the Netherlands, Germany and Great Britain. The Netherlands did 72 per cent. of their whole trade with Prussia, Belgium and Great Britain. Austria transacted over 80 per cent. of her whole trade last year with her neighbors, Germany, Russia, Italy, Roumania, Switzerland and Great Britain. When you come to this continent, if you take the Republic of Mexico, you find that over 60 per cent. of its whole trade was with one neighbor, the United States of America. If you take the trade of Canada for 1887, you find that over 40 per cent. of our whole trade was with our neighbor, the United States. We sold last year to the United States over $37,000,000 worth of the products of Canada, notwithstanding the obstructions in the way of that trade by reason of the high tariff existing in the United States. Had that tariff not prevailed, I think we may fairly assume that our trade with the United States would have been vastly more during the past year than it was. These illustrations, which I have furnished from the trade of Europe, it is to be borne in mind, are in regard to countries which are separated from each other by many differences—differences of language, in some cases tariffs, prejudices and other obstructions to the free flow and interchange of trade. I think, therefore, that, with these illustrations from Europe and from this continent as well I have clearly established the proposition that there is such a thing on the earth as a natural market, and that that natural market is the nearest market geographically to the country that is seeking to trade. If you look at the trade which Canada has done with the whole world during the past year, you find that, with all the efforts we have been putting out, having established connections with all parts of the civilised world, we have only been only able to sell $7,000,000 worth of the products of Canada to all the nations of the earth with the exception of the United States and Great Britain. We sold last year to the United States five times as much in value of our products as we sold to all other countries in the world, Great Britain alone excepted. Does not that teach us a lesson? Can we not draw inferences from those facts? Will any philosophy enable us to say in a sensible, truthful way, that trade does not assert itself on geographical lines, and follow as nearly as possible the natural directions indicated? If not, how comes it that all these nations I have referred to confine so much of their trade to their near neighbors? I think there can be but one deduction drawn from it, and that is, that if we do not interpose obstacles, trade does naturally seek the nearest market. In Canada what is the nearest market? We sell, first of all, to ourselves,—we have our domestic trade. The vast bulk of the trade of this country is at home amongst the people, and the surplus, following the principle of selling in the nearest market, if it is the best, finds the nearest market, which is always the best, and that, in our own case, in the market of the United States. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says there is no natural market in the United States for anything that we have. He says that the United States are producers of the very articles that Canada produces, and therefore it is idle to seek to obtain access to the United States market; it is bringing coals to Newcastle, that is the burden of his argument. I have looked through the list of imports in the United States in the past year and what do they disclose? I may not have made out a complete list of all products of Canada which have been imported into the United States; if not my argument is so much the weaker; but I find that the United States last year received from foreign countries $61,711,024 worth of products, every one of which could have been produced in the Dominion of Canada. On those products the United States customs houses collected $19,318,181. These articles are as follows: Animals, barley, bituminous coal, copper ore, fish, hemp, furs, hay, hops, iron ore, pig iron, lead, leather of various kinds, spirits, cheese, salt, potatoes, lumber, wooden ware and wool. All of these articles are producible by the people of Canada, and all of them were purchased by the United States last year to the extent of over $60,000,000, in spite of the tariff imposed. Can any hon. gentleman say now that there is no possible market in the United States for what the people of Canada can produce? Sir, to say so is to trifle with the facts. The volume of trade under these circumstances would, I think, be vastly increased were we to have free access to the markets of the United States. My hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. White) touched very lightly upon the effect of the reciprocity treaty. If we examine the imports and exports of the old Provinces of Canada during the continuance of the reciprocity treaty, they will tell us whether a high tariff is a hindrance to trade or not. In the year 1851, we sold to the people of the United States $2,162,250 worth of products; in the succeeding year, our products entered the United States free, and the amount of exports immediately jumped up to the sum of $4,184,319, or very nearly double the amount of the preceding year. I may say in this connection that as our exports to the United States in succeeding years went up, those of England went down. What did that prove? That proved that for our surplus products, in the year 1854, when there was a duty upon them going into the United States, we had to seek a comparatively unprofitable market in Great Britain, but in the succeeding years, when they went into the United States duty free, we sold in the best market, the United States. During the continuance of that treaty the volume of our exports to the United States increased by leaps and bounds, so that in the year 1866, when the treaty was repealed, we exported to the United States the enormous sum of $34,770,261 of the products of the old Provinces of Canada. Now, I would call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to this point. In the year 1866, the last year of reciprocity, the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, exported products to the value of $40,127,266. That year the American people imposed a high duty upon our products and the effect since then has been that in the year 1887, the last year for which we have complete returns, we only exported to the United States 37 million odd; in other words, whereas 22 years ago these four Provinces, under free trade with the United States, sent to them over 40 million dollars worth of goods, to-day, although we have become more powerful, although our population has considerably increased, our trade has fallen off with the United States to the extent of nearly three millions of dollars. So I think that so far as natural products are concerned, there is no possible argument against the proposition, that if we remove the barriers imposed by the custom houses, our trade with the United States in natural products would vastly increase. But it is said by the friends of the manufacturers that this policy would destroy our own manufacturers. I would deplore such a result with any man. I do not desire to see any industry in Canada sacrificed, I desire to see what is best for the whole of Canada adopted by Parliament and by the country, and being of that wish, and believing, as I do, that evidence is producible to show that our manufactures would not suffer, I am firmly of the opinion that we will not endanger our manufactures by enabling them to obtain access to the United States markets, even by giving access in Canada to the manufactures of the United States. Perhaps I might just refer by way of example to what has happened in the case of the Southern States. Hon. gentlemen all know that at the close of the great American war the Southern States were essentially an agricultural country. They had a few manufacturing industries, but agriculture was their leading industry. They came out of that war in a condition scarcely fitting them, I think, to compete with old established countries, they came out of that war with ruin all around; public credit was gone, private credit was gone, private fortune were swept away, the labor market was demoralised, everything was in chaos. What was the condition of the Americans in the north at that time? The old established manufactures in New England, though disturbed a little by the troubles of the war, were still in existence. They had grown up under the fostering care of the tariff, they had been supplying the great Western States with clothing, while the Western States supplied food to the East. You would think it would be absolutely impossible for manufacturing interests, I will not say to thrive, but obtain a foothold in the Southern States against such unfavorable conditions. But what has been the result? If you turn to an authority upon the subject, I refer to Mr. Hillyard in the New South, you will find he tells of the progress made in manufacturing in the Southern States within the last few years. Moreover, I would say that the manufactures that have sprung up in the Southern States during this period are not manufactures having any special advantage from their being in the Southern States. I do not refer merely to cotton or tobacco factories, but to the ordinary industries such as exist in Canada to-day, to the small factories. Mr. Hillyard, on page 29, says:—

"In building up the lumber mills of all kinds"—

And this I commend to the attention of the hon. member for North Renfrew.

"In the building of lumber mills of all kinds, from the small portable saw mill to the mill costing $50,000 to $100,000, the erection of ice factories, flour mills, &c., there is great activity. In fact, while the iron interests have attracted the greatest attention, the growth of manufactures covers a wide range of industries, including foundries, machine shops, steel works, cotton and woollen mills, cotton-seed oil mills, cotton compresses, fruit canning factories, carriage and waggon factories, agricultural implement factories, flour mills, grist mills, saw mills, planing mills, sash, door and blind factories, shuttle factories, handle and spoke factories, barrel factories, shingle mills, furniture factories, &c. It is a healthy growth. Instead of all interest being centered in the establishment of a few enterprises, the South has realised the importance of the small factory and workshop, and so we see springing up everywhere small factories, requiring but few hands, and but little capital, for producing the many articles of manufacture needed everywhere. Finding at first a local market for their goods, these factories will gradually extend their facilities and widen the scope of their trade, until they develop by a natural process into an extensive enterprise."

Not only have factories in the Southern States developed, but there has been development in what is the best of evidence as to what is the growth of a country, railway building. He goes on to say:

"Although the mineral resources of the South and her vast forests have attracted much consideration and large investment, in no regard has she so much enlisted the attention of the nation and of Europe as in building railroads. This is the most commanding theatre of capital, and strikes the eye of the world, not only for its colossal combinations of money, but the prestige of its participants."

He goes on further to say:

"It were a vain task to attempt to keep pace with the southern railroad projects. It seems as though almost every day brings a revelation of some new railroad scheme. It is quite certain that railroads are projected, surveys being made, 'ground' being 'broke,' under the auspices of such wealthy corporations as to confirm public confidence in the seriousness and good faith of their operations and intentions. But to assume nothing as the amount of capital to be invested in roads not actually built, the South can make an exhibit which is 'both a pledge and prophecy' of her progress."

Then follows a statement showing the enormous extent of railway construction within the last few years. In the summary Mr. Hillyard states that within the last six and a half years the Southern States have constructed over 14,000 miles of railway—far more than there is in the whole Dominion of Canada to-day. Further on he speaks of the saw mills. Those hon. gentlemen who are interested in lumbering need fear nothing from comparison with the United States in this regard, because we know that the Northern States will absorb all the lumber we can spare. At this hour I will not read further from this work, but I will simply ask hon. gentlemen to apply the lesson that is furnished by the growth of the Southern States, and ask whether Canada, if admitted to the markets of the United States, would not be able to have such a record as that after a reasonable period of time. Is there anything in Canada, is there anything in the Canadian people to warrant us in saying that they cannot accomplish what the people of the Southern States have accomplished, given the same conditions? Are our people less energetic, are they less capable? Those hon. gentlemen who say so declare want of confidence in the people of Canada. They do not mean it. They are afraid of the competition. They are afraid of making an honest trial. They are afraid to give up what they call a certainty for what may, to their minds, prove an uncertainty; but in the light of facts and in the light of history, which should teach us and from which we should learn, I cannot see how Canada can fail in any arena in which the American people have succeeded. Why, the hon. member for Central Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) the other night furnished us with a little argument upon this point. He said in his glowing language that he knew something of the Southern States, that he came from them, or had something to do with them. He stated that within the last eight months there had been invested in business there over $100,000,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the conditions of the Southern States are such that having the whole of the market of the United States, they put their capital of $100,000,000 in eight months to build up industries, would he not apply the same reasoning to what would follow in Canada if we had access to that great market?

Mr. COCKBURN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make a short explanation? I did say $100,000,000 were invested in the Southern States within eight months, but I was careful to draw attention to the fact that the Northern States were at the end of the war and remain still, one Confederation or one Government.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, we are talking business. I refer the hon. gentleman to the Spectator of the other day, which in speaking of the "fad," as it called it, of Imperial Federation, said, "We don't want any Imperial Federation, we don't want any sentiment, business is business." We mean business and the people of Canada want business, and the people of the United States, wanted business and when they invested $100,000,000 during the last eight months it was for business. It was because they saw there was a market in the United States for what they would produce, and because they expected a return, that they invested that capital. Whether we are under one flag or a dozen flags it does not make any difference in the amount of money we are making, if we can get the customers under the same conditions. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Interior argued in favor of the loyalty cry. That is a favorite trick in order to take the attention of the public away from the issue involved. If this proposition is sound on business principles it is sound in its entirety. If this proposition can be defended as one likely to produce comfort, to supply wants, to make the value of labor more than it is, that is loyal, and that it is a proposition which ought to be commended to the people. But I am willing to take the hon. gentleman at his own words. I am willing to test him by the record of his friends to see whether they really are sincere when they try to cause this loyalty cry to be raised in order to prevent the people from debating this proposition, or whether the cry is merely raised as a device in order to humbug the country. Now, in 1854, hon. gentlemen or some at least in this House, will remember that in the old Legislative Assembly of the Provinces of Canada this very question came up, and although no final decision was arrived at, yet on the 26th May, 1854, a resolution was adopted by the Committee of the House at that time in the following words:

"That the principle of reciprocity with the United States be extended to the production of manufactures, and to the registration of Canadian and United States built ships, and to the shipping and coasting trade in the same manner as to the production of agriculture."

That resolution, so far as I have been able to discover, and I speak subject to correction, was not opposed by any member of the Conservative party. It was introduced into the House but I do not find that it made any further progress. But looking at the members who constituted the committee that reported upon it I find that they represent pretty fairly the Conservative element of that day. The chairman of the committee was a gentleman who I believe had no very decisive political views—the Hon. Hamilton Merritt—at the time. I do not know that he had any particular political views. At all events that resolution was then offered to the House and no protest was raised against the principle involved in it. It was not then declared to the country that it was disloyal. The Conservative party did not then declare it was disloyal. They were not nearly so loyal then as they are now, and it was not very long before that they were taking a very different view of the whole political relations of Canada. It was only about five years before that a number of the leading lights declared that the only salvation for Canada was political annexation to the United States. I do not know that the Conservative party ever treated with any great cruelty some of the prominent men that took part in that movement. I believe that one of them has recently been promoted to a high position in the Cabinet of the hon. gentleman opposite. In fact they have all at times come in for favors, sometimes from the Government and in many cases from Her Majesty, by being decorated in testimony of their extreme loyalty and worthy citizenship. At the particular time this resolution was brought in the Conservative party then in the country were not as they are to-day, so sensitive upon this question. They were prepared at all events to discuss any question involving the best interests of the country. Mr. Speaker, in 1878 the Conservative party proposed what they called their National Policy and we have several times had the resolution proposed at that time brought before the attention of the House. That resolution told the people of Canada that this National Policy that they were proposing was simply the means to an end, and that end was to be what we are seeking to-day, reciprocity. Not only did they tell us that so but they emphasised it in their resolution in order that there should be no possible difference of opinion on the question. That resolution says, after referring to some other things:

"Would encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of reciprocity of tariff with our neighbors so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

What does "eventually" mean? Does it mean a time so remote as is indicated by the member for North Simcoe

(Mr. McCarthy) when he proposes eventually to benefit the farmers of Canada by his Imperial Federation scheme, and when he succeeds in inducing English statesmen to tax breadstuffs so as to raise the price of wheat from seventy-five cents to one dollar for the Canadian farmer. That is the relief proposed by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Is that "eventually"? Did the First Minister mean when he put the word in the resolution that it was to be at a remote period or did he mean that that word was to be accepted in the ordinary plain language in which it was expressed, that "eventually" meant just as soon as such a treaty could be obtained. That was the view presented to the people on the hustings, that is the proper reading of this article and that is the right view to take of the hon. gentleman at that time. I am reminded by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain) that the present Finance Minister asserted that this National Policy would produce this highly desirable result of reciprocity within three years, so that "eventually" has really expired now. Well, Mr. Speaker, the First Minister was not nearly so loyal then as he is now. He was then trying to get into office and he is now there and trying to hang on. He was very much concerned at that time about putting money into the pockets of the people, and British connection had not much to do with it. Whatever enriched the people of Canada was the first law unto him at that time; and so, when he came to move his resolution in 1878 he was prepared to throw overboard Great Britain. In the course of his speech in support of his National Policy, after depicting all the benefits that would flow from it, he said (Hansard, page 861):

"We shall then grow up rapidly a good, steady and mature trade between the Provinces, rendering us independent of foreign trade, and not, as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia formerly did, look to the United States or to England for trade, but look to Ontario and Quebec."

He was prepared then, for the sake of the Canadian people, if necessary, to shut out the whole trade of England, and I presume he felt that he was doing his duty. The doctrine he laid down then bore fruit, because he was followed shortly after in the debate by a supporter of his, the Hon. Mr. Masson, who gave his view of what the duty of Canadians was under such circumstances. He said (page 893 of Hansard):—

"He might tell the hon. gentleman that the Conservatives of Lower Canada were as loyal to England as they always had been, but he would add the words of Lafontaine: 'Mais avant tout soyons Canadiens'—('But before all let us be Canadians'). This was Lafontaine's doctrine, and they followed it. The Imperial Government in its relations and connections with the colonies had never been exempt from those rather selfish motives, if such motives could be so called, by which the mother country wished to aggrandise herself at the expense of the colonies; the whole colonial system was based upon this principle that the mother country took these colonies so as to have from them raw material for her own manufactures. That was the object of every central government in every country in the world with respect to their colonies, and, if England claimed a right at times to be selfish in its desires with regard to this colony, they would not go so far in that course, but defend the rights of Canada. The Imperial Government having given us the right of self-government, had also conferred upon us the right to regulate our fiscal duties as we wished. The Conservatives of Lower Canada did not wish to act against the interests of England, but they had the right, if they wished, to regulate the duties, irrespective of England if it were Canada's interest to do so."

I am not aware that the hon. gentleman who used these words lost standing with the Conservative party by reason of them. On the contrary, I believe he was duly rewarded at a later period with high honors at the hands of the Administration. I am not aware that the First Minister either has suffered by reason of his assertion that he believed in Canada for the Canadians against England, even if it injured British connection. I do not believe Her Majesty felt any objection against him on that account, because a few months afterwards he was decorated. Therefore utterances of that kind do not appear to be regarded as disloyal by Her Majesty herself. Again, the doctrine that Canada's interest must be considered first was echoed by another hon. gentleman supporting the Government, the present member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who, in the course of his speech, on 26th March, 1879, said:

"There was nothing we could do which would be more likely to bring about a renewal of reciprocity, than taking a stand upon a tariff which might be carried out in the interests of the Canadian people."

Another supporter of the Government, Mr. Houde, laid down this proposition:

"Let every Government legislate the best in the interest of its own people and for the welfare of its own people. That was the surest way of promoting human progress or general prosperity."

The then member for Centre Wellington (Dr. Orton), expressed himself as follows:—

"He had always thought, the inauguration of a National Policy in Canada should be merely a means to an end, and that end the obtaining of favorable commercial relations with other countries. He hoped in a short time we would be in a position to compete favorably even with our more formidable neighbor across the border, and they would see it to their interests to give us fair trade relations and open up their ports to us in return for our admitting their products on favorable terms."

This National Policy he regarded as a means to an end, the goal aimed at being what we are seeking for to-day. Another supporter of the Administration, Mr. J. S. Ross, of Dundas, expressed himself as follows:—

"If England chose to open her markets to all peoples and treat us no better than others we had to do the best we could for ourselves, consequently Canada must adopt such a fiscal policy as commended itself to their own judgment and which was in the interests of their own people. Unless they did this they must fail to accomplish what was expected of them as a free and progressing people."

I understand that that hon. gentleman, after expressing this view, received a position of emolument from the Conservative Administration. Then, I am obliged to refer to the utterances on that occasion of the present Speaker who was prepared to advance the interests of Canada even against those of England. He is reported in Hansard as having used these words:

"It had been stated in a threatening way that England would not approve of a tariff that seemed contrary to her interests, but where was the Englishman that could seriously refuse to Canada the right of legislating in her own interests?"

Further on he says:

"When responsible government had been granted to Canada by the British North America Act, had she not been conceded the right to frame her tariff as she saw fit? Canada had the right of governing herself, and if this right was now refused to her, she would be well able to demand it."

Then, speaking of the vote he was about to cast in favor of the National Policy, which was to lead to reciprocity, he said:

"It would be a vote given in favor of the constitutional and commercial liberty of Canada. It would be a vote that would assert the existence of Canada as a nation distinct not only from England, but the United States."

Hon. gentlemen, I have no doubt, are quite familiar with the memorandum directed by Sir Alexander Galt, then Mr. Galt, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, setting forth what ought to be the true attitude of Canada in regard to its fiscal affairs. I could, if time permitted, give numerous extracts from speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, all taking the ground that in matters of trade the Parliament of Canada had first to consider the interests of the people of Canada. I say that not only do the people of Canada demand that position from us, but the sentiment of England is in harmony with the sentiments I have quoted. The hon. gentleman who formerly represented the constituency which I have the honor to represent, a keen observer—I refer to Dr. Strange—spoke to this House on this question. He is an Englishman, and an able and talented gentleman. He expressed himself on this question in a way, I think, that did not meet with the disapproval of his constituents in North York. On the contrary, I believe that his constituents again desire him to represent their riding. They bore no malice to him for having uttered on the floor of Parliament the words which I am about to quote, taken from Hansard 21st March, 1879. He addresses this House as an Englishman. He was a Canadian by adoption, but an Englishman by spirit. As far as he was able to ascertain the spirit of the English people, they were anxious and willing to say:

"He addressed this House as an Englishman. He was a Canadian by adoption, but an Englishman in spirit. As far as he was able to ascertain the spirit of the English people they were anxious and willing to see this vast colony of which they were justly proud succeed even if we had in our own interests to put a stop to purchasing our goods from England. No English Government would venture to prevent the adoption of this tariff on the ground of its injuring England. The English people, without exception, took great interests in our success and with the exception of a few manufacturers would bid us god-speed on the royal road to wealth."

That is the sentiment of an Englishman expressing what he conceived to be the opinion of England with regard to the affairs of Canada. What did the Right Hon. John Bright, recently tell us at a banquet given to Mr. Chamberlain? I do not endorse all that Mr. Bright said that night, but I wish to show that he took strong grounds in favor of Canada being entitled to arrange her own tariff as she pleased and to conduct her own affairs in her own interest with regard to the commerce of the mother country. He went on to express a sentiment I do not endorse, but hon. gentlemen opposite can hardly repudiate John Bright as a true friend of the Empire at present, in view of the attitude which he has taken on certain political questions in England, which attitude, no doubt, commends itself to the favor of the Conservative party both in England and Canada. We have a very distinguished Englishman in Canada, Mr. Goldwin Smith, whose name has been referred to in this assembly during this debate, and not in the most courteous manner. The time was when what he said was accepted with favor by the Conservative party. He is a loyal citizen to England. I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite cannot controvert that. We all know his record, we all know the part he thought it was his duty to take to preserve the Empire, some few months ago, and we know that he to-day is a loyal British subject, anxious to see the welfare of England promoted. Do they denounce him as a traitor to England?

An hon. MEMBER. They do.

Mr. MULOCK. Since when? I think he is a truer man to England than the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) was to the people of Ireland, when he allowed some of his compatriots to be turned out of office because they would not be coerced into voting for him.

Mr. CURRAN. I beg leave to state that the assertion made by the hon. gentleman is entirely devoid of truth, and the newspapers which published that statement against me, apologised in the most humble manner for having done so.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sure the hon. member for Montreal Centre will not admit that his influence with this Cabinet is so small that he could not secure their retention in office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. MULOCK. I will not take it back.

Mr. CURRAN. I contradict that statement most flatly.

Mr. MULOCK. I say that the hon. gentleman will not admit on the floor of this House, and if he does I doubt whether any one is so credulous as to accept his admission, that his influence with the Cabinet is so weak that he could not prevent the removal from office of three poor Irishmen who had been for years in the employ of the Government, and who were removed simply because they would not come down and vote for him when he had voted against the best interests of Ireland.

Mr. CURRAN. What the hon. gentleman states is positively untrue.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member would do better to abandon that part of his remarks.

Mr. RYKERT. Make an apology.

Mr. MULOCK. I give as another reason why we are not obliged, in making trade relations with the United States, to consider first the interests of England, the fact that England does not act in this way with regard to the colonies. There are trade treaties between England and other great nations, giving benefits to England from which the colonies are excluded. There are new treaties on foot between England and China, and Japan, and Siam, and France, and Spain, and the Netherlands, and the United States, which are not applicable to the colonies. If England, in the exercise of her constitutional rights, considering the highest interests of her people, arranges, as I conceive she has the right to do, her own customs treaties for her own benefit and not for that of the people of Canada, a corresponding right exists with us. Does not the Confederation Act, under which we are here to-night, say that the constitution of the people of Canada shall be the same in principle as the constitution of the people of England? Our constitution is based on the principles of the English constitution, and unless the loyal gentlemen opposite can prove that England is not loyal to us in her conduct with regard to commercial treaties, they cannot say that Canada would be acting disloyally if, first of all, we consider our own interests in any particular trade relations we may enter into. We have further evidence to prove this contention. There is uncontrovertible evidence, having the sanction of the British Parliament, that the duty of Canada is to arrange her trade treaties in her own interest and without considering the interests of England. How will I prove that proposition? When the right hon. the First Minister, who is smiling now, caused the Customs Act of 1879 to be introduced, it was, before it became law, communicated to the Imperial Government. It was a tariff considered highly detrimental to the interests of the English manufacturers, who rose up in arms against it, protesting that Canada was raising a tariff to exclude English goods, and was not, therefore, loyal to England. They asked, therefore, that the Act be disallowed by the Imperial authorities. John Bright brought the matter before Parliament on the twentieth of March, 1879, and put this question to the Colonial Secretary on the floor of the House:

"In case of any proposal to enact differential duties on the part of Canada, would the Bill be submitted to the Government before it was adopted?"

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, then Secretary for the Colonies, replies:

"The best answer I can give to it is to read the telegram I sent to Canada, which received the sanction of the Government. It was in these terms.

"They deemed the fiscal policy of Canada rested, subject to treaty obligations, with the Dominion Parliament."

The Dominion Parliament was recognised on the floor of the Imperial Parliament as being entitled to impose differential duties if necessary, without it being considered right or proper or constitutional for the Government of England to disallow that Act. What further evidence is there? Hon. gentlemen all know that every Colonial Governor, when entering upon the duties of his office, receives certain instructions. The time was when all the instructions to Colonial Governors contained the instruction forbidding the Governor to sanction the imposition of differential duties, and that instruction is still to be found in the instructions to every Colonial Governor with the exception of the Governor General of Canada. In 1878, for the first time, that instruction was eliminated from the instructions given to the Governor General of Canada. Thus you see that the Crown recognised the fact that Canada, occupying a peculiar geographical position on the earth, cannot have her trade affairs regulated in the same way as other colonies of Great Britain, which are more or less insular or peculiarly situated; so the Government of England recognised fully that Canada, by reason of her importance, by reason of her position, and by reason of her constitution, cannot be trampled and ought not to be trampled in the interests of the people of Canada, or for that matter in the interests of the Empire, even if, for her own sake, she should impose differential duties. On that point, I cannot offer to the House, I think, any better evidence of the feeling of the people of Great Britain at the present time than an extract from the late Mr. Todd, who was a keen observer of current events, in his work on Parliamentary Government in British Colonies. At page 181, he summarises the position of Canada in regard to her trade rights, in these words:

"But, on account of the growing importance of Canada, as well before as since Confederation, exceptional privileges have been conceded to her, from time to time, in respect to fiscal and commercial matters wherein the interests of Canada were concerned, with freedom to adopt whatever policy might be approved by the Local Legislature, irrespective of the opinions or policy of the Imperial Parliament."

Such is the inference drawn by Mr. Todd from the current opinion and the authorities in Great Britain. I think I have established that the hon. gentlemen opposite at one time took a different view of this question; I think I have established that England does not wish Canada to injure herself even in the interests of the mother country, and though hon. gentlemen opposite have been practically asserting that English opinion of Canada simply depends upon the Canadian accounts in British ledgers, I do not think that our people will be so childish as to consider the business interests of people across the Atlantic to the prejudice of their own domestic interests. There is a good reason why England desires us to be on friendly terms with the United States. The United States are the largest customers of Great Britain. More than one-third, nearly a half, of the volume of trade of Great Britain is with the United States. Last year, the volume of trade between Great Britain and the United States amounted to between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000, and England desires that we should be on good terms with the United States, so that there may be no disturbance of her interests in that connection. If it is brought down to that ground, we are promoting the best interests of the people of Great Britain by having friendly intercourse with the United States, so that there may be no interference with the flow of trade between those countries. I shall not delay the House longer on this subject. We are loyal to the people of Canada if we vote on this question with a view to their benefit, on a proposition which is calculated to find a natural market for our products, to stimulate the manufactures of this country, to encourage labor and to make Canada attractive to the population and to the wealth of older lands, that will be a trade policy that will operate equitably throughout the whole length and breadth of the Dominion, that will enable us to solidify this Dominion, and to extend and carry out the very principle which established this Dominion, the extension of our trade markets. As interprovincial trade was held up in order to induce the Provinces to come together and form a confederacy and to have the domestic trade of four millions of people, that principle must be equally good if you give them the trade of sixty millions of people. Therefore, if it was right to bind us together by the scheme of Confederation for the purpose of establishing interprovincial trade—and I believe it was—it is still better to extend this principle and to obtain ultimately entirely free trade throughout this great American continent. Therefore, I have great pleasure in recording my vote and giving my voice in favor of this principle, believing as I do that it will be to the advantage of Canada and will place our relations with England on a sure and firm foundation, and that we will be bound to England by a feeling of love and regard, not a feeling that we have to pay for, not one wrung from the people by a system of indirect taxation, but one of relation between colony and empire where there are no disturbing causes between the two.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I have listened very earnestly to the arguments which have been submitted to the House on this important question. I have paid particular attention to the grounds taken by the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House in arguing for the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have felt especially gratified at the regard which has been expressed for the lumber trade, although it comes from the wrong side of the House, but from all these arguments, even from the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who, I understand, is a practical lumberman, I have not heard any account of the lumber interest that I am able to verify by any reports either from the United States or from Canada. Those statements are all, in my view—and facts go to substantiate it—made for a particular purpose, to endeavor to obtain the interest of the lumber trade, but I think they are made on an extravagant, unjustifiable and unwarrantable basis. I have gone to the trouble of making an accurate statement of the lumber export interest of this country for the last year. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), stated that practically one-half of the exports of the lumber trade went to the United States, subject to duties which the producers in this country had to pay. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) took similar ground upon the matter of exports, and he claimed that the producers of this country had to pay a duty upon whole products of the forests. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford stated that $9,353,000 of the products of the forest went into the United States upon which a duty was collected, and upon the basis of their argument, the producers in Canada had to pay it. Now, the whole exports of the forest product for the year ending June, 1887, were $20,484,746; the amount sent to Great Britain and other countries was $11,131,240. The amount free of duty, according to our own returns, that went out, chiefly to the United States, was $1,873,412; the balance which went to the United States, subject to duty, was $748,094. That was a proportion of 36 per cent. of the whole products of the forest which were subject to duty, and 64 per cent. free of duty. Now, as a matter of fact, all the products from the forest that have been heretofore subject to duty since the abrogation of the Treaty of 1854, as every hon. gentleman in this House knows, it is proposed to admit into the United States, under a Bill introduced into Congress, providing for the removal of the duty upon the products of the forests. Now, in view of this fact I am unable to see upon what ground the hon. members who have been arguing on this resolution for the last two or three weeks, could take up the interest of the lumber trade at all. It was expected that the Bill I have mentioned would pass through Congress, if not at this session at an early period afterwards; consequently I, as a practical lumberman, must take the ground that I am unable to see any reason or propriety why hon. gentlemen opposite should have taken up the question at the present time. I must say I consider it an interference and an intrusion upon the negotiations which were pending between the United States and Canada, and which, I have no doubt, have been seriously interfered with by it. Now I speak upon business principles upon this matter. As every one here knows I am not a politician, but I am a lumberman of long standing in this country. Now, if I were in negotiation for my firm or for myself in relation to important transactions, and some of my neighbors or some of my family interfered and tried to show to the parties with whom I was negotiating that their interests were of much greater importance to some body else than they were to me, I should conclude that it was an unjustifiable and unwarrantable interference, subject to the most severe censure of every reasonable fair minded man. I am particularly surprised at the hon. member for North Norfolk taking the ground that he did. Himself, a practical lumberman, he takes the ground that the duties must be paid by the producer on this side of the line. Now, if that is followed out, I see no propriety in the hon. gentlemen opposite complaining of a rise in the duties upon material imported into this country. They leave it for the producer to pay, from whom we get these goods, upon the principle that they have to pay the duties and not us. Now, if that principle is correct, it is certainly not reasonable to contend that we also have to pay duties upon what we import. It is a rule that cannot work both ways, and if we pay the duties upon what we export, it is fair to conclude that those who export to us also have to pay the duties. I am sorry the hon. member for North Norfolk is not in his place, but I have no hesitation in stating to him that he could not find any experienced lumberman upon the Ottawa valley or its tributaries who would agree with him. Now, that hon. gentleman went further, and contended that unrestricted reciprocity would increase the value of the timber limits of this Dominion by at least 50 per cent. I cannot understand upon what grounds he made that assertion. In my opinion it is simply absurd to say so. It is well known that the Governments of Quebec and Ontario have increased the Crown dues very largely during the last year. We contended that they were unwarranted in making such a large increase, and I think I can show that so far as trade is concerned in the Ottawa valley, there was no reason for increasing the Crown charges as they have done, except in anticipation of the removal of the duties upon the products of the forests going into the United States. I have taken that ground in my own party. That must have been the ground upon which they made that increase, and they were perfectly justified in their views that the United States would at an early day do that which was to their interest, and remove the duties from the forest products of this country. Now, as a practical lumberman, I may state here that as a matter of fact, according to the condition of the lumber trade in the Ottawa valley, those charges cannot be paid by the lumbermen at the present time unless the duties are removed upon lumber going into the United States. It is a well known fact to all practical lumbermen and sawmill men, that a low grade of lumber as produced now cannot be exported to the United States under that system of duties, without a loss to the sawmill men who saw the logs. That is a positive fact, and the only advantage, I contend, which we can obtain from the removal of those duties, is to enable us to cut and saw an inferior quality of logs, and perhaps, in many cases, trees that have been burnt and killed a long time ago might be cut and used for boxes, and so on, which might be worked here and exported to the United States, if there were no duties to pay. On that ground, and on that ground alone, I contend that there is no reason for anyone taking the position that lumbermen here can handle that lumber, unless the duties are removed. I make that statement as a matter of fact from my experience of lumbering, and I challenge any man who is accustomed to the manufacturing and sawing of lumber, to contradict or controvert it. There is another matter in connection with the lumber business that has not been stated here, or referred to in any way, and that is the enormous increase for home consumption which has taken place since 1880. Hon. gentlemen opposite have either purposely or carelessly avoided mentioning anything of that kind as being a benefit to our producers here. That, I contend, is one of the essential points that should be considered in any transaction or measure of this kind. It has been strongly argued from the United States point of view in this House that the enormous internal interstate trade of the United States has increased to a wonderful degree year after year, which we all know is the fact, upon which the prosperity and advancement of this country have very largely depended, and which the success of the United States may be attributed, especially since the abolition of American slavery. The interstate trade of that nation has been enormous and unequalled in the world. I contend that we can cultivate and develop an interprovincial trade in Canada, and in order to show the reason why I hold this to be the fact, I will cite the statistics of the increase of the sales of lumber in Montreal for local consumption since the adoption of this protective policy. The estimated consumption for 1880 was from 45,000,000 to 50,000,000 feet, while in 1887 it ran up to 120,500,000 feet. I look upon this as one of the important elements of the prosperity and success which this National Policy so-called, has given to this country. And if we were able to obtain the statistics of other cities, I am sure we would be able to show the people and hon. gentlemen opposite, who are contending that we should throw overboard everything we have achieved, that upon that basis we have developed our trade and given our own people employment in the manufacturing interest. That is not all, but it furnishes a home market for much of the products of the forest within our own country. That home market, I contend, is the best market in any country. In order to show the benefit of that trade, and in order to make it more clear to the comprehension of hon. members who are not accustomed to the lumber trade, I would say that the amount consumed in the city of Montreal in 1887 amounted to 20 per cent. of the cut of all the mills in Ottawa and its immediate neighborhood. That this progress has been accomplished from 1880 to 1887 furnishes remarkable evidence of the effects of the National Policy, and it cannot be questioned that it has benefited this section of country. I contend that this same principle will apply all through Ontario and Quebec, not only in regard to the products of the forest, but in the products of the farm, and everything we can raise and consume or of which we have a surplus to export to another country. Upon that basis I claim that there can be no question of the success of the National Policy so far as we have gone, and I contend that the advancement has been far more than perhaps might have been expected under the circumstances. When we consider the sparseness of our population from ocean to ocean, that when this policy was adopted we had limited means of transport from one section of the country to the other, it is remarkable that within this period of time we have attained such results. When we consider that it is only within the last year or a little more that we have had means of communication with the extremity of the Dominion on the Pacific Ocean, when we consider that at the present time our means of communication are in course of construction to the other extremity of the Dominion, we may congratulate ourselves on the real success we have achieved in the interchange of products. I regret to say that means do not seem to be available to arrive at a correct conclusion in regard to the interprovincial trade, which we have already developed and which we now enjoy, and although meagre, it would be quite surprising to many people who are attacking it and endeavoring to make us believe that there is no such thing as interprovincial trade, that we have not arrived at that stage of development in our progress as a Dominion to have developed that trade to any degree. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if we can get over this attempt to disturb the progress and development of this country, and if the hon. gentlemen who represent the constituents in this House would take some other means of criticising the action of the governing party, that we would do far better and get along more successfully in developing the resources of the country. It seems to me that this feeling of enmity against the successful party and this complaining has been going on since I have known anything about Parliament and this raising of the cry that we are going to ruin, are I believe calculated to retard the progress of the country and to embarrass the Government from carrying on measures for its welfare. I may be criticised for expressing my views on this point being a young member of the House, but I must say that I consider this resolution uncalled for in any sense of the word so far as the lumber trade is concerned, and I can see no ground upon which they can justify themselves in introducing a resolution of that kind. So far as I am concerned I have no hesitation in saying that the lumber trade does not need any such resolution. I think it is very unfair that the arrangements pending between this country and the United States and which we have every reason to believe would result in an immense benefit to the country should be embarrassed by such a proceeding. We have seen in this House during the last 24 hours that already measures to interchange our natural products are being arranged between the United States Government and this Government. I contend that we may consider the United States people a sensible people and we claim at least to be a sensible people here, and when they see as they have seen that it was a mistake to continue the duty on lumber, we may readily conclude that they will come to the same conclusion about potatoes, and barley, and other things and in due time they will see it is to the detriment of their own interest to continue it. I consider that those Governments have achieved remarkable results in the fishery negotiations, results which we ought to all feel proud of in this country and which tend to the settlement of that long vexed question. As a native of the United States, I have had much intercourse with its people during all these years, perhaps more than any other member of this House. The great contention I have met with among the mass of the people on the other side of the line is that they believe they have the right to fish where they liked, but the more sensible portion of the people with whom I have talked recognised the obligation of the treaty of 1818. We can depend upon the sensible portion of the people of the United States, and I am happy to congratulate the members of this Government, especially the Minister of Finance upon the success which he obtained for Canada at the Washington conference. I am quite satisfied that it will lead to a better understanding between the authorities of both countries, and, as I said before, I have no doubt that reasonable arrangements will be made for a fair interchange of the products of the two countries in due time. In the course of the debate upon the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) it has been said that we will open our market to 60,000,000 of people. I contend that we only open our markets to the 5,000,000 with whom we come in contact along the border on the other side of the line. So far as we are concerned, are not the farmers along the line producers of the same articles as we produce? We immediately come into contact with them and we open our markets to a country highly developed and to a people better prepared to produce than we are. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to know what advantage we would have in sending our products to compete with the same products in the United States? From a business point of view I cannot see that we are going to obtain any advantage. On the contrary, I contend that we are opening our markets to the manufacturers of the United States; that those manufactures are highly developed, they make almost everything that is needed for the people, and when we open our markets to those manufacturers we become confronted with the great facilities and advantages they have gained after many years of establishment, and I contend we are not prepared in our young country to meet such a state of things. I contend that our country would be overrun with the manufactures of the United States, and we would not be able to contend against the best kind of machinery and manufacturing skill they have in that country. Upon that ground, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see that we will gain any advantage by unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, which is the same thing, or by annexation. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) said:

"I have no accurate statistics as to the value of the lumber interests, but I find that we exported up to the 15th June, 1887, for the year prior to that, the immense value of $3,165,987 upon which as I will explain in a moment, my constituents, at all events, pay the enormous amount of over $500,000."

Now, the facts show as nearly as possible that from the Province of Ontario the total amount of forest products which were subject to United States duty for the year ending June, 1887, amounted to about $6,000,000, and that it is not at all likely that the whole duty thereon could have exceeded from $500,000 to $700,000, showing clearly that the hon. member was perfectly justified in stating that he had no accurate statistics, and that his statement regarding the amount of duties paid by his constituents was without foundation in fact. I submit that no member of this House is justified in placing before his constituents any statements that rest on a false basis. Now, with regard to the question, who pays the duty on the lumber we export to the United States, I do not know that there is any settled principle; but the dealers in lumber and manufacturers in the United States, without any exception, contend that they pay the duty. They come here and buy lumber free on board, and pay the duty on it. I do not intend to argue the question, but I will state my experience in the application of the treaty of 1854, and leave the hon. members to draw their own conclusion as to which contention is right. Notice for the abrogation of the treaty of 1854 was given in 1864, and the abrogation took place on the 1st of July, 1866, when a duty of 20 per cent. was imposed on pine lumber. At that time my firm was engaged in the sawing of lumber and at the time this resolution was introduced my impression was that we did not experience any difference in the price of our lumber from the imposition of that duty. But to verify my impression I had an examination made of the books of my firm, and I found that from 1864 to 1867 there was no perceptible change in the price of our products. If anything, the prices increased in the latter years to some extent. But this instance goes to show conclusively that at that time we certainly did not pay the duty that was imposed on lumber by the United States. After all, we have valuable resources in our forests that would be much improved by the removal of the United States customs duties—not in the sense of such increased value as my hon. friend from North Norfolk estimates, but more particularly as I contend in the sense of enabling the holders and workers of these timber lands to appropriate and market low grades of growth—possibly vast numbers of trees from burned districts which it is impossible for them to handle under the Crown charges now resting upon such products, but which might then be worked up in this country into marketable exports for the United States. It may thus be clearly seen that the mere earnings to the laboring classes and payment of crown dues, with only a very small profit to the mill men, would be a great boon for this country to get from such timber, and I contend that this is the main advantages which this country would gain by the removal of the United States duties on lumber. At the inauguration of our present fiscal policy, it was contended, on what we considered reasonable grounds, that that trade would have to suffer, under the National Policy, for the benefit of other industries. It was contended by some member of my own firm and by my neighbors that we would have to pay increased prices for the different articles we consumed. I took the opposite view, and held that we would get these articles from our own manufacturers at rates fully as low as those we would have to pay the foreign manufacturer. What was the fact? The articles of clothing and the vast amount of goods that enter into shanty supplies were never advanced in price, and to-day we can get them cheaper than ever we could get them before. That is the true principle of protection. Protection is not a new thing to me. Before I came to this country I was a protectionist, and I have always been firmly of the opinion that no new country can get on without a protective policy. I am sanguine that with our resources, which under the National Policy, are being rapidly developed, we will in time become a nation of great importance. We need only take the glowing accounts of Mr. Erastus Wiman and his supporters to realise more clearly than we otherwise might the vast resources that we possess in our unlimited wheat producing and stock raising lands, the richness of our mineral deposits, our forests, rivers and water powers. We need only consider these advantages to appreciate properly the heritage we now possess and to become inspired to the exercise of every effort to work out the great destiny before us. The hon. member for South Brant has alluded to evidence before a commission of this House on depression in the year 1876, in which he gives the statement of W. G. Perley, lumber merchant, whom he supposes to be the present member for Ottawa. I wish to remove all doubt from the mind of that hon. gentleman by a full declaration to this House that I am the same W. G. Perley to whom he alluded as having given evidence on that occasion. I thank the hon. member most sincerely for reporting my evidence on that occasion, viz., that we were all anxious to have the privilege of sending lumber into the United States without duty, if we could have it on fair terms. I feel able to congratulate myself upon the record that my hon. friend has brought down to this House, and further to congratulate myself on having been a uniform and steadfast supporter of the view all the time from that date to this, that reciprocity with the United States on fair terms would be a boon to us as well as to the United States. But that does not in my view offer any inducement for a sacrifice or absolute surrender on our part such as I consider the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Oxford, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment to the amendment and against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, and I hope that such an expression of opinion against both will be given by this House as to leave no room for encouragement in the minds of those who might desire to bring forward this resolution again. I thank you, Sir, for the patient hearing you have given me, and I hope the House will pardon me, if, being a new member and therefore lacking parliamentary experience, my remarks have not been as well put as they might have been, but I have done, as I always intend to do, the best I could for my country.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have listened to all the speeches that have been made on this very important question, the most important perhaps that has ever been presented to Parliament since Confederation, and I would not now take up the time of the House were it not that my hon. friend the senior member for St John (Mr. Weldon) is not able to take part in this debate on account of physical difficulties. Only one of our delegation from the Province of New Brunswick has spoken in the discussion, and therefore I feel it is my duty to make my voice heard on this question. Anyone who knows my views on trade questions knows that I will vote for any measure which will remove the obstacles to trade, either partially or completely. I am from honest conviction a free trader. In 1854, when the treaty of partial reciprocity was introduced into New Brunswick, I was a member of the Parliament of that day and I voted to ratify the arrangement thirty-four years ago. So that you see, Sir, I am not a very young man. That was the commencement of my political life, and I have been in politics ever since. If this resolution should be adopted now, at the close of my career, if I can assist in the humblest manner in bringing about this result, it will be a happy ending to my political career. I have listened to all the speeches that have been made on this subject, and, although I have always been associated with the Liberal party, I do not think I am an extreme partisan; I think I can look at questions fairly, and, according to my light, can judge fairly of arguments. I know that this question has been ably discussed, though I think there has been much said which has not helped us to come to a correct conclusion. When this question was first mooted in the country, I had hopes that it might be discussed to a large extent free from party feelings and with a disposition to arrive at what was best for the country. I cannot suppose that the majority in this House are not anxious for the advancement and prosperity of the country. I have no doubt that they are anxious that their policy shall succeed, and that they have made the best efforts they can to that end, but, in my humble opinion, no country can succeed under a policy of protection. Surround it as much as you may with fallacies and sophistries, I am so grounded in my belief that protection cannot succeed that these sophistries and fallacies cannot affect me. I do not know how much time I may occupy in what I have to say, but I promise that I shall not endeavor to dig up dry bones and dead issues of the past. Those dead issues cannot help us to come to a proper conclusion on this question. The question is large enough to be discussed on its merits, and what this gentleman on this side or that gentleman on the other side said years ago, under different circumstances, speaking on different questions, has no relation to the question now before us, and can have no effect upon it. We are face to face now with an issue which is worthy of the best consideration and the best judgment we can bring to bear upon it. The question now is, without regard to other matters, without regard even to the question whether Canada is prosperous or not, whether it is the best for the interest of Canada to adopt the resolution now before us, and to endeavor to obtain unrestricted free trade with our neighbors to the south of us. That is the question, and I shall endeavor to give the reasons why I think that is the best policy. This question is so plain that it does not require a very intelligent man to understand it. It is so plain that I do not think it can be blinded up with sophistries and fallacies. I think it is a question that is being considered by more electors, by more people throughout the Dominion of Canada, than any question which was ever propounded before in so short a time as we have had this question before us. I believe the people of this country will give it a fair and intelligent consideration, and will come to an honest decision in the matter. Of course I do not expect that anything that will be said here will change a vote in Parliament. This is said to be a deliberative body, but party feeling has become so strong, and I may say so rotten, that we cannot look at things here through a clear medium, or at least we do not seem to be able to do so. I do not wish to judge hon. members. I think they have presented their objections to this resolution to the best of their ability. I think they have done the best they could, but they have failed, as everybody must fail who attempts to prove that protection is a correct principle and is the best for the country. They have spoken fluently and brought their arguments to bear on the question, and, while I do not wish to underrate their speeches, for they are not responsible to me, or to this House, but to their constituents, I think they have failed to make out a case. I was once at a meeting. A colored man was preaching, and before he commenced his services he gave out a hymn, and the choir commenced to sing, but they pitched too high, and then they stopped. Then they began again, but they pitched too low. They made another effort and failed again, and after several trials, they sat down, and did not succeed in singing because they could not, and my hon. friends, I think, have not succeeded simply because they could not. The preacher said: "I thank you, gentlemen, though you did not succeed, because you have done the best you could." So those hon. gentlemen have done the best they could, but they have failed to convince me; there has been no music in it to me. In dealing with trade questions, it is usually supposed that it is only the manufacturers and the wholesale and retail dealers and a few others who constitute the trading public, that they are the only ones who trade, and that therefore we should look to them as the traders of the country. My idea is that everyone is a trader who buys or sells anything and this question is important because it reaches every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, who are able to produce and to dispose of their products, whether it is their labor or anything else which they may desire to sell or to buy. This is a question which appeals to everyone. We are a hive of traders. We are endeavoring, all of us, to get something which we may sell again in order to obtain what we wish to consume for our comfort. However desirous one might be to regard this question without looking at party, it is only necessary to reflect for a moment to see that the proposed resolution is a direct attack upon the principle of protection. Therefore, I could not expect that this question would be discussed without having the National Policy discussed from beginning to end, with its effects upon the country from its inception up to the present time. I have been unable all through these years to understand exactly what the policy of the Government was upon this question. It has never been very clearly defined. They started out with the proposal that we must have reciprocity of trade or we must have reciprocity of tariffs. I did not know what they really wanted, or what they thought was best for the country, but it seems as though they had two strings to their bow, and they have continued to have two strings to their bow all the way through. They have found that the National Policy has worked well for them as a party, and I confess they have been very successful. I never expected that they would be so successful in introducing such a policy at this age of the world, but they have been successful, and, when this discussion was opened, I made up my mind that the policy of the Government was clearly defined. When the amendment to the resolution was moved, I thought we had a clear and distinct issue, I thought that the Government were disposed to hold to the policy of protection as a principle to be fixed upon this country. But the declarations of the Government seems to have left me again in doubt as to their policy. I do not know now what they mean. From the declarations of the Prime Minister the other day, I supposed that their colors were nailed to the mast, I understood him to mean that they were decided not to have reciprocity in either natural or in manufactured products. Their amendment declared that they had proved the National Policy, that the people had approved of it on three occasions and as having protected and fostered their industries, and therefore I supposed the Government had made up their minds to fight it out on that line. I find now that is altogether changed, that they are beginning to yield, and that this pet of theirs, the National Policy, is receiving but little attention in some respects. I find that in this first engagement with the United States in the war of tariffs, they have made a retreat, and this bantling of the hon. gentlemen opposite, this idol which they have elected and worshipped so long a time, is now suffering injury. Are not the fruit growers an industry in Canada? Are not those who grow shrubs, and plants, and trees, and put them into the market, men who have a right to be protected under the National Policy? It seems not just now. That is one of the interests of this country that does not seem to be taken under the fostering care of the National Policy. And so I do not know how much they are going to yield, or exactly what they contemplate. I thought this amendment was the policy of the Government. I understood by it that all these industries and interests in the Dominion of Canada, having been so fostered and having proved so successful, were to continue to receive the benefits of the National Policy; but I cannot tell now whether that is going to be done or not. I have noticed that all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question from the Government side, have declared at the beginning or at the conclusion of their speeches, that they were willing to have reciprocity. After arguing with great ability that free trade would injure the interest of the farmer, the miner, the lumberman, and every other interest, at the conclusion of their speeches they wound up by saying: We are willing to have reciprocity of some kind or another. This proves to my mind that they have a lingering fear that the people of this country are in favor of unrestricted trade with our neighbors across the border. It all convinces me that some how or other, they believe there is a feeling abroad that the people want to have the shackles of trade removed, at least in reference to the United States, and I fancy that they are right. I believe that the people desire unrestricted trade with our neighbors, and for that reason I shall help them so far as I am able. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the fact that there is a hard battle to be fought before we can obtain it. We have had a good many elections, and you know the result, Mr. Speaker, and I know the result, and our party knows the result. In three elections we have been beaten. But that is no reason why we should compromise our principles, that is no reason why we should not contend for what we think is to the advantage of this country. Any hon. member who thinks it is going to be an easy matter to beat the present Government, with the influences they have at their command, and know so well how to use, is greatly mistaken. Any hon. gentleman who remembers that this Government with their experience, with $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 to spend every year, and know how well to apply it, how well to use it for their purposes, must know that it is a hard matter to overcome that influence. In addition to that, we have got to meet the influence of all the combines, of all the rings and the monopolies that have been fostered and encouraged by the present policy, and they form a very important element in carrying an election. Then, there is the manufacturing interests, which have a very strong influence, and in the main I fear they may be against us. Then we have in this Dominion a great many office holders, many of them men of honor, many of them men of ability, and many of them doing service to their country. But beside and above all these, there is a host of hangers on, the rag-tag and bob-tail, who want to get a living without work—we are going to have that vote against us, and then, Mr. Speaker, in addition to them, there are a great many honest men, a great many men who are good citizens, but whose party feelings are so strong that we cannot approach them, and they will vote for their party. Then we have an army of contractors, who have made great wealth out of the public works of this country; we have the sub-contractors and all who depend upon them, who have made vast means out of the public works of this country, and all these will be against us. The Government know the power of contractors, they have a little experience of them down in Glengarry, they know what they can do, when they put themselves to work, and they have not got them all on their side. Take these altogether, all who have been in office and who are looking for office, all those who follow the Government ship in order to live on the offal that is thrown overboard, and you have got a host.

to contend with. But still I feel that our cause is just, and I believe that to-day, there is a larger majority than ever in Canada in favor of unrestricted free trade with the United States. Feeling that, I have no fear, but the work has got to be attended to. Now, there is a great difference of opinion in the House as to whether Canada is prosperous at the present time. I do not think Canada is at all what she ought to be considering her resources and her opportunities; but this idea of prosperity is a relative term, and what one might consider prosperity another might not consider prosperity, and you can prove your position by taking one locality and another locality that may be fairly and truthfully said to be prosperous at the present time. Taking Canada as a whole it cannot be said to be prosperous. The expectations held out when the National Policy was inaugurated have entirely failed to be fulfilled, and whatever prosperity there may be of a general nature, it is not the result of protection. You might as well expect to gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles as to expect any general prosperity in any country by restricting and impeding trade.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What about the United States?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are the greatest free traders in the world.

Mr. GILLMOR. I admit the United States is a great country, but I do not admit that her prosperity is the result of her protective policy; she is not prosperous because she has protection any more than because she has got Mormonism. The United States is a rich country by nature, it is a country with vast natural resources and with an energetic people. It possesses a great variety of climate where any immigrant from Europe can find a genial climate. They have a cold climate where any person from the colder countries of Europe can come and find a climate suited to him. They have a greater variety of climate than any other country, and I contend that the condition of the United States is not at all due to her protective policy, but in spite of it. That is my honest conviction, and that opinion is shared I believe to-day by a majority of the electors in the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes, I believe so. An evidence of this is found in the proposals for a reduction of their tariff. They have already free trade between the different States. Hon. gentlemen opposite offset that by stating that we have free trade here between the Provinces. Many of the most able men in the United States now believe that the present protective policy is not in the interests of the country, and they are fighting that battle out there, and this is an opportune time for Canada to raise her voice in support of this measure. Men there believe that for trade purposes this country is intended to unite with the United States, and that it is for our joint interest that we should unite. A very good evidence that a country is not prosperous is when its real estate is declining in value. I know there may be differences of opinion on that point, but in my opinion one of the best evidences that a country is not prosperous is when real estate is at a low price. With regard to my own county I could not consistently with my convictions say that we are in a depressed condition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLMOR. I cannot say so fairly, although I could go to some parts of my county and pick out small communities and small localities where property is very low. Just now I understand there is quite a "boom" in the price of real estate in the shire town of my county. I am exceedingly pleased with the fact, and I take this opportunity to state the fact that real estate, which has been much depressed for thirty years, is now quite in demand, and that much property has changed hands at a very marked increase over the price of the last quarter of a century. I am glad of it, and I give the Government the benefit of it. What has caused it I do not know. I do not believe it is the National Policy—I do not know exactly what it is. It may be that this town is expected to become the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway and that this may be the cause of the advance in real estate. It may be owing to the circumstance that this is a very pleasant summer resort, and perhaps on that account Americans have come and invested there. Whether it is due to the expectation of its being the terminus of a great railway system on the Atlantic coast, or of a popular summer resort, it is equally the same to us; it is a benefit to those who have property to sell and a benefit to the county where the transactions are going on. But I could go to another part of the county, where I live myself, and point out real estate that is not worth half as much as it was thirty years ago, I could point out large districts where real estate is really of little or no value, where there are no purchasers for it. That, of course, is another view of the case. The present condition of things is due to the exodus from the country. No country like Canada can lose in a few years nearly 1,000,000 of men and women who were its pride and strength without suffering very materially in all its best interests. I am not disposed to blame any one for what I could not do better myself. I know how anxious hon. gentlemen on Government benches and those who support them were to prevent this exodus. I am aware they had made every effort in their power to stop this out-going from the Dominion; I am also aware they have made every effort to bring immigrants to this country, and I am glad they have concluded that the plan has not been successful and has not been worth the expenditure. Hon. gentlemen promised, and I have sat and listened to all their speeches on the subject, that the National Policy would prevent this exodus; the First Minister stated both in the House and the country that he could do it and would do it. They have most signally failed, their National Policy has entirely failed; there can be no doubt the exodus has been as large and larger than it was before the National Policy was introduced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. GILLMOR. The First Minister dissents from that proposition, but in my honest opinion they have failed entirely. Unrestricted free trade would check the exodus I believe, if it did not stop it. If you allow the young men and women to put their labor upon the soil and produce what this country can produce and have a free market with the United States, our young men will stop here more than they do under the National Policy. With regard to the state of trade in other parts of New Brunswick, I have no doubt that New Brunswick is upon the whole in a distressed condition. I know something about St. John as it is convenient to my residence, and therefore I believe that not only has the National Policy not helped St. John but that it has interfered with its progress and has been a great injury to the trade of that city—not alone to its general trade, but a great injury to its manufactures which this National Policy was especially adopted in order to advance. Mr. Speaker, in regard to that city, before the National Policy was introduced we had about seven manufacturers of boots and shoes. To day we have only one manufacturer of boots and shoes left in the city of St. John and I have been informed, truthfully I believe, that that institution upon which some $17,000 was expended, those holding the mortgages upon it are willing to dispose of their claim for $4,000. The truth is the "slaughter" process we heard so much about before has been going on since the National Policy was introduced to a larger extent than it ever came from the United States. The "slaughtering" process is coming from Montreal and Canada and they have "slaughtered" those manufactories out of existence and left the remaining one on its last legs. I do not know whether it is running at all or not. That is the effect of the "slaughtering" process there. We heard a good deal of boasting about cotton manufacturers in Halifax. Before Confederation we had one cotton mill there, small it was, but it was prosperous before we had any connection with Canada under Confederation. I do not know what was invested originally in that mill, but under the stimulus of the National Policy it was increased at a cost of $384,000, and that manufactory which cost $384,000 is now in the hands of its creditors at a cost of $284,000. Here was a clear $100,000 lost in that undertaking stimulated by the National Policy. Therefore the National Policy cannot be said to have worked very well in the town of St. John. There was another cotton mill started under the fostering care of the National Policy, in which $230,000 was invested and that was bought, not very long since, for $75,000. Here was another loss of $150,000 capital sunk in this concern and lost for ever to Canada. There is a total of $250,000 lost to the cotton manufacturers of St. John. It is true the mills are working and I hope they may succeed but that cotton mill is now owned by those who work it, at a much less cost than it ever could be built for. One of the mills is owned by one of the most enterprising men in the Lower Provinces, perhaps I may say one of the most enterprising men in the Dominion of Canada—Mr. Gibson. He on his own account undertook to build a great cotton mill and he has succeeded in erecting one of the finest institutions of the kind in the country. He has built the finest mill that has ever been built in Canada and for the least money, but in consequence of the stimulus under the National Policy he comes in competition with the "slaughter" cotton mills of Canada. He is not the cheapest manufacturer in Canada which he ought to be and which he would be if he had any fair competition. I have no doubt of his success; I know the man, I know his energy and I know his independence. I am informed that he is not a member of the combine although the other institutions in St. John are members of the combine, try to make their institutions pay by keeping up the and price of cotton. Mr. Gibson is not a member of that combine, he wants a fair field and no favor, that is what I understand his principles to be. He is not afraid of competition, and a man like him need not be afraid of competition, but all he wants is a fair field, and a large field, and a fair chance for business. Mr. Gibson is not afraid of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. We have in my own county, perhaps one of the finest mills in the Dominion of Canada, and a large amount of capital has been sunk in it. I believe it is now working successfully, but the first stockholders have lost quite a considerable sum. I was glad to find in the stores here that their cotton was considered of the very best class, and that Mr. Gibson's cotton is to be found in Ottawa too. I am informed, not personally, but through conversation with my friends, that those mills have no fears of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. They feel that if they had opened up to them the markets of the United States with sixty millions of consumers they could hold their own and they are not afraid of not meeting with success. I have heard a great deal said about the resources of Canada. I am a Canadian by birth, and my sympathies are with Canada, and her institutions, and her welfare. Canada, no doubt, has vast resources. We hear our friends on the other side speaking of Canada as starting on the race of nationality 20 years ago. What we see in Canada now is the result of 100 years' effort. It was Canada as much before Confederation as it is now. We are not a nation now but I hope in time we will be, and we should not go back twenty years to show what Canada ought to have been. We have been on the march and making efforts for progress almost as long as many of the United States at all events, and the result is now that we have less than five millions people in Canada. I think we ought to have made greater progress than this and I think we would have made greater progress if we had adopted free trade with the United States. Our experience of the ten years of the National Policy shows that it has been ten years lost to the country. I think there has been no progress of any extent since that time and I think the National Policy is not at all performing what its promoters promised it would perform. Mr. Speaker, our National Policy was introduced especially to encourage our infant industries and that was the principal argument used at its introduction. I do not think that our industries have been promoted by it. Ten years have passed and I am honestly of opinion that the manufacturing industry of Canada would have been in a healthier state to-day if the National Policy had never been introduced into this country. The argument is that other industries must contribute in order to sustain and increase our infant industries. I read the following incident a short time ago, which I thought might serve to illustrate how long they were to be considered infants:—

"When Senator Broderick was shot by David Terry in San Francisco, a Dublin man wrote to an editor of a paper there claiming to be next of kin. He gave the date of his birth, which showed him to be 47 years of age, and he wound up by asking him to help a poor orphan who had lost both father and mother."

These industries remind me of that poor orphan who was 47 years old, and who wanted this man to help him in his infantile state. The best protectionist writers have come to the conclusion that it takes about three generations to bring these infant industries to maturity so that they can stand alone. If we have to maintain these institutions with the National Policy for three generations, I think it is rather more than we can afford to do in justice to other interests in the country. Now, notwithstanding all the efforts that have been made to prevent our people trading with our neighbors across the border, and notwithstanding a protective tariff in Canada that is very high, and a still more objectionable one on the other side of the line, our necessities have been so great that we have climbed over these barriers and have traded to the extent of $35,000,000 or $36,000,000 a year. You cannot prevent our people trading with the United States; you may put on high tariffs, and protect this trade or that one, as you like, but the daily and hourly wants of the people of these two countries will overleap these obstacles. You do not diminish the trade between them, but you make it perplexing, annoying and discouraging by the obstructions you place upon it. You have a frontier of three or four thousand miles extending from the Pacific Ocean to the Bay of Fundy, and you are attempting to guard that frontier with custom house officers; yet you cannot prevent the people trading with each other. You are hunting up markets in other parts of the world, and you are passing by 65,000,000 of the best customers the world can give you. You are sending your commissioners to the South American Republics, to Spain, and even to China and Japan, but the trade will not come. My hon. friend told you that all your trade in the world outside of the United States and England amounted to only $7,000,000, and you are spending your money and time in vain to obtain customers in those countries. The best customers we have are our neighbors who are of the same kith and kin as ourselves; they are the only customers we have for a large surplus of our natural products. There are many of our products which we cannot send to England or consume at home, and we must find a market for them in the United States. I feel that I am speaking for the majority of the people in my county, and in the interest of the whole county, when I say that we must have that trade there. I do not justify smuggling; but I know the case of a man who went across the border to Eastport and bought two barrels of flour, took them home and ate them, and two years afterwards the Government fined him $60, and the vessel that brought the flour $100, because he did not go nine miles to a custom house and pay the duty on it. I do not justify smuggling, but these people feel such a necessity for free trade that they do not feel they are violating a moral law, but only a law that is against their interest. You have detectives all along the frontier, at salaries of $600 or $700 a year, who are pocketing $6,000 or $7,000 a year which is taken out of the pockets of our people who trade across the border. Our trade with the United States, in spite of all you have endeavored to do to prevent it, amounts to upwards of $25,000,000 a year, and if you had unrestricted trade with the United States it would have been to-day $70,000,000, and many of our young men would have remained at home to till the soil instead of laboring in a foreign country. If you will give us free trade with the United States, you will open up ten thousand channels of trade, you will open up those streams of commerce that you are retarding by your policy, and you will see Canada take a start onward. I do not exactly understand those leaps and bounds to wealth; the natural way to become wealthy is to be industrious and economical, and I have no idea that we shall become immensely wealthy in a few years; but we would be in the way of getting wealth, our people would be growing richer, and the difficulties that are continually in our way would be removed. Talk about a growing trade with all these restrictions put on it. You might as well undertake to grow a strong and vigorous man by putting ligaments around his limbs and stopping the circulation of the blood, as to expect trade to prosper with all these restrictions and impediments in the way, no country ever did or ever will progress or prosper unless it enjoys free and unrestricted trade. It is the same with nations as with individuals. They depend on one another. Suppose the United States were to act upon the principle on which hon. gentlemen opposite desire that we should act, and suppose they would refuse to sell us their raw material, what would become of our industrial establishments? Hon. gentlemen now oppose unrestricted trade with the United States in order to build up our manufactures. Protection has produced here its legitimate and natural fruit. You undertake to tax the people in order to make them buy your goods at higher prices, so as to enrich the few who are engaged in manufacturing, and you have failed even in that. You do not take the money out of the pockets of foreigners, but out of the pockets of Canadians, and thus inflict great injustice on the majority of the people. Nations cannot afford to be independent of each other any more than individuals. This resolution opens up a grand prospect for Canada, and I believe that if the people were appealed to, they would endorse the policy which it embodies. With regard to the legitimate fruits of the National Policy, what do we see now in Canada after a few years of its working? It has produced its natural fruit. We have now combines in all branches for the purpose of keeping up prices. We have been taught to pray to our Heavenly Father for our daily bread, but we have now to pray to a combination of millers who keep up the prices and serve the people in any way they chose. Instead of having to pray to our Heavenly Father, we have to pray to Mr. Drummond for our daily supply of sugar, and we have to pray to another combine for the cotton with which to clothe ourselves. And should we engage in strike, and wish to shuffle off this mortal coil, we have to get on our knees and beg Mr. Connel, or some other man in the rope business, to give us a few yards to hang ourselves with. If hon. gentlemen will look to England for an example in trade matters instead of the United States they would find out an example worthy of imitation. If you want to find out the effects of protection go to England and see what protection did for her. She suffered all the horrors and degradation protection could produce; her ships went idle at anchor in their harbors, her manufactures were idle, her looms were still and her spindles were resting. But she had men for the occasion who fought the battle of free trade nobly, and England to-day is the brightest example we can follow. England has laid the foundation in everything great and good, England has fought out the battle of personal freedom nobly, so that every Englishman is a freeman. I am loyal to the institutions of England. England has fought the battle of constitutional liberty, and every Englishman has a right to his opinion and the liberty of his person consistent with the laws and the good of society. England has fought out another large battle and that is freedom of principle. She is an example to the wide world, and the result her free trade policy is that she has the trade of all nations. I am proud of England. I am not loyal to that which is wrong. England has had upon the throne tyrants and imbeciles, and to those she has always had toadies. They had protection in Queen Elizabeth's time; there were guilds then one hundred years ago which are copied here to-day. Queen Elizabeth was proud of these combines, and said they were the finest flowers in her garden. The Prime Minister has the same system. He has omitted his policy of one hundred years ago, and the favored flowers in his garden are the monopolists and the combines. Those are the flowers in his garden. Those are the sycophants. Yes, they have always had such men, and the poor have been neglected. They have got the ear of the Crown under such circumstances, but the poor have had no one to speak for them. These men have the ear of the Crown now. They had when they introduced the National Policy, but in England the people rose above that. There are men in England who are true to principle, and they fought out this battle, and a hard battle it was, and forty-three years ago I was there, and I became a free trader, and I contributed my mite to the bazaars that were held in every town in England to raise funds to carry on that cause, and they succeeded because they were men of intelligence, men of integrity, men of honesty of character. There have always been men in England to battle for the right and to battle for principles. I am loyal to England, I am loyal to the principles that influence England, and I am loyal to the men who have brought about those grand results; but I am loyal to the people. The poor have few friends. I am not a demagogue. I do not appeal to the people on that account, but I know that the toiling mass are those who suffer. When I was in England as a lad, in my leisure hours, I used to walk about and talk to the men who were using the pickaxe and the shovel and the spade, and I learned from talking to them what their condition was, and I found what their wages were, and that their food was meal and the cheapest kind of food. They told me over and over again that it was a rare thing for them to be able to afford meat once a week for themselves and their families.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Free trade.

Mr. GILLMOR. That was the condition of England under protection. After the battle of free trade was fought England soon began to improve. Her ships found something to do, her looms started again, her spindles went on working, and she went on progressing from that time until this, not of course without dissatisfaction—it is the lot of mankind to have reverses—but her progress has been onward and upward ever since. That is only 43 or 44 years ago, only twice as long as we have been confederated. Up to that time the whole volume of English trade was something over eight hundred millions, while the annual trade of Great Britain is now three and a half billions, including exports and imports, and she is the admiration of the world, she is carrying her products to every country under the influence of free trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question. Go on.

Mr. GILLMOR. My friends need not be alarmed about me. Members of Parliament are supposed to be gentlemen, and I have always so endeavored to conduct myself in Parliament. In addition to that, I find by my notes that since that time the increase of England's wealth has been marvellous. I see that she has invested in foreign countries one billion five hundred million pounds sterling, and of that we have some five hundred million dollars in Canada. England has made that out of her free trade policy. Her investments all over the world, in consequence of the wealth she has gained under free trade, are bringing her in some sixty or seventy millions of pounds sterling annually from her investments abroad. The wealth of England is the result of free trade, and any people who want to get wealthy must follow her example and must not expect to get wealthy under a system of protection. Of course, we cannot expect such great results, because our population is sparse, but we have homes here for many millions more. I do not expect to live to see the great increase in our population which I am satisfied would result from the adoption of free trade, the increase in our population and in our wealth which would result from making our trade as free as possible, consistently with the raising of our revenues.

Mr. MADILL. May I ask the hon. gentleman if the English manufactures were not built up under the highest protection in the world, before England adopted free trade?

Mr. GILLMOR. That shows very little knowledge of English history. England held to protection until her manufactures were ruined, until her factories were shut down, until her people were out of employment, and there were two millions of paupers in the kingdom without food. Although they are not entirely rid of the poor, the country took a start from the moment she adopted free trade and has gone on until she is the pride of all nations, with a commerce greater than any other nation ever had. There is no doubt that there are some difficulties to be encountered if we succeed in getting this policy adopted. There is the question of revenue, which is all important. We collect on our imports from the United States a little more than seven millions of dollars. That has got to be met. There is some difficulty and there may be some friction in regard to these matters, but, if the people import forty million dollars worth from the United States, and pay $7,000,000 in duty, they pay $47,000,000. Will the people be any poorer? Will they not have the $7,000,000 and will they not be in just as good a position as they were before? There may be some difficulty in regard to the mode of obtaining it, but you will not deny that the whole $47,000,000 are here, and you have to get the $7,000,000 out of the people, who will be just as able to pay it as if they paid it in customs revenue. The only difficulty is how to get it. I do not know how that is to be done. I am not going to trouble myself as to that. I want to know what the difficulties are, but, if our contention is right, we will get over the difficulties. I think myself, that the plan suggested by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the best plan. If a part of it or the whole of it can be saved by economy, you will all agree with me that would be the better way. I think we can safely trust him in that respect, because, without making any invidious comparisons, I think he is about the ablest financier that I have seen in Canada since I have been in Parliament. I have no doubt about it. I do not wish to compliment men to their faces, but that is my impression. I have no trouble in that score. The people need have no fear of the bugbear of direct taxation. Taxation is always an unpleasant subject, and I suppose a Tory is just about as reluctant to pay as a Liberal. There are a good many ways of taxing the people, and of getting a revenue, but the usual way is a revenue tariff. In my humble opinion, of all things in the world that should be free, is trade. I think it is a fair way to get revenue by taxing trade, and that should be as free as the wind that blows, or as the flow of the ocean; and then people will get the money and be able to contribute it for the support of the institutions that civilised life requires. That is the best mode, I think, of raising a revenue. The next best mode is that of a revenue tariff, levied upon such articles as the people use most generally, and levied in such a way that the money should go into the treasury. But the worst tariff that evil-minded men, the worst tariff that the devil ever suggested, is a protective tariff. It takes millions out of the people and puts little into the treasury, but it puts a large amount into the pockets of those who are protected, and instead of paying 30 millions of revenue tax in this country, I do not hesitate to say that the people are paying twice that amount. Now, how long do you suppose the consumers of Canada would put up with a protective tariff if they really understood it? Suppose that instead of collecting your customs duty on the goods before they go into the store, you changed your policy and collected on the goods when they came out of the store. Suppose a customs officer instead of collecting the dues on the imports, would stand in a retail store and collect it there. Well, a customer would come in and he would pay for his pound of sugar, and when he came to leave the customs officer would step up and say, well now you have forgot to pay me so much on the sugar, and so on with all the articles of consumption. Then the people would realise how much they pay, then they will begin to enquire what this all means. But your system now is to pluck the goose, to take all the feathers off, and she don't squeal, she don't make a noise at all, but she stands cold and shivering and don't know who in the deuce took the feathers off her. You let them know how they are being taxed in this country, and your National Policy would vanish like thin air. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question of loyalty has been discussed. I think it was a great mistake. I think it is a great mistake to have introduced it into the discussion of this question at all. Now, I have not felt offended at all at anything hon. gentlemen may say. I thought it was silly—I thought it was wishy-washy nonsense. Yes, and I am satisfied that your sensible men on that side of the House thought the same. I think it is not an indication of your loyalty to begin here mouthing it as though it was oozing out from your fingers ends. It is all nonsense to talk about it. I suppose one party in this House is just about as loyal as the other, and you are no more loyal by talking about it than if you were to hold your tongues. I should advise you to hold your tongues about loyalty. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this tariff I had made up my mind not to refer to any speeches on the other side, but there is one gentleman from the county of Annapolis (Mr. Mills), who took a very singular view of this tariff of ours. He had discovered that it was just the tariff for a poor man who need not pay any duties if he did not buy anything. It was a wonderful discovery. But it was equally good to the rich, and if he did not choose to buy anything, he would not have to pay any duty either. I think if any one tried to live in this country on what he could get without paying taxes on it, he would either freeze to death or starve to death in a very short time. I do not know anything that is worth having that is not taxed. When this National Policy was being discussed, I had a daughter at home, and she was reading over the things that were taxed, and she wrote up to me and said: she could not find anything that was not taxed. She said: "Father, our Jersey cow has got a little calf, is that taxed?" I wrote back to quiet her fears, and told her that there was no tax upon a Jersey calf. Yet the hon. member for Annapolis says this is a very good tariff for the poor. He says they need not buy jewellery, and they need not buy optical instruments, nor perfumery, nor sausage, nor silks, nor jams, nor jellies, nor fancy soaps. He says that the poor man does not want any perfumed soap. They can make their soap out of lye and soap grease, and soft soap is good enough for them. I wonder if he would say that to one of his constituents down in Annapolis if he went to solicit their votes. He would have to use some little soft soap himself before he could convince them they had no right to use perfumed soap if they could get it. He says they do not want any jam or jellies. O, no! He wants a tariff under which they cannot have any jams or jellies. He thinks that molasses is good enough for them. The next item is musical instruments. The poor do not want musical instruments; such is the opinion of the hon. gentleman. Are they to be forever toiling from generation to generation, their children being debarred from learning to sing and play. Is that a good tariff for the poor, one which debars them from the pleasures and gratifications of life? Are they to toil on like cattle to be used by hon. gentlemen and work for them? They are not to have musical instruments. Why? Have not the poor man's children a right, laboring and toiling as they do, to become educated and accomplished if they can do it? It affords me much pleasure in travelling through my county to find a poor family who by industry and prudence have saved from their earnings sufficient to buy a musical instrument. Yet according to the hon. gentleman's theory this is a good tariff for them because they do not need those things and need not buy them? I hope the hon. gentleman's heart is better than his head. If those are his sentiments he is as cruel as the man who would make his ass bear his burdens, and because he could exist on thistles he would turn him out to eat thistles by the wayside. If he would treat the poor in that way, who perform the labor and produce the wealth of the Dominion, it is not worthy of any man in Canada. There is another set of asses called jackasses, who perform no labor. They live on clover, hay and oats, but the ass that toils can live on thistles. Next we come to watches. The poor need not buy watches for they do not need them, and yet the toiling masses are the foundation and source of wealth in Canada. What are our exports from the Dominion? They are the products of hard labor, of the toil of the fisherman, the farmer and the laborer; they produce all that goes out of the country to bring back wealth to support the Government and the lazy fellows who will not work. The working classes all over the world are tethered, they can go just so far, they can eat the length of their rope and see green pastures before them which they cannot reach,—and accordingly they are dissatisfied.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think this is very unfair to the hon. member who does not very often trouble the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order; and I think when I see there so many white chokers there has been too much Rideau Hall business to-night. The hon. member for Charlotte has a right to a hearing.

Mr. SPEAKER. The members will please keep order. What is the question of order?

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are disturbing the representative from Charlotte, and he has a right to a fair hearing. There has been too much white choker business about it, too much Rideau Hall about it. Go on, you will get a fair hearing.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not complain very much. It is evident hon. gentlemen opposite do not like what I say; I can sit quietly and listen to what they say and they might return the compliment, I will not speak longer, as I have spoken too long already.

Mr. MITCHELL. Talk as long as you like and you will get a hearing.

Mr. GILLMOR. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said there are fair traders in England, that the country was built up under a protective system and all such nonsense. I admit there is some such movement there, but it will be of short duration.

Mr. SPEAKER, I would ask hon. members to stop throwing papers. It is not a very nice or a very dignified practice, and it is one that should be stopped.

Mr. GILLMOR. I will stop, and then hon. gentlemen will be satisfied.

Mr. MITCHELL. Stop when you are done and not before.

Mr. GILLMOR. I was going to make a remark in regard to the speech delivered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which, without wishing to make invidious comparisons, I must say was the best delivered on the other side of the House:

"It is the triumph of man to overcome the disabilities which nature throws in his way. It is the triumph of modern science, than which nothing has been more wonderful in the history of the world to overcome geographical difficulties, to overcome the disabilities of distance, to overcome the obstruction of physical difficulties, and to overcome them in the interest of the unity of countries and in the interest of the spread of commerce."

Those are fine sentiments, and with his eloquence he made them appear very fine. It was an excellent argument for a free trader to use, but it was perfectly nonsensical for a protectionist. When you go to work to tunnel the Alps in order to facilitate trade and commerce and overcome natural obstacles between nations it is absurd to place German and Italian artificial obstructions on each side. Such has been the result of all that you have expended to overcome distances and to overcome time and those natural obstacles on which you spent so much money to remove were no more obstacles than the artificial obstacles which you have now. I will not trouble you any longer. I have given you the best of my judgment on this question, and I think it will be to the interest of Canada to have unrestricted reciprocity in the natural products of the United States and also in our manufactures. There are difficulties connected with it but they will be overcome and it will not affect our loyalty in the slightest degree. No man cares about loyalty when he is buying or selling, he cares not for his nationality, he cares not for his creed or color, the simple barter or exchange of one thing for another has nothing to do with those questions. England is just as loyal as she was before she opened her ports to the world. We shall be just as loyal to our religion and our country when we have free trade as we are now. I am satisfied we will not suffer in our patriotism or in our loyalty to Canada or in our loyalty to England. England has fought out many a battle and there is only one blot on her escutcheon. Let her give the right of self government to Ireland and when that is done, England shall be the brightest nation on the face of the earth. With these few remarks I beg to state that I intend to vote for the motion of my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the amendment moved by my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones).

M. PRÉFONTAINE: A cette heure avancée du matin, je n'ai pas l'intention de retenir cette Chambre bien longtemps. Mais sur une question aussi importante que celle qui nous est maintenant soumise, et qui occupe non-seulement l'attention de la Chambre des Communes du Canada, mais encore de tout le pays, et qui au dire de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat devra faire époque dans l'histoire des délibérations du parlement du Canada, je crois qu'il est de mon devoir, comme représentant un des comtés les plus importants de la province de Québec, de donner les raisons qui vont motiver mon vote sur cette question.

Je n'ai pas l'intention d'entrer beaucoup dans le mérite de la question; elle a été discutée depuis près de trois semaines, et les chiffres et les statistiques qui ont été donnés, même si je les répétais, n'ajouteraient aucun intérêt à la discussion. Mais ce qui m'a étonné dans les remarques faites par l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, c'est sa manière d'argumenter en voulant mettre l'opposition en contradiction sur cette question. Je crois qu'il ne me sera pas difficile de démontrer que s'il y a eu contradiction sur cette question, ce n'est certainement pas de ce côté-ci de la Chambre. Je pourrais le démontrer au moyen des arguments employés dans la discussion qui a eu lieu depuis que ce débat est commencé devant cette Chambre, mais je vais remonter un peu plus loin et relever certaines assertions que l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat a faites au sujet de la position prise par l'honorable chef de l'opposition et ses amis dans la province de Québec sur la réciprocité, la protection, et le libre-échange, lorsque ces questions sont devenues des questions publiques intéressant l'avenir de la Puissance du Canada.

L'honorable secrétaire d'Etat a voulu faire croire à cette Chambre qu'il a été le premier à parler de protection à nos manufactures dans la province de Québec; que plus tard l'honorable chef de l'opposition l'a suivi sur cette question avec ses amis et qu'ensuite en 1878, l'honorable chef de l'opposition et ses amis ont abandonné cette politique pour adopter celle du libre-échange.

Je crois qu'il est facile de démontrer que cette assertion ne repose pas sur les faits tels qu'ils se sont passés à cette époque. Il me suffira pour le démontrer de lire à la Chambre le rapport des assemblées de la Chambre de commerce du Canada et des assemblées des délégués de la Chambre de commerce du Canada avec les chambres de commerce des Etats-Unis en 1871, 1872 et 1873, où ces questions se sont soulevées pour la première fois. Je cite du "Négociant Canadien" à la date du 21 décembre 1871, les remarques suivantes qui ont été faites à une assemblée de la chambre nationale de commerce des Etats-Unis :

Entre les Etats-Unis et les colonies anglaises y adjacentes au nord, les relations commerciales devraient naturellement être aussi intimes et aussi étendues que celles qui existent dans les limites de l'union entre les divers Etats particuliers ou tout groupe particulier d'outre-mer. De fait la liaison naturelle entre le Canada et nos propres Etats du Nord, du Nord-Ouest et de l'Est est telle qu'il en existe d'aussi intime entre très peu d'Etats de notre Union. Plus de la moitié de la ligne de division des deux territoires est formée par un grand débouché naturel de communications commerciales par le plus beau et le plus utile canal maritime de trafic dont la nature ait doté le continent américain. Les lacs qui nous servent de limites nous lient plutôt qu'ils nous séparent du pays étranger qui se trouve de l'autre côté; tandis que de fait le grand fleuve par lequel leurs eaux s'épanchent vers la mer ne fait qu'ajouter à l'intimité de la liaison des deux pays.

La péninsule canadienne entre les lacs est placée comme un coin dans le territoire américain. C'est à travers que se trouve la route la plus courte entre nos Etats du Nord-Ouest et ceux de l'Est. Géographiquement, dans la structure naturelle de cette zone énergique du continent qui se trouve entre le quarantième et le quarante-sixième parallèle, la province d'Ontario occupe relativement au commerce entre l'est et l'ouest, la position de clef de route.

Cet orateur continue à faire des remarques pour expliquer plus en détail la position avantageuse qu'occupe la voie de communication du Saint-Laurent pour les produits de l'ouest des Etats-Unis. Ces paroles étaient prononcées par M. Larned, agent spécial chargé par le Secrétaire du Trésor, en vertu d'une résolution du Congrès, de s'enquérir de l'état et de l'étendue du commerce des Etats-Unis, avec les divers colonies britanniques dans l'Amérique du Nord. Maintenant, voici la résolution définitive qui a été adoptée quelque temps après, à la conférence de Boston :

"Les propositions suivantes furent soumises verbalement par le président aux délégués de la Puissance. Les voici pour l'information de la Chambre et de ses membres :

1. L'introduction en franchise de tous les articles de manufacture et des produits du Canada aux Etats-Unis et vice versa.

2. L'adoption des lois uniformes pour les deux pays pour l'imposition des droits d'importation et pour la taxation intérieure, le montant collecté devant être placé dans un trésor commun et divisé entre les deux gouvernements d'une manière équitable.

3. L'admission de vaisseaux canadiens sur registres américains et à tous les privilèges du commerce des côtes américaines et à l'étranger.

4. L'élargissement par la Puissance de ses canaux et l'amélioration de la navigation du St. Laurent, outre l'aide qu'elle devra accorder pour la construction d'un grand chemin de fer international; les Américains devant avoir les mêmes droits que les Canadiens, et ceux-ci, les mêmes droits que les Américains à des ouvrages semblables dans les Etats-Unis."

De sorte que déjà à cette époque, l'on discutait non seulement le renouvellement du traité de réciprocité, mais on discutait l'union commerciale. La proposition qui est maintenant devant cette Chambre ne demande pas du tout l'union commerciale, mais est simplement une expression d'opinion en faveur d'un traité de réciprocité illimitée. C'est précisément la position que prenaient nos délégués canadiens aux différentes assemblées où cette question a été discutée, soit dans les assemblées de la Chambre de Commerce de la Puissance du Canada, soit dans les assemblées des délégués des deux pays.

Maintenant, s'il m'est permis de citer les délibérations de la Chambre de Commerce de la Puissance, qu'y voyons-nous? Mais avant de lire la résolution qui a été adoptée, je dois donner les résultats de l'assemblée et les noms de ceux qui représentaient les différents intérêts du commerce à cette assemblée: Ce sont MM. Fairweather, de St. Jean, N. B.; J. Watson, d'Hamilton; W. H. Howland, de Toronto; John Carruthers, de Kingston; John McLennan, Thomas Rimmer, John Young, et W. J. Patterson, de Montréal. Je trouve dans le Négociant Canadien, en date du 25 janvier 1872, le rapport suivant à la séance tenue par la Chambre de Commerce de la Puissance le 17 janvier 1882 :

Le résultat de la réunion de la Chambre nationale de commerce des Etats-Unis fut la résolution d'adresser un mémoire au Congrès pour le prier de nommer une commission chargée de rencontrer des commissaires canadiens et de négocier les bases d'un nouveau traité de réciprocité commerciale. On suggéra que ce traité fût basé sur l'échange libre de produits naturels et manufacturés; l'admission des vaisseaux canadiens à l'enregistrement américain, la liberté du cabotage et l'agrandissement des canaux canadiens, qui sera très profitable aux deux pays.

Cependant nos délégués, désireux de faire revivre l'ancien traité de réciprocité ne purent mettre la possibilité du libre échange des produits manufacturés, avec le haut tarif américain actuel. Voici les résolutions adoptées par la convention de St. Louis:—

Résolu:—Que le Conseil Exécutif reçoive instruction de demander au Congrès de pourvoir à la nomination d'une commission qui rencontrerait des commissaires du Canada si le gouvernement de ce pays se décide à en nommer, dans le but de négocier un traité entre l'Angleterre et les Etats-Unis, pour encourager le commerce entre le Canada et l'union américaine, basé sur les principes suivants ou quelques autres, également larges et bien définis :

20 L'adoption de lois uniformes pour les deux pays pour l'imposition des droits d'importation et pour la taxation intérieure, le montant collecté devant être placé dans un trésor commun et divisé entre les deux gouvernements d'une manière équitable.

Et à la date du 18 janvier 1872 quelle était l'expression d'opinion? Alors les hommes les plus importants du commerce de Montréal—et qu'il me suffise de citer M. Hugh McLennan—faisaient la même objection que celle qui est faite maintenant, c'est-à-dire que si on continuait à vouloir obtenir un traité de réciprocité, cela pouvait nous amener à l'annexion. On pousse le même cri aujourd'hui, et l'on dit que c'est de la déloyauté. Voici ce que M. Hugh McLennan disait, tel que rapporté au Négociant Canadien :

M. Hugh McLennan pense que l'objection ne vaut rien et que le Canada est fort en état de se maintenir à côté des Etats-Unis avec l'union douanière. Le cri de loyauté ressemble beaucoup aux sifflements de certaines gens pour soutenir leur courage. La difficulté avec la question de l'union douanière est tout simplement qu'elle n'est pas comprise.

Toutefois on comprend que si des relations commerciales avec les Etats-Unis étaient établies sur une base plus large, plus équitable et plus avantageuse pour les deux pays, la question d'annexion n'avait rien à faire avec cela et ne pouvait être une objection sérieuse.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, je crois avoir démontré assez clairement que dès 1871 et 1872, cette question de réciprocité était discutée par les représentants du commerce de la Puissance et qu'ils essayaient de s'entendre sur ce point avec les représentants du commerce des Etats Unis. Quelle a été, après cette date, la politique—si je puis la qualifier ainsi—ou la conduite du commerce de la Puissance du Canada?

Ecoutons ce que disait le rédacteur du Négociant Canadien le 1er février 1872. A la suite d'un long article sur la réciprocité, il terminait ainsi :

Un traité de réciprocité complète basé sur l'uniformité des tarifs.

Cette solution offre tous les avantages sans aucun des inconvénients de l'union douanière et de l'annexion.

Pour notre part nous nous y rallions complètement.

Et si on continue à suivre la marche des faits et des événements, on trouve qu'à la date du 27 juin 1872, à la suite d'une longue discussion sur cette même question, on en est arrivé à la conclusion suivante, mes renseignements sont encore puisés au Négociant Canadien :

Il suit donc que dans l'intérêt de l'industrie et de l'agriculture, deux choses sont nécessaires :

La protection d'un côté.

Un marché libre et plus étendu, de l'autre.

Or, toutes ces conditions se trouveraient réunies et tous les intérêts seraient conciliés par un traité de réciprocité basé sur l'uniformité du tarif. Nous avons traité cette question à plusieurs reprises, mais nous ne pouvons nous lasser d'y revenir, tant pour nous la chose est évidente. Nous sommes convaincus qu'un traité de réciprocité est absolument nécessaire à l'agriculture pour la raviver, et lui permettre de faire des affaires profitables. Les industriels nous disent, qu'un tarif plus élevé aurait pour résultat de multiplier les manufactures, d'employer une nombreuse population que l'émigration décime, de mettre la production au niveau de la consommation. Enfin le commerce a tout à gagner à multiplier ses relations avec nos voisins, à voir tomber les lois de navigation qui excluent nos navires des eaux américaines, et aussi la libre navigation des lacs et des canaux américains.

Or, tous ces avantages se trouveraient réunis dans un traité de réciprocité complet, et comme les Etats-Unis ne peuvent évidemment nous l'octroyer que si nous adoptons les mêmes lois fiscales qu'eux, il est évident que nous devrions être prêts à accepter cette solution politique et facile de toutes les difficultés.

Ce que nous demandons donnerait—

1o A l'agriculture le vaste marché américain.

2o A l'industrie la protection qu'elle réclame.

3o Au commerce un vaste champ nouveau, qu'il ne pourrait manquer de développer à son avantage.

Le commerce américain est tellement estimé que le Canada n'hésite pas à dépenser des millions pour l'agrandissement des canaux. S'il est si important tout embarrassé qu'il soit, que serait-il donc s'il était libre? Les amis de la prospérité du Canada prennent donc pour mot d'ordre :—

Conclusion d'un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis, basé sur l'uniformité des tarifs.

—Si cela ne réussit pas, il est évident qu'il faudra que le parlement accueille les suggestions du comité de l'industrie, car un intérêt aussi considérable ne peut rester longtemps en souffrance.

Par conséquent, à cette époque, le but vers lequel tendaient les hommes d'affaires de la Puissance, pour remédier à la stagnation des affaires, était d'obtenir un traité de réciprocité complet avec les Etats-Unis.

On s'est servi de l'expression : "illimitée" dans la motion qui est maintenant devant la Chambre, mais cela ne fait pas de différence, cela signifie la même chose.

Examinons encore la marche des événements, cela est important, malgré que je comprenne qu'une discussion de ce genre, à cette heure avancée, n'ait pas tout l'intérêt qu'elle avait au commencement; mais l'on a fait allusion à la position prise par certains hommes politiques en 1872 sur cette question. Et l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat a fait ressortir d'une manière particulière celle qu'il a prise personnellement; voulant donner à entendre que, le premier, il avait parlé du renouvellement du traité de réciprocité ou d'une politique favorable aux manufactures.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, quels sont les faits? Les voici: En 1871, le parti national fut fondé à Montréal, et un des premiers articles de son programme fut le renouvellement du traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis, c'était la protection incidente accordée à nos manufactures. Quelle fut la position prise par l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat et ses amis dans les élections qui eurent lieu alors dans le district de Montréal? On se rappelle que Sir George E. Cartier était candidat dans Montréal-Est et que l'honorable John Young était candidat dans Montréal-Ouest, ce dernier supporté par le parti national et par l'opposition d'alors. On se rappelle aussi que M. L. A. Jetté était candidat dans Montréal-Est contre Sir George E. Cartier.

Mr. PRÉFONTEINE.

Voici, la circulaire qui fut adressée à l'honorable John Young par M. John J. McLaren, secrétaire de l'Association industrielle de Montréal :—

MONTRÉAL, 30 juillet 1872.

MONSIEUR,—A une réunion du conseil de l'Association industrielle, qui a eu lieu le 27 courant, la résolution suivante a été adoptée :

Que MM. Henry Lyman, E. K. Greene, W. Rodden, A. W. O'Gilvie et H. R. Ives forment, avec le secrétaire, un comité chargé de correspondre avec les candidats parlementaires en cette ville pour s'assurer jusqu'à quel point, chacun d'eux, s'il est élu, est disposé à coopérer à la réalisation du but de cette association, qui est l'encouragement des intérêts industriels de ce pays.

Cette association se compose de la presque totalité des grands manufacturiers et entrepreneurs de cette ville unis dans le but mentionné dans sa constitution, dont une copie nous est transmise.

Croyant qu'il est essentiel au progrès et à la grandeur du pays que cet objet soit atteint, ses membres désirent connaître les opinions de ceux qui briguent leurs suffrages, à savoir si dans le cas de leur élection ils seraient disposés à promouvoir telle législation qui encouragera notre industrie et conséquemment fournira un travail plus constant et plus rémunérateur aux ouvriers, assurera le marché national à la production nationale et augmentera la population et la richesse de la Puissance.

C'est pourquoi j'ai reçu instruction du comité ci-dessus nommé de vous prier de nous dire d'une manière aussi claire que possible et pour l'information de l'association, votre opinion sur les trois points suivants :

1. Jusqu'à quel point approuvez-vous les principes de la protection en tant qu'applicables à ce pays et opposés à ceux du libre-échange?

2. Jusqu'à quel point seriez-vous disposés à aider à l'obtention du but de cette association pour le développement des intérêts industriels du Canada et

3. Quelles mesures législatives recommanderiez-vous en parlant de ces principes

Une prompt réponse obligerait beaucoup

Votre, etc.,

JOHN J. McLAREN,

Sec. Ass. Indust. de Montréal.

Voici la réponse de l'honorable John Young. Je citerai un des traits saillants de cette réponse :

Ce qu'il faut cependant au Canada pour le développement de son industrie manufacturière est un marché plus étendu, et nous pouvons l'obtenir par un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis.

L'union des diverses provinces sous le contrôle d'un seul gouvernement central garantissant l'introduction libre des produits de chacune a produit et produira d'excellents résultats, mais il est indubitable qu'ils ne feront que suivre le progrès de notre population.

C'est pourquoi en ne négligeant rien de ce qui pourrait promouvoir les intérêts manufacturiers, j'espère que mes efforts passés dans ce but seront une garantie pour l'avenir, et que j'obtiendrai le support et la confiance des membres de votre association comme candidat à la représentation de la division Ouest de Montréal, car ce sera pour moi un plaisir et une satisfaction de faire tout en mon pouvoir dans les intérêts de l'industrie manufacturière.

Eh bien! quelle était la position prise à la même date par M. George A. Drummond, le candidat opposé à l'honorable John Young? M. Drummond ne prenait pas une position aussi définie que M. Young sur cette question, et le résultat de l'élection, malgré qu'il fut supporté alors de toute l'éloquence de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, a été sa défaite par une majorité d'au delà de 800 voix dans une division tory de la cité de Montréal.

Maintenant, si nous voyons la position prise par M. L. A. Jetté, alors candidat contre Sir George E. Cartier, nous trouvons qu'il a donné des réponses tellement satisfaisantes, tellement claires, aux questions qui lui étaient posées par l'Association industrielle, qu'il fut élu par une majorité écrasante dans la division Est de Montréal contre Sir George E. Cartier, qui alors était supporté du talent oratoire de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, mais qui n'avait pas donné de réponses satisfaisantes à l'Association industrielle.

Or, si l'on essaie de faire croire qu'il y a eu contradiction chez les membres du parti auquel j'appartiens, je réponds,—et les faits sont là pour le démontrer,—qu'il n'y a pas eu telle contradiction de notre part, mais qu'au contraire, la contradiction se trouve chez les membres de l'autre côté de la Chambre qui ont suivi sur cette question une politique d'expédients, et pas autre chose. Ces messieurs n'ont jamais voulu prendre d'engagements formels; ils n'ont jamais voulu définir leur position d'une manière claire, afin de suivre toujours une politique opportuniste et se conduire selon les événements.

Nous arrivons maintenant à 1888. Lorsqu'à la suite de la crise sérieuse qui a sévi non seulement au Canada,—parce que le commerce du Canada n'était pas assez considérable à cette époque pour affecter le monde entier,—mais encore aux Etats-Unis et dans les autres pays de l'Amérique du Nord et de l'Amérique du Sud, notre marché naturel nous étant fermé, nous étions, en 1878, dans une position financière des plus critiques. Le peuple était naturellement prêt à accepter ceux qui venaient lui dire qu'ils avaient un remède pour tous les maux; qu'ils avaient un remède pour favoriser l'agriculture, pour promouvoir les industries, pour donner de l'ouvrage aux ouvriers, enfin, un remède universel qui devait donner satisfaction à tout le monde. Il n'y a rien d'étonnant qu'avec l'excitation qui existait alors et les préjugés que l'on a soulevés, le gouvernement de M. Mackenzie ait été renversé.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, ce remède a été appliqué, et d'année en année, on est venu devant le parlement du Canada demander une augmentation des droits sur ceci ou cela, selon que cela faisait l'affaire de celui-ci ou de celui-là. Et ce soir qu'avons-nous entendu dans les discours qui ont été prononcés de l'autre côté de la Chambre? Nous avons entendu l'honorable député d'Argenteuil (M. Wilson) nous représenter sous des couleurs exceptionnellement avantageuses le système de la protection à outrance; c'est-à-dire l'imposition des droits les plus élevés possibles pour favoriser quelques manufactures particulières. Mais la chose se comprend parfaitement. A venir jusqu'à l'élection du député d'Argenteuil, en 1887, le gouvernement avait négligé de protéger une certaine branche d'industrie particulière qui existait comme industrie naissante: l'industrie de la manufacture du papier de soie et de sacs de papier. Aussitôt après l'élection de l'honorable député, durant la session de l'année dernière, on a vu les droits déjà élevés sur ces objets portés à 35 pour cent. Je comprends parfaitement que l'honorable député veuille nous faire monter sur une montagne bien élevée, pour considérer de là les avantages de la protection à outrance. Mais, M. l'Orateur, nous ne sommes pas dans la même position que l'honorable député d'Argenteuil; nous ne sommes pas intéressés dans une manufacture de papier comme celle qu'il possède et qui est protégée à raison de 35 pour cent pour son bénéfice particulier, et nous ne pouvons pas voir les choses de la même manière; et nous ne voyons, nous, que cette protection à outrance n'a été accordée que pour favoriser certains industriels qui sont en petit nombre au détriment du plus grand nombre.

M. l'Orateur, le commerce général de la Puissance du Canada a pris un intérêt particulier à la question qui est maintenant devant la Chambre: les manufacturiers se sont intéressés à cette question et je puis dire que l'on ne pourrait pas indiquer un seul manufacturier sérieux qui soit opposé à un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. Au contraire, des manufacturiers comme M. Boaz, de Saint-Hyacinthe, M. Thomas Willett, de Chambly, l'un des plus grands manufacturiers de laine et de flanelle dans la Puissance du Canada, ont assez confiance dans leur travail, dans leur industrie, dans leur capacité pour dire: Donnez-nous le marché des Etats-Unis; donnez-nous un marché de 60,000,000 d'âmes et nous serons satisfaits; nous sommes aussi intelligents que les Américains; nous avons la main-d'œuvre à aussi bonnes conditions qu'eux; nous pouvons produire des marchandises à aussi bon marché qu'aux Etats-Unis et nous sommes prêts à soutenir leur concurrence dans les différentes industries que nous exploitons. Mais on trouvera, comme je le comprends parfaitement, certains industriels qui veulent profiter d'un haut tarif afin de s'en-richir sous le plus court délai possible au détriment du plus grand nombre.

Je dis donc qu'il n'y a pas eu de contradiction de la part des membres de l'opposition sur cette question-là. Nous avons toujours suivi la même ligne de conduite; mais nous n'avons pas voulu suivre nos honorables amis de l'autre côté de la Chambre dans les extrêmes où ils ont voulu nous entraîner, et alors ils ont prétendu que nous étions quand même libre-échangistes.

Eh bien! M. l'Orateur, il est important de comprendre ce que c'est que d'être libre-échangiste. On peut être libre-échangiste en principe? Je considère que c'est la saine doctrine, que c'est la doctrine la plus juste et la plus équitable et celle qui devrait être acceptée. Mais pour être libre-échangiste au Canada, il faudrait que le pays faisant le commerce avec nous soit libre-échangiste aussi. Or, nous ne sommes pas dans des conditions pour établir le libre-échange d'une manière illimitée; il nous faut des revenus pour subvenir aux dépenses, et il nous faut ce qu'on appelle la protection incidente, c'est-à-dire une protection suffisante pour encourager nos manufactures dans une mesure raisonnable de manière à donner à ceux qui investissent leur argent dans ces industries un revenu raisonnable sur le capital ainsi engagé.

Mais il ne s'agit pas de là que l'on doit donner une protection illimitée aux manufacturiers et leur fournir ainsi l'occasion de se combiner ensemble pour réduire leur production ou pour vendre à des prix fixés d'avance et imposer des amendes considérables à ceux d'entre eux qui enfreignent aucun des règlements que ces associations ont décrétés.

La protection telle que l'entendent les honorables députés de la droite, a été expérimentée, et elle n'a pas guéri les plus grands maux dont souffraient le pays. Je crois donc qu'il est raisonnable de se demander si on ne doit pas aller au delà, c'est-à-dire enlever les droits, en faisant un traité de réciprocité, avec un pays voisin, ayant une population de soixante millions d'âmes, et étant notre marché naturel. C'est là la position logique que l'opposition prend sur cette question. Elle est non seulement logique, mais elle est d'accord avec les principes. Et afin de démontrer que, s'il y a contradiction, elle se trouve de l'autre côté de la Chambre, cette position est d'accord avec les idées exprimées par l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat (M. Chapleau), et par l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur (M. White). Et pour établir ce que j'avance, il me suffira de citer un article publié dans le Montreal Gazette en date du 12 octobre 1885, journal publié sous les ordres et inspiré par l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur.

"C'est un fait historique que la politique protectionniste n'a reçu l'appui du parti conservateur aux élections de 1878, que parce qu'elle était un moyen de hâter des relations de réciprocité commerciale avec les Etats-Unis. En 1878, pendant que les deux partis favorisaient la réciprocité commerciale, les conservateurs seuls ont adopté une politique de nature à amener ce résultat. A la première occasion qui suivit les élections générales, le gouvernement conservateur voulant montrer ses vives sympathies pour la réciprocité, mit dans nos statuts une invitation au Congrès américain de laisser entrer en franchise nos produits naturels en échange des leurs."

Et le 26 octobre 1885 on a trouvé ceci dans le même journal:

"En attendant, nous ne pouvons que pratiquer la vertu de patience, avec l'espoir de voir prédominer dans le Congrès un sentiment favorable à la réciprocité, et, si cette espérance est déçue, le Canada doit se mettre à l'œuvre pour trouver d'autres moyens de développer son commerce."

Où est la preuve, où est-il constaté, M. l'Orateur, que le gouvernement, dont fait partie l'honorable ministre de l'Intérieur (M. White) ait tenté de nous donner un traité de réciprocité, ou même des relations commerciales plus étendues avec les Etats-Unis? On ne l'a pas fait, on ne l'a pas tenté. Et cependant, lorsque la question est prise en mains par l'opposition, dans ce parlement, on vient lui répondre par des arguments comme ceux-ci: On nous accuse de déloyauté et d'annexionnistes.

Dans une discussion aussi sérieuse il n'est pas permis de faire des drôleries. Et les réponses données par nos adversaires ressemblent beaucoup à celle que donnait un individu à qui quelqu'un demandait si son frère savait bien chanter. Il répondit : non, il ne sait pas chanter, mais il court très fort.... Comme si cela pourrait être une réponse à la question qui lui était posée. L'opposition parle de réciprocité, et on lui répond : annexion et déloyauté.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, je crois que le peuple comprendra parfaitement la question à la suite de cette discussion. Il comprendra que le gouvernement, ainsi que ses partisans n'ont pas donné la réponse qu'ils devaient donner, ni par la bouche de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, ni par celle de l'honorable ministre de l'intérieur ; mais il verra qu'au contraire l'honorable ministre des finances, (sir Charles Tupper), s'est chargé, lui, de donner une réponse qui est une approbation de la position que nous prenons maintenant. Il s'est chargé de contre-faire les arguments de certains de ses propres partisans ; et qu'il me suffise de mentionner le discours de l'honorable député de Welland (M. Ferguson), lequel a pris la peine de mentionner certains articles qui ne devaient pas être admis en franchise, parce que cela aurait pour effet de ruiner une branche de commerce considérable qu'il prétendait connaître parfaitement.

Deux jours après, l'honorable ministre des finances venait déclarer à la Chambre que ces mêmes articles allaient être admis en franchise et qu'on allait ouvrir des négociations avec les Etats-Unis pour l'admission d'autres produits, en considération de certains avantages que les Etats-Unis seraient prêts à faire au gouvernement canadien. Par conséquent, s'il y a eu contradiction, ce n'est assurément pas de ce côté de la Chambre.

Comme cette discussion n'est pas faite uniquement dans l'intérêt des députés, mais encore dans l'intérêt des électeurs, il est important que tous les faits soient rapportés, afin de fournir des arguments à ceux qui sont favorables au traité de réciprocité, afin d'éclairer le peuple qui lui est en grande majorité favorable. Car cette question sera soulevée dans toutes élections qui auront lieu d'ici aux élections générales. Elle a été discutée dans deux comtés de la province de Québec ces jours derniers, et l'on ne pourra pas raisonnablement prétendre que la province de Québec ne s'est pas déclarée — autant qu'il était possible de le faire dans les circonstances — entièrement favorable à un traité de réciprocité. Je n'ai pas pris part particulièrement à l'élection qui vient d'avoir lieu dans le comté de Missisquoi, mais l'honorable député de Brome (M. Fisher) y a pris part, et je sais avec quel acharnement on l'a attaqué dans les journaux ministériels à l'égard du discours qu'il a prononcé à West Farnham, discours en faveur du traité de réciprocité.

Et quel a été le résultat de l'élection ? C'est que dans les endroits les plus conservateurs du comté, là où le candidat libéral n'espérait pas avoir une majorité, où il croyait même être battu par des majorités considérables, le nombre de ses partisans a augmenté d'une manière si notable qu'il s'est trouvé, le soir de la votation, à la tête du poll, dans ce comté qui jusque-là avait toujours été un comté tory et qui aux dernières élections n'avait été remporté par notre regretté ami, M. Clayes, que grâce à la division qui existait alors dans les rangs du parti tory.

Mais je ne veux pas parler de cette élection parce que, comme je l'ai dit, je n'y ai pas pris une part active ; je ne suis renseigné que par ce qui a été publié dans les journaux et par ce que l'on m'a rapporté.

Mais une élection a eu lieu mardi dernier dans un comté essentiellement canadien-français, le comté de L'Assomption. Dans ce comté, la question a été posée carrément par le chef de l'opposition entre les adversaires d'un traité de réciprocité et ceux qui étaient favorables à ce traité. L'honorable chef de l'opposition a demandé aux conservateurs du comté de L'Assomption de supporter la candidature de notre ami M. Gauthier parce que les membres de l'oppo-sition étaient favorables à un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. La question a été posée carrément à la classe agricole du comté de L'Assomption, et la discussion a été engagée sur ce terrain.

M. GIROUARD: Mon honorable ami me permettra-t-il de l'interrompre. Le jour de la nomination j'étais à L'Assomption et j'ai demandé à M. Gauthier s'il supporterait la résolution de sir Richard Cartwright et il a répondu que n'ayant pas étudié la question, il n'était pas en état de donner une opinion.

M. PREFONTAINE: Vous n'étiez pas là le jour de la votation.

M. GIROUARD: J'y étais le jour de la nomination, et j'ai entendu la réponse de M. Gauthier de mes propres oreilles.

M. PREFONTAINE: Les électeurs qui ont supporté la candidature de M. Gauthier l'ont supportée sur cette question-là. Qu'est-ce que cela peut faire que M. Gauthier ne fût pas prêt de se prononcer sur la question ? Est-ce que l'honorable député de Jacques Cartier (M. Girouard) s'est toujours prononcé de la même façon sur chaque question ? Je dis que le jour de la grande assemblée où le chef de l'opposition a adressé la parole la question de la réciprocité a été posée carrément comme politique avouée par l'opposition, comme étant la plus avantageuse à la classe agricole. La discussion a été acceptée sur ce terrain par les amis du gouvernement ; il y avait là M. Bisailon, M. Joseph Tassé, le propriétaire rédacteur du journal ministériel le plus important de Montréal, M. Desjardins, le député local de Montmorency, le député du comté de Provencher (M. Royal) et tous ont accepté la discussion sur ce terrain, et les arguments qu'ils ont fait valoir à l'encontre de ceux que nous présentions aux électeurs intelligents du comté de L'Assomption étaient les mêmes arguments que l'on a fait valoir dans cette Chambre, c'est-à-dire que le traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis serait déloyal ; c'était déloyal de le demander, c'était prêcher l'annexion, et plus que cela, l'un des orateurs a même été jusqu'au point de répéter l'absurdité qui a été dite ici que, s'il y avait un droit de vingt pour cent sur les chevaux exportés aux Etats-Unis, de dix pour cent sur le beurre, de deux piastres par tonne sur le foin, ce n'était pas le cultivateur canadien exportateur de ces produits qui perdait ces sommes, mais que c'était l'acheteur. Alors nous avons demandé à ces messieurs si c'était en vertu de ce principe que les marchands de foin canadiens étaient actuellement en négociations avec le gouvernement américain pour se faire rembourser le surplus des droits qu'ils avaient payés à la douane américaine pendant cinq ans sur l'exportation de certains produits agricoles. Naturellement ces messieurs n'ont pas pu répondre à cette question, et les électeurs ont bien compris de quel côté était la raison, de quel côté était leur intérêt. Et dans ce comté, où le député en février 1887, M. Gauthier, n'était élu que par 21 voix, le soir du 3 avril au décompte du scrutin, dans les mêmes conditions, dans les mêmes circonstances, mais avec une politique parfaitement définie de la part de l'opposition, ils s'engageaient de le supporter dans la Chambre des Communes, et il était élu par une majorité de près de 100 voix.

Voilà, par conséquent, une preuve évidente que dans la province de Québec au moins, on comprend cette question de la réciprocité ; on l'a toujours comprise et on l'a comprise toujours. On comprend que si nous pouvons avoir avec les Etats-Unis un traité de réciprocité ; si nous pouvons avoir des relations commerciales plus étendues que celles que nous avons maintenant, il n'y a pas un homme raisonnable indépendant qui peut prétendre que cela ne serait pas à l'avantage du commerce canadien. On nous répond que cette proposition ne rencontrera pas les vues de la majorité de la Chambre et qu'elle va être rejetée par une majorité considérable. Cela ne fait rien, M. l'Orateur. L'opposition met sa politique devant le pays afin que le pays puisse la discuter et la juger. Il tâche de la faire comprendre au peuple afin que lorsque l'occasion se présentera d'aller devant l'électorat, les électeurs puissent décider si nous devons avoir les avantages d'un traité de réciprocité qui a été demandé d'une manière spéciale et avoué non-seulement par les membres du parti libéral, mais par les membres du parti conservateur depuis au delà de vingt ans.

M. l'Orateur, je pourrais continuer à démontrer l'effet que peut avoir cette politique de l'opposition au point de vue de la Puissance du Canada, mais à cette heure avancée de la soirée, je n'ai pas l'intention d'abuser de la patience de cette Chambre. Je ne puis reprendre mon siège cependant sans attirer l'attention de la Chambre sur le fait que pour combattre cette politique on a essayé de tourner en ridicule la position que l'opposition prend sur cette question. On est découragé de voir que l'opposition va maintenant se trouver avec une plate-forme parfaitement définie et que la question va se poser carrément devant les électeurs de la Puissance du Canada entre le parti qui ne veut pas de la réciprocité avec les États-Unis, et le parti qui déclare qu'il est favorable à ce traité; qu'il est favorable à une politique qui donnera au commerce de la Puissance les ressources dont il a besoin pour se relever de l'état de stagnation dans lequel il se trouve, et pour pouvoir progresser comme il devrait le faire.

Mr. McCULLA. I understand that an arrangement had been come to that the debate should have been brought to a close after the speech of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). If that arrangement is to be carried out now, I shall reserve my remarks for another occasion.

Mr. TROW. Our friend who has just taken his seat was not aware of the arrangement made, otherwise he would have been the last man to attempt to violate the rule of the party.

House divided on amendment to the amendment (Mr. Jones):

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Monday, April 9, 1888.

No. 30.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 9th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the return of David Bishop Meigs, Esq., for the Electoral District of Missisquoi.

REPORT OF RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. MILLS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works when we may expect copies of the report of the Railway Commission? Several weeks have gone by since the blue-book was laid upon the Table, and none of us have received copies yet. I have enquired at the Distribution Office and I found it has not been received there yet.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I shall enquire and inform the hon. gentleman later.

THE FISHERY COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Railways, in the absence of the Minister of Finance. It was announced by the Premier on Friday, before the adjournment, that the hon. the Minister of Finance would probably proceed with the discussion on the Washington Treaty to-morrow. I intended to suggest to the Minister of Finance, if he had been here, the advisability of submitting a chart of the coast, showing the delimitations of the coast, which would render the discussion much more intelligent to those of us who may not very well be able to follow the debate otherwise. I understand the matter very well myself, but I think the House, generally, would understand it much better if a chart were exhibited, showing the delimitation of the coast as proposed under the treaty. I believe that if the Government thinks it advisable there is plenty of time to procure a chart, and it would render the discussion much easier and much more intelligible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I shall mention this matter to my colleague as soon as he comes in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest that not only the line of delimitation as marked under the treaty should be laid down, but also the line claimed by the Government of Canada prior to the meeting of the commissioners.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 26) to confirm a certain agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Canada Southern Railway Company, and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 77) to confirm a certain agreement made between the London and South Eastern Railway Company and the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 16) to incorporate the Chinook Belt and Peace River Railway Company.—(Mr. Perley, Assiniboia.)

Bill (No. 52) to amend the Act to incorporate the Maskinongé and Nipissing Railway Company.—(Mr. Coulombe.)

INDIAN RESERVE, BRANT AND HALDIMAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether any person has been appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Dr. McKinnon, late physician in the Indian Reserve of Brant and Haldimand?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No appointment has been made. Dr. Dee is doing the duty in the meantime.

SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES, MONTREAL DISTRICT.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. PRÉFONTAINE) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to increase the number of Judges of the Superior Court for the District of Montreal?

Mr. THOMPSON. That matter is now being considered.

COURT OF APPEAL, QUEBEC.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. PRÉFONTAINE) asked, Whether it is to the knowledge of the Minister of Justice, that for the two last terms of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Quebec, sitting in Appeal, only four of the Honorable Judges of the said Court have been present? If the answer is in the affirmative, whether it is the intention of the Government to rectify this state of affairs?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been informed that the Court has been regularly constituted, under the legislation of the Province of Quebec, for the last two terms.

ENGAGEMENT OF HENRY SMYTH.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1st. The date of Henry Smyth's engagement? 2nd. The date at which his services were dispensed with? 3rd. The amount per diem or month paid him for travelling expenses? 4th. The entire sum paid him for travelling or other expenses? 5th. The entire sum paid for services of any kind, and travelling and other expenses from the 1st of January, 1887, to 1st of March, 1888?

Mr. CARLING. Only a few days ago, I think, I answered the same questions as those now made by the hon. member. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to put a motion on the paper, I will endeavor to bring down the necessary papers.

THE THOROLD CANAL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to let the water-power on the new canal in the vicinity of Thorold; and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are not in a position to give an answer now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not as to whether you will let the water-power at all or not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are not in a position to answer that question now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect to be able to answer it in a short time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will renew his question and then I will be in a position to answer. He knows that the Minister of Railways and Canals is unwell, and I have not been able to discuss the matter with him.

PUBLIC WORKS IN PENETANGUISHENE, MIDLAND AND ORILLIA.

Mr. TROW (for Mr Cook) asked, Whether the Government intend to place in the Supplementary Estimates this year a certain sum of money to assist the town of Penetanguishene to build an esplanade in that harbor? Whether the Government intend to place in the Supplementary Estimates this year a sum sufficient to complete the harbor improvements at Midland? Whether the Government intend to place a sum of money in the Supplementary Estimates this year to build a post office in the town of Orillia?

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. When the Supplementary Estimates come down they will have to speak for themselves. I cannot give any other answer just now.

FREE LIST BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to lay upon the Table of the House, the report of the Minister of Customs, made some time since, on the application of the American Government made through their Consul at Ottawa, asking that certain articles of farm produce be placed on the free list in conformity with the statute of agreement entered into with the United States?

Mr. BOWELL. The Minister of Customs never having made any such report it cannot be laid upon the Table.

RICHARD MERRICK, OF CHATHAM.

Mr. TROW asked, Whether Richard Merrick, of Chatham, was in the employ of the Government during the year 1887, or any part thereof? If so, in what capacity; for what period and at what salary, and how much was he paid? Is he still in the employ of the Government? If so, in what capacity and at what salary?

Mr. CARLING. He was in the employ of the Government a year ago; and if the hon. gentleman would place a motion upon the notice paper I will be glad to bring down the papers.

Mr. McMULLEN.

HALDIMAND DEPUTY RETURNING OFFICER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether Government are aware that one Charles Young, one of the deputy returning officers at the two elections held in the County of Haldimand, in February and November, 1887, and one of the parties at whose polls certain irregularities are alleged to have occurred, has served a term of imprisonment for theft in the gaol of the County of Brant, prior to being appointed deputy returning officer as aforesaid?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government are not aware that Chas. Young served a term of imprisonment for theft in the gaol of the County of Brant prior to being appointed deputy returning officer. They are informed that he has not. Mr. Charles Young, as deputy returning officer, was not in any sense an officer of the Government; but we are informed that he is a respectable man, who has held several offices of trust and honor in the County of Haldimand, and that he was recommended for this office by several persons of credit, including a prominent Grit politician. The only charge with regard to irregularities at his polling place was investigated and dismissed.

THE FREE LIST—ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to call the attention of the Government to the Order in Council published in Saturday's Gazette, which purports to place upon the free list the articles mentioned therein, but only does so in favor of the United States. The concluding operative words of the Order in Council are these:

"That the articles in question may hereafter, until otherwise provided, be imported into Canada from the United States free of duty."

That Order in Council recites the Customs Act of 1879, section 6, and when I look at section 6, the impression on my mind is that if that section is to be acted upon, the goods in question must be placed on the free list entirely. The clause, after enumerating the articles that may be so treated, says:

"Any or all of the articles so enumerated may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act."

You will observe that it does not say free of duty merely when they come from the United States, but free of duty when imported into Canada. Then it goes on to say:

"Upon the proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same, under such proclamation, when imported in Canada."

My view of the Act is that the Government must place these goods on the free list entirely in order to comply with the clause of the Act in question. By the interpretation that the Government have placed upon this clause under the Order in Council of Saturday, they appear to hold that they may place these articles on the free list in relation to the United States alone, and may still maintain a tariff upon them as against Great Britain or any other nation in the world. I commend the Government for their desire to consider the interest of Canada first, and, if is not to the interest of Canada that these articles, or any other goods, should be admitted free from any part of the world, or that they should only be admitted under certain restrictions, I am in favor of the Government considering the interests of Canada first; but I would like to know whether the Government hold—I presume they thought so when they passed this Order in Council—that the Act of 1879 gives them power to pass an Order in Council of this kind, discriminating in favor of the United States, and against Great Britain. It is true that, in regard to the particular articles mentioned in this Order in Council, the bulk of them do not come from Great Britain, but some of them do. The Trade and Navigation Returns of 1887 show that quite a number of the articles enumerated in that Order in Council have been imported during the past year from Great Britain, but that does not at all effect the matter, because, if, under an Order in Council, you can admit any one article named in section 6 of the Act of 1879 into Canada duty free, and at the same time maintain a duty upon it as against Great Britain, you can do the same in respect to them all. Therefore, in that case, it amounts to this, that in 1879 the House, upon the advice of the present Administration, passed an Act enabling Canada to discriminate against Great Britain, and that has been the construction placed upon the Act of 1879 by the recent Order in Council. I think it is important, therefore, to know if that is the view the Government intend to take of it in the future, and if they have abandoned the attitude they adopted in the recent discussion, when they declared emphatically that in no case would they discriminate against Great Britain. For three weeks, gentlemen opposite advanced that proposition as the great reason why they would not entertain the proposal for reciprocity with the United States, because it would discriminate against Great Britain. If they had abandoned that position, and are going to stand up for Canada first, as this Order in Council seems to suggest, I am glad to see their rapid conversion to a wiser and sounder doctrine. For that purpose, I have taken the earliest opportunity to call the attention of the Government to the Order in Council. Of course, if they have inadvertently framed it in that manner, they will take an early opportunity to correct it, but if they have deliberately come to the conclusion that they can discriminate against the flag, and that is what they have done, let us know whether they propose to adhere to that policy in regard to everything that concerns the welfare of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid, and I think my hon. friend who has just moved this resolution will admit, that we are getting somewhat into an unparliamentary practice of moving the adjournment on every possible occasion when any hon. gentleman wishes to bring any subject which it would be otherwise unparliamentary to do. We all understand the limits which old parliamentary practice would allow in such a case, but I think we are trespassing a good deal on the rule, and it would be very inconvenient if this course should be carried out to any extent. In reference to the question the hon. gentleman has referred to, the Government did not alter their position at all, but this proclamation was issued in consequence of a special application made to this Government by the United States, and it referred to that alone, but the consequence will of necessity be that the Government must open the market to all the world.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman has not at all met my hon. friend's point. He pointed out that, under the terms of this Order in Council, these goods coming from the United States alone are freed from duty. If they come from other quarters they will remain still subject to duty. That is the contention of the First Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you discriminate in the clearest manner in favor of the United States and against all other countries, the mother country included.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought the hon. gentleman would understand that we desired, especially in consequence of this being the first application on the subject which we received from the United States, to issue the proclamation which we were bound to issue to meet this case, but of course the consequence will be that there must be a proclamation issued for the purpose of giving the same to all the world.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You did not say so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I did.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the Act authorise the hon. gentleman to do this by proclamation in relation to any other country? Does he propose to legislate, or depend on the issue of a proclamation? Does he consider that the Act authorises the Government by proclamation to abolish the duties in regard to any other country than the United States?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that the clause under which that proclamation has been issued, authorised only the proclamation that these goods would be imported into Canada free of duty from all the world; it did not say from the United States alone. I think there is no authority in that section 9 of the present Customs Act, in the Revised Statutes, authorising the Government to make a limited proclamation of that kind. It seems to me that, if any English is plain, the Government have acted ultra vires when they issued that proclamation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it must be infra vires.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems that now they have found that out, and as the First Minister says, they are going to correct that mistake at the first possible opportunity, but, as has occurred before this Session, not until after it was pointed out from this side of the House. I would be glad to think that the Government had taken upon themselves to adopt the policy they seemed to have adopted by that proclamation. I am free to admit that, if the Government adopt that policy of discriminating only in favor of the United States, they have got to face the "favored nation" clause in British treaties, they have to say that Canada will not be bound by the "favored nation" clause in British treaties, so that our hands will not be tied in making commercial arrangements to suit ourselves. I had hoped that that was the case, and I regret that the Government are proposing to back down upon so important a subject as this.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is evident that there will have to be another proclamation issued unless there is to be discrimination. My friend the Minister of Customs will understand that, when an Order in Council is as explicit as this, these articles would certainly not be allowed in free from any other country than the United States. I do not think the Minister is guilty of admitting or directing the admission of anything free into Canada that he is not compelled to, and the language of the Order in Council is very explicit:

"And whereas in the opinion of our Governor in Council, it is expedient that the said articles should be admitted into Canada from the United States free of duty,"—

And it closes after enumerating the different articles, that they "may hereafter, until otherwise provided, be imported into Canada from the United States free of duty."

It was evidently the intention of the Government that they should be made free coming from the United States and the United States alone, for there was no necessity to insert the words "from the United States" at all if the intention was to admit them free from all countries. I understand the First Minister to say that the Government will now amend the proclamation, and that these articles will be placed on the free list, come from what country they may.

Mr. MULOCK. With regard to the remarks made by the First Minister, that he regretted it was necessary to make this motion, I must refer him to the Minister of Public Works as my excuse. I only intended to call the attention of the Government to the matter, in the first place, for the reason that it appears to me that the present Order in Council is ultra vires of the power of the Government, and absolutely void, and therefore would not accomplish what was apparently in the minds of the Government at the time. My object was to induce the Government to put the matter in a legal shape as respects the validity of the Order in Council.

Motion withdrawn.

PRINTING OF DOMINION NOTES.

Mr. EDGAR, in moving for a copy of the contract which now exists between the Government and the contractor for the printing of Dominion notes, said: I find there is a great discrepancy between the amount voted for the purpose of printing the notes, and the amount actually expended for doing so. The amount voted last year was $25,000 and the amount expended was $37,556.58, showing an increase over the grant of $12,556. Now, when a matter in which the Government have had so much experience as in the printing of Dominion notes, is so difficult to estimate, I think we should have before the House the contract under which the work is done, so that we may see its terms, and whether it cannot be improved, and whether it has been closely followed. I would like to add to the motion, with the permission of the House, the words "and further, for all copies of correspondence relating to the awarding thereof."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PRIVATE THOMAS NEELY.

Mr. MULOCK moved for:

Copies of all letters, despatches, communications and other papers, in the possession of the Department of Militia and Defence, touching the case of Private Thomas Neely, late of "C" Company, School of Infantry, or of his widow and children, for compensation by reason of his disability and death.

He said: The facts of the case are simply these, as I am informed by the widow of Private Neely. He enlisted in "C" Company of Infantry on the 1st February, 1884; he went to the North-West with his company in March, 1885, for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. His company returned to Toronto on the 28th October, 1885. Shortly after his return home he became ill, and his illness finally developed into insanity. He was placed for a time in the jail in Toronto, and then placed in the Lunatic Asylum, and the military authorities, on the 17th May, 1886, discharged him from the service of Her Majesty on the ground of his insanity. He continued insane until the time of his death on the 21st January, 1887, on which day he died in the Provincial Lunatic Asylum in Toronto, and was buried that day as a pauper, being followed to the grave by his widow and the undertaker only. This is a case for which I bespeak the favorable consideration of the Government. If the House will permit me, I will read an extract from a letter from his widow, who says:

"When he returned he complained of feeling great pain at times in his head. He had 10 days leave of absence from the regiment after his return. I do not remember the date, but he had his holidays in November. After his return he complained frequently of his head. When at home, and on Christmas after coming home, he frequently said that he knew it would be his last Christmas with me, stating that he knew his head would never get better, and at times he got quite delirious and imagined strange things which I would have to convince him was not so; and at other times he would sit and look at us, that is, the children and me, and would say he knew his time with us was not long, as he had strange feelings when in the North-West."

He told her he had these pains in his head and strange feelings while in the North-West:

"Sometimes he thought the sun affected his head, and sometimes he thought it was nervousness."

Mr. MULOCK.

Then she goes on to state:

"There was never any insanity in his family, all being healthy, strong people. When he became insane he was 10 months in the Insane Asylum, and on the 21st of January, 1887, he was buried from the Asylum as a pauper, having no one to follow his remains but myself and the undertaker; since which time I never received a cent from any one."

Now, that discloses the state of affairs. This man served his country in the North-West; he endured, no doubt, the ordinary hardships incidental to that campaign, and he came back home, having at some period in his life—whether in the North-West or not, I am not aware, nor do I think it is possible to ascertain—but still, having at some time contracted the seeds of the disease which ultimately carried him off, he became disabled while in the service. This is not a case of an ordinary volunteer, but more that of one of the regulars, his whole time being devoted to the service. Having become invalided, having become insane, he is discharged from the service, and without having recovered his mental health he dies and leaves a widow and children, whom, I think, should be pensioned upon the country. In this particular case it was impossible to show that the soldier lost his reason while on actual service. If it was a case of physical disability we could trace cause and effect, but it is wholly impossible to do so now, and no enquiry could show, so far as reasoning up the case goes, clearly and beyond all doubt, that his disease was contracted in the service. I make that admission, I think it is right I should do so; but I ask the country to presume in favor of the man and now in favor of his widow and children, to give the presumption in his favor, under the ordinary principle of law. He was in sound health, body and mind, when he went to the North-West, so far as appears. He no doubt complied with the regulations in that behalf, no doubt he was examined and certified as being in good health, and therefore if he was well in body and mind when he went to the North-West, it is clear that he contracted that disease whilst in the North-West or immediately after his return. Insanity is the outcome of mental excitement of various kinds, and I think the circumstance immediately preceding the outbreak of insanity in his case were such as to excite the ordinary mind, and the benefit of the doubt should be given to those whom he left behind. I think the Minister of Militia is very favorably disposed towards this case, but I understand there is merely a technical difficulty that prevents him from making an allowance under the circumstances, namely, that the law did not meet the case. Am I right?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad there is nothing more than a difficulty about the law. I have looked through the Queen's Regulations upon the subject, and I think I can find a clause under which relief can be given. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 934 of the Regulations and Orders of the Militia of the Dominion, he will find the following clause—and I may say that the sections preceding that section provide for compensation according to different scales, and then there is a general sweeping clause to this effect:

"In instances where the regulations do not meet the circumstances of the individual case, they may be especially considered by His Excellency the Governor in Council."

That section, I think, will meet the case. This is the only case, so far as I am aware, of this character, that is the outcome of the campaign in the North-West; we are not likely, therefore, to have the precedent, such as this would be if it were established, abused, and it being the only one I do not think there can be any good reason advanced against an allowance being made in this case. It would meet with the approval of the militia. I have received a great many communications on the subject from men in the service, and they seem to wonder the case has not been dealt with before. I do not propose to upbraid the Minister on the matter; he is carefully endeavoring to guard the public exchequer and to prevent fraud; but, in view of what has occurred, he will probably be able to see what a grateful country will expect of him in this case, and meet it in the spirit I have suggested, and give the presumption in favor of the unfortunate soldier.

Mr. DENISON. I think this is a case which should be enquired into by the Minister of Militia, so that something may be done. The widow of the soldier called and explained the circumstance to me, and I must say that she made out a very good case. I have no doubt that if this man had become insane when on the North-West expedition his widow would have received something in the way of a pension, and as there is a doubt as to when his insanity came on, whether in the North-West or immediately after his return, the question of pension, of course, is one for the Minister to consider. The widow says that immediately after he came back she noticed something strange in his actions, and she thinks something was wrong with him at that time.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The papers which have been asked by the hon. gentleman who has spoken on this subject expressed the deep regret which I feel myself in regard to the case of the widow, I shall be only too glad to bring down as soon as it is possible for me to do so. The facts of the case are, I believe, exactly as the hon. gentleman has stated them to be. As reported to me the case of this man is as follows. He enlisted in "C" Company of Infantry, the permanent corps of Toronto, on the 21st February, 1884. He is reported to have done very good service indeed during the troublesome times in the North-West. He followed his corps under orders and he did his duty fully as well as any other man who took part in the troubles, and as well as any other member of that corps which distinguished itself during those times. He returned from the North-West on the 25th October, 1886. On April 10, 1886, he became insane, and he had to be removed from the hospital where he had been admitted on the 28th March, to the insane asylum on the 17th April. When the matter was brought before me as Minister of Militia it became my duty, however great might be my sympathy for this individual case, to investigate the matter. The case was brought before me upon the ground that the insanity from which the unfortunate man suffered was the result of his trip to the North-West. The law, as the hon. gentleman very correctly stated it, did not provide for any case which did not come under the statute giving pensions to those who had taken part in the troubles, and the matter was submitted to the surgeon of his corps, Surgeon Strange, a gentleman whose eminence as a physician is universally admitted, and that officer reported to me that it was impossible for him to trace the disease from which this man suffered to the service which he had done in the North-West. Consequently it became impossible for me as the Minister administering that Department to bring this individual case under the statute granting pensions to those who had been wounded or suffered disability from the service which they had done at the front; and, as the hon. gentleman knows, the law does not provide for any gratuity or any pension to those in the permanent corps or in the militia, except in specified cases, and the specified cases do not meet the case of Neely. I have already taken some little trouble investigating the matter and I intend to submit to the Government a recommendation which, provided it is approved by the Governor in Council, will permit me to do something for the widow. The hon. gentleman must admit that, the case having been submitted to me under the circumstances which I have just referred to, it was impossible, as the law existed, for me to provide for the case; and in answer to the communication from the widow of Neely, I stated, as it was my duty so to do, the circumstances which prevented me granting her any compensation for services which he had rendered in the North-West. I hope that whatever can be done will be done, because I admit that it is one of the very hardest cases that have come before me for a long time as Minister of Militia.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad to hear that it is the intention of the Minister to do as he has stated, and provide some gratuity for the widow of this poor man. As I understand, the intention of the Minister is to ask the Government for some compensation for the widow. I think, Mr. Speaker, that when he takes this into his consideration he might very well go further. I see no reason in the world why the widow of this man should not be treated in the very same manner as if the man had been shot in battle, or had died during the campaign. So far as I can see it is no very violent presumption to suppose that the disease from which the man died cannot be explained in any other way, than that it was brought on by the hardship of the campaign. We understand very well that if he had not served in the campaign he could not have contracted the disease he died from. Under such circumstances I repeat what I said a moment ago, that it is no violent supposition to suppose that this man was brought to his death by the fact that he served in this campaign. There is no other evidence.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg your pardon, there is other evidence which will be shown when the papers are brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the evidence?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him I will just read to him a very short extract from the report of Surgeon Strange, who it will be remembered was the surgeon of "C" Corps of Infantry to which Neely belonged. Surgeon Strange reports that having gone carefully into his case he is of opinion that Neely's service in the North-West had nothing whatever to do with his insanity. It does not appear, therefore, that this man has any claim for compensation under the statute by which I am allowed to give compensation, for any disability incurred in the North-West, and there are no funds at the disposal of this Department to meet any such case.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the hon. gentleman could not do otherwise than he has done under the statute. The point I wished to make was this,—if no other cause can be assigned for his disease it was no very violent supposition to suppose that death was brought about by the hardship of the campaign. Under such circumstances the Minister must arrive at the conclusion that some compensation should be given to his widow. I suggest that if the law as it stands does not provide for the case, the law can be made by this Parliament to provide for it. If the hon. gentlemen asks for the gratuity, Parliament will be only too happy to grant it. As far as this side of the House is concerned we will not grudge the money, and we will be happy to aid in anything that can be done by the Government in this connection.

Mr. IVES. I would like to add my influence, if I have any, to that of the hon. gentlemen who are urging the Minister to deal liberally with this case. I think the Minister of Militia, though perhaps perfectly just, is not inclined to be quite sufficiently generous. There have been other cases before the present one in which I humbly think he had the law and the right to give some assistance, but which the hon. gentleman has already refused to do. I do not think that the country would begrudge a little assistance in a case of this kind or in any other case of a similar character when volunteers are injured in actual service. I think there is no disposition in the country to treat the volunteers in a niggardly manner at all. It is generally understood that the pay that they get is not a very large remuneration and that there is nothing in it to recompense them for injuries they may sustain in actual service. I know that the feeling of the country is that when a volunteer is injured in actual service he should be recompensed or indemnified in some way. Of course we cannot expect to imitate the liberal proportion of the pension list of our neighbors to the south. We have not a big surplus at our disposal to do it, but we have enough money to treat our volunteer forces fairly and not stingily. Those claims are founded in equity, and I think the Minister would be supported by both sides of the House if he would give a little more generous interpretation to the law and to his powers in this respect than he has been in the habit of doing.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that the portion of the report of the medical officer read by the Minister of Militia entirely covers the case.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I only read an extract.

Mr. MULOCK. That may be. I cannot see that the widow and children would be disentitled to compensation merely because you cannot prove that the disability was brought about by the campaign in the North-West. There is the fact that the man was on duty, and it is immaterial, so far as this question is concerned, whether this infirmity was brought on by service in the North-West or by service elsewhere. He was in the service at the time he was cut down. Therefore his case is entirely one entitling him to consideration at the hands of the country, quite irrespective of whether you can prove that his disease originated in the North-West or not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He was entitled only to pay for 30 days. That would not amount to much.

Mr. MULOCK. Here we have a case where a man in the service of the country and actually wearing Her Majesty's uniform at the time is cut down by disease and ultimately dies, and leaves his family at the mercy of the country. Is there any technicality that can be allowed to intervene to prevent the country doing its duty under such circumstances?

Mr. AMYOT. I entirely agree with the request that some help should be given to the widow of this man. The soldiers in that campaign were submitted to great hardship, and I think as a country we should have some gratitude for those who exposed their lives under such circumstances. I hope and I believe that the case should be treated liberally. If we have nothing in the law to enable us to do justice to this widow we should change the law. It is time yet, as it is always time to render justice.

Motion agreed to.

EDIFICES PUBLICS A SAINT-HYACINTHE.

M. DUPONT demande—

Copie de toutes lettres, mémoires et autres documents concernant la construction d'édifices publics dans la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe, tels que le bureau de poste et entrepôt pour la douane, etc.

M. l'Orateur, le district de Saint-Hyacinthe est intéressé à la prospérité de la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe. Non-seulement la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe est le chef-lieu du district de ce nom, mais elle est aussi le centre d'affaires d'une population d'au delà de 100,000 âmes. Saint-Hyacinthe, il est inutile de le remarquer ici, est une des villes qui occupent une des meilleures positions dans la Puissance du Canada sous le rapport de la science et des maisons d'éducation. La cité de Saint-Hyacinthe possède de vastes maisons d'éducation pour

Mr. Ives.

Il est vrai qu'il n'est pas besoin d'édifices publics pour mettre en entrepôt la science ; la science qui est distribuée par les maisons d'éducation de la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe est l'instruction de la jeunesse ; elle est connue sous ce rapport dans tout le pays.

déposée en entrepôt dans les intelligences des jeunes et loyaux sujets de Sa Majesté pour être ensuite utilisée pour le bien du pays. Mais la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe, au point de vue du progrès matériel, de son importance commerciale et industrielle, est au niveau de son importance morale et intellectuelle.

Tout le monde se rappelle encore que cette jeune cité fut incendiée en 1876. Plus heureuse que sa cité sœur de Saint-Jean, N.B., Saint-Hyacinthe, malgré ses désastres, constatait encore une augmentation de population au recensement de 1881. Depuis lors, grâce à la politique de protection que nous avons, la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe s'est développée, je puis dire d'une façon étonnante, et au prochain recensement, aucune ville du pays ne pourra constater, eu égard à sa population, un progrès plus considérable. Je n'hésite pas à dire que la population de la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe et sa richesse seront plus que doublées en 1891.

En 1879, il n'y avait pas 200 ouvriers employés dans l'industrie à Saint-Hyacinthe. Aujourd'hui il y a un capital de près de $1,000,000 engagé dans les diverses manufactures qui ont surgi depuis cette époque ; le nombre des ouvriers employés dans les différentes usines est de douze à quinze cents, et leurs salaires annuels s'élèvent à près de $300,000.

M. l'Orateur, la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe doit ce progrès matériel étonnant, depuis 1879, tant à l'intelligence et à l'esprit d'entreprise de ses citoyens qu'à la politique adoptée en 1879 par le gouvernement actuel. Grâce à cette politique le gouvernement a vu ses revenus augmenter considérablement ; et avec de l'argent dans le trésor, il a pu faire de grandes entreprises utiles au pays. Le gouvernement a pu élever surtout dans les villes importantes de la Puissance, des édifices publics qui attestent notre prospérité.

Le district de Saint-Hyacinthe, M. l'Orateur, je me plais à le rappeler à l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics, a contribué largement à l'établissement de cette politique, puisqu'en 1879 il était représenté par trois députés qui appuyaient la politique nationale. Des améliorations considérables ont été faites, sans parler des grandes entreprises de chemin de fer, dans différentes villes du pays. Saint-Hyacinthe n'a pas encore eu son tour malgré son importance que je viens de démontrer. Nous ne sommes pas jaloux des améliorations qui ont été faites ailleurs. Au contraire, pour ma part, je dois en féliciter le gouvernement. Mais il me semble que maintenant le tour du district de Saint-Hyacinthe est arrivé ; je puis dire même qu'il est passé et qu'on l'a donné à d'autres. Cependant, je crois que l'intérêt public exige que l'on ne néglige pas plus longtemps Saint-Hyacinthe, et qu'on lui accorde les édifices publics auxquels réfère la motion que je viens de faire.

J'ai en main une liste des différentes villes où le gouvernement a construit des édifices publics. L'importance des villes sous le rapport de ces constructions doit dépendre naturellement des revenus que ces villes fournissent au trésor public. Or je vois que dans la ville d'Annapolis, on a construit des édifices publics, ou on doit les construire, au coût de $19,500. La population d'Annapolis est de 2,833, le revenu que son port, son bureau de poste et ses droits d'accise ont donné au trésor public, $13,211. Sydney-Nord, avec une population de 5,484 âmes a rapporté au trésor un revenu de $29,216. Sidney-Sud, avec une population de 3,667 âmes a rapporté au trésor par toute sorte de revenu $4,610. Il y a une foule d'autres villes importantes qui ont des édifices publics et qui donnent un montant moins considérable que la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe. Je vois par exemple la petite ville d'Aylmer qui a une population de 1,781 âmes et qui donne au gouvernement un revenu de $1,309. Coaticook a une population de 2,682 âmes et donne un revenu de $40,232. Je vois dans les estimés un montant de $16,000 pour un bureau de poste et de douane dans cette ville. Joliette donne un revenu de $33,181, et il y a dans les estimés une somme de $10,000 pour des édifices publics dans ce dernier endroit. Fraserville, la ville de l'honorable député de Témiscouata (M. Grandbois), donne un revenu de $5,450, et je vois qu'il y a dans les estimés $6,000 pour un bureau de douane et de poste. Saint-Hyacinthe avec une population, en 1881 de 5,321 âmes, population qui est peut-être de 10,000 âmes aujourd'hui et qui atteindra certainement au prochain recensement 12,000 à 13,000 âmes, sans aucuns édifices publics, sans aucune facilité pour permettre les importations dans la ville, sans aucune accommodation quelconque en fait de bureaux publics, rapporte au gouvernement un revenu annuel d'un delà de $80,000. Et cependant, M. l'Orateur, la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe a été négligée jusqu'à aujourd'hui; le gouvernement n'a pas songé à lui donner les édifices publics que le service public requiert, que l'intérêt public exige. Le commerce de cette jeune et florissante cité ne permet pas de retarder plus longtemps la construction de tels édifices.

Comme je le disais il y a un instant, Saint-Hyacinthe possède de magnifiques établissements pour l'instruction de la jeunesse. La corporation a également construit de magnifiques édifices publics pour ses propres besoins. J'ajouterai même, que la nation américaine a reconnu l'importance de la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe, puisque depuis trois ou quatre ans, les Etats-Unis, dans l'intérêt de leur commerce, y sont représentés par un consul et un vice-consul. Il est vraiment regrettable pour les citoyens de votre district, de voir le drapeau étoilé de la république voisine flotter sur des édifices convenables et qui font honneur à ce drapeau, tandis que le drapeau du Canada flotte sur de misérables édifices, de pauvres remis, qui ne sont pas du tout dignes de la cité de Saint-Hyacinthe, ni de son port d'entrée, ni de l'importance de son bureau du revenu, ou de son bureau de poste.

Je demande donc, M. l'Orateur, au gouvernement, et surtout à l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics (sir Hector Langevin), ainsi qu'à son collègue du district de Montréal, de vouloir bien porter un peu d'attention à ce coin obscur de leur pays, et d'accorder à Saint-Hyacinthe les édifices publics que son importance et les besoins de son commerce requièrent.

Au reste, je considère que le gouvernement, en justice, est tenu de construire ces édifices demandés avec instance. Le bureau de poste se tient, actuellement, presque dans la rue. C'est un local de cinq ou six pieds sur vingt. J'ai été moi-même témoin d'un spectacle regrettable: Une foule nombreuse de citoyens stationnaient dans la rue, en face du bureau de poste, à une époque de l'année où les intempéries de la saison ne permettaient pas de demeurer ainsi au dehors. Il fallait attendre dans la rue que la malle fut délivrée, ou qu'il était impossible de se tenir à l'intérieur de l'édifice.

M. l'Orateur, le gouvernement est un peu complice de l'exiguïté des édifices et de l'état de choses actuel à Saint-Hyacinthe. Sa politique de protection a beaucoup contribué à faire progresser cette ville. Je considère que le gouvernement est tenu d'accorder à Saint-Hyacinthe les édifices demandés, afin d'aider à transiger la somme d'affaires qui s'y fait maintenant. Je puis assurer le gouvernement que toute la population et les hommes d'affaires de cette ville en seront orgueilleux et très reconnaissants.

J'espère que l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics et son honorable collègue du district de Montréal, prouveront aux hommes d'affaires, si entreprenants et si actifs de Saint-Hyacinthe, qu'ils n'ont rien perdu pour attendre et que le gouvernement est disposé, dès maintenant, à construire ces édifices rapidement et de dimensions telles, qu'ils répondront aux besoins de la localité et ne devront pas être recommandés quatre ou cinq ans après leur construction.

M. l'Orateur, on ne peut considérer comme exorbitante la dépense de quarante ou cinquante mille piastres pour doter Saint-Hyacinthe d'édifices publics convenables, quand on sait que le district de Saint-Hyacinthe a donné des millions au trésor public, sans jamais recevoir, en retour, un seul sou en améliorations publiques depuis que la Confédération existe?

Je crois, du reste, que ces améliorations sont autant de l'intérêt du gouvernement que de celui des particuliers; car d'ici à cinq ans, par le surcroît d'affaires qui aura lieu dans le port de Saint-Hyacinthe, si le gouvernement favorise le commerce de cette importante cité, il aura perçu plus de revenus qu'il n'en faudra pour payer cette dépense de cinquante à soixante mille piastres; dépense que l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics, qui s'est toujours montré soucieux de rendre justice à toutes les localités où l'esprit d'entreprise des citoyens ainsi que leur intelligence des affaires se manifestent, fera pour Saint-Hyacinthe comme il l'a fait partout ailleurs.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: M. l'Orateur, je dois d'abord féliciter l'honorable député sur la manière habile dont il a présenté la question qu'il a soumise à la considération de la Chambre. Il a surtout intéressé les honorables députés des deux côtés de la Chambre en mettant devant eux la statistique relative au commerce de Saint-Hyacinthe, à l'augmentation de sa population et de ses affaires, et à sa prospérité généralement.

L'honorable député dit que c'est un peu beaucoup la faute du gouvernement si Saint-Hyacinthe jette un cri de détresse au sujet d'édifices publics qu'il n'a pas. L'honorable député dit, avec raison, je crois, que si la construction de ces édifices est devenue nécessaire, cela est due à la politique suivie par le gouvernement—la politique nationale—laquelle a fait accroître considérablement les affaires dans Saint-Hyacinthe, et a fait augmenter sa population aussi rapidement que l'a dit l'honorable député. Cela est parfaitement vrai.

L'automne dernier, j'avais été invité, par le conseil municipal et les citoyens de Saint-Hyacinthe, appartenant aux deux partis politiques, de leur rendre visite afin de constater par moi-même l'état des affaires, l'augmentation de la population et généralement les besoins de la ville. J'avoue, M. l'Orateur, que j'aurais beaucoup désiré voir Saint-Hyacinthe, qui est si prospère, et fait tant d'honneur à notre province par son progrès, mais j'ai préféré ne pas y aller alors; j'ai voulu savoir par les députés de cette localité, par les documents qui m'ont été fournis et les statistiques que j'ai eu en ma possession, ce qui en était.

Si j'étais allé à Saint-Hyacinthe, et qu'après la réception qu'on promettait de me faire, je fusse revenu à Ottawa, demander à mes collègues d'accorder un vote d'argent, et au parlement de sanctionner cette mesure, j'aurais pu être accusé d'avoir un peu voulu payer ma réception là-bas. Mais comme je n'y suis pas allé, et sachant maintenant de mes amis politiques et autres, l'état des affaires de Saint-Hyacinthe et ses besoins, et sachant de plus que les renseignements donnés par l'honorable député de Bagot (M. Dupont) à l'égard des édifices publics sont absolument exacts, je puis assurer l'honorable député que cette question n'avait pas échappé à mon attention; et que maintenant qu'elle est soumise à la Chambre, avec la force avec laquelle il l'a exposée dans sa motion, je me ferai un devoir d'y attirer l'attention du gouvernement, et peut-être que les estimés supplémentaires feront voir quelle a été la décision du gouvernement.

M. LAURIER: M. l'Orateur, j'espère que l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics persistera dans l'intention qu'il exprime maintenant de visiter la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe quelque jour. Je suis parfaitement convaincu que s'il n'y trouve pas autant d'amis politiques qu'il pourrait trou ver dans d'autres parties du pays, il y trouvera cependant des adversaires qui seront très heureux de le voir dans toutes circonstances. Et quand il fera cette visite, ce ne sera pas, j'espère, pour s'assurer si la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe doit avoir les édifices publics qu'elle réclame depuis longtemps, car d'après les discours que nous venons d'entendre cette question doit être décidée à l'heure qu'il est, au moins dans l'esprit de l'honorable ministre des Travaux publics, mais ce sera pour choisir le site où ils doivent être placés.

Je suis heureux de m'accorder cette fois-ci avec mon honorable ami le ministre des Travaux publics et l'honorable député de Bagot (M. Dupont) au sujet de la nécessité de ces édifices à Saint-Hyacinthe. Mais il y a un point cependant sur lequel je ne m'accorde pas avec eux; c'est que c'est la politique nationale qui a développé la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe. Je dois dire que ce n'est pas du tout l'opinion des habitants de Saint-Hyacinthe. Au contraire, ce que l'on demande maintenant à Saint-Hyacinthe, ce n'est pas la politique nationale mais c'est la réciprocité.

Motion accordée.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:
